SHARPSTEIN, J. The defendants were sureties on the official bond of a notary public by the name of Cordell. Cordell, while acting as notary public, also acted as real-estate agent and broker in the purchase and sale of lands, making loans, collecting interests, rents, etc. The plaintiff upon several occasions employed Cordell as such broker or agent to make loans for her, and in the purchase of property, and often consulted him as to such matters, and sometimes acted upon his advice in relation thereto. In several of the loans so made, Cordell produced to plaintiff a note and mortgage prepared and acknowledged before himself, and she would then go with Cordell to the bank and pay him the money for the borrower, and Cordell would deliver to her the note and mortgage. Upon the 28th of August, 1885, he, then being a notary public, exhibited to the plaintiff what purported to be a note and mortgage, signed by one Charles E. Wilson, for the sum of $1,000, the mortgage purporting to be of certain lands in the county of Santa Cruz, to secure the payment of the note. To the mortgage was appended by said Cordell, as notary public, a certificate of said Wilson's acknowledgment of the execution of said mortgage. Cordell represented to plaintiff that the note and mortgage was executed by said Wilson, and that he wished to borrow of plaintiff $1,000 thereon, and plaintiff thereupon received said note and mortgage, and paid to Cordell, for Wilson, the sum of $1,000. Afterwards, on the 8th of April, 1886, said Cordell, still being a notary public, procured of plaintiff $1,000 upon what purported to be the note and mortgage of one Joseph Curtis. The mortgage purported to be upon lands in San Benito county, to secure the payment of said note of said Curtis. Said Cordell had attached to said mortgage a certificate of acknowledgment made before him as a notary public, and attested to the same by affixing his official notarial seal thereto. By means of said forged notes and mortgages, and the false certificates of acknowledgments attached to said mortgages, plaintiff was induced to receive said notes and mortgages, and place in the hands of said Cordell, for said Wilson and Curtis, $2,000, which said Cordell fraudulently appropriated to his own use, and in the month of August, 1886, absconded, and has ever since been absent from the United States. Plaintiff did not know before the absconding of said Cordell that said notes and mortgages were forged. Upon the foregoing facts the court found that plaintiff was entitled to judgment against the defendants for the sum of $2,000, and interest on $1,000 from August 28, 1885, and on the further sum of $1,000 from April 8, 1886. Judgment was entered accordingly. From that defendants appeal.

The only question presented here is, do the facts found by the court support the judgment? The facts found establish beyond any question the civil and criminal liability of Cordell. But the liability of his sureties, the defendants, depends upon the terms and conditions of the bond which they executed. The sureties upon an official bond undertake for nothing which is not within the letter of their contract. "The obligation is strictissimi juris, and nothing is to be taken by construction against the obligors. They have consented to be bound to a certain extent only, and their liability must be confined within the terms of that consent." Per COOLEY, J., in Bank v. Ziegler, 49 Mich. 157, 18 N. W. Rep. 496. That is a clear and concise statement of a rule universally accepted, but as might naturally be expected, courts have differed as to the delinquencies of the principal for which the sureties made themselves liable. The defendants in this case undertook that said Cordell should well and faithfully perform all the duties of his said office as required by law, and the requirements of the statutes of this state, and faithfully execute and perform all the duties of such office required by any law to be enacted subsequently to the execution of said bond. The duty of notaries public is prescribed by the Political Code. Among other things, they are required "to take the acknowledgment or proof of powers of attorney, mortgages, deeds, grants, transfers, and other instruments of writing, executed by any person, and to give a certificate of such proof or acknowledgment indorsed on or attached to the instrument." Pol. Code, § 794. It is for a breach of the duty enjoined on their principal by this clause that the defendants are held to be liable to the plaintiff by the court below. The Code provides that, "for the official misconduct or neglect of a notary public, he and the sureties on his official bond are liable to the parties injured thereby for all the damages sustained." Id. § 801. It is no part of the duty of a notary public to receive money from or for anybody. It was misconduct, but not official misconduct, to fraudulently obtain it. And it is only against his official misconduct that the sureties consented to indemnify persons injured thereby. He did not receive any money in his official capacity.

Under a law of the state of New York, a supervisor, before entering upon the discharge of his duties as such, was required to give a bond, with sureties, for the faithful discharge of his official duties as such supervisor during his term of office, and well and truly keep and pay over and account for all moneys belonging to his town, and coming into his hands as such supervisor. The board of supervisors of Madison county, by resolution in due form, as authorized by law, levied the sum of $1,500 upon the town of Sullivan, in that county, for the temporary relief of the poor of that town, and $52 for highways and bridges; and in the warrant attached to the tax-roll of the town directed the collector to pay said sums to the supervisor of said town, which he did, but the supervisor did not account for or pay over the whole of said sum, and appropriated a portion thereof. An action upon his official bond for the recovery of the amount so appropriated was prosecuted against his sureties, and a judgment against them for said amount was entered against the defendants, and affirmed by the supreme court, and reversed on appeal by the court of appeals. In the opinion of the court of appeals it is said that "the only objection to the recovery is that the moneys for which a recovery was had are not within the condition of the bond." After quoting said condition, as before stated herein, and the statutes relating to the raising of moneys in towns for the support of highways and bridges and the poor, the opinion proceeds: "The supervisor has no authority under the law to receive moneys, even in trust, raised by tax for the support of highways and bridges, or of the poor. Moneys raised for such purposes are expressly excluded from those which he is authorized to receive or pay over." Further on in the opinion the court says: "The principal in the bond received, officially and as supervisor, precisely what the law authorized him to receive and no more. The appellant, in becoming surety upon the official bond of the supervisor, must be supposed, to have known the law and the limit and extent of the liability in his case assumed." The judgment of the court below was reversed. People v. Pennock, 60 N. Y. 421. In Welsh v. Lumisden, 2 Hailes, 376, John Syme, messenger, was intrusted by Welsh with letters of horning and caption against one of his debtors. Instead of attaching the debtor's effects by pawning, the messenger received them from the debtor himself, sold them by public roup, to the extent of the debt, and applied the proceeds to his own use. He became insolvent, and Welsh, the creditor, pursued Lumisden, his cautioner, for the debt. "The lords found the cautioners only liable for the messenger's faithful execution of his office, but not for any money allowed to come into his hands."

In the case at bar the judgment against the sureties is for money which their principal fraudulently obtained from the plaintiff. It was not in the line of his official duty to receive money from any one for any purpose. His receiving of it was purely a voluntary act on his part, and one for which his sureties did not agree to be liable. The contention of respondent's counsel is that the sureties are liable because there was attached to the counterfeit mortgages a false certificate of their principal as notary public of the due acknowledgment of the execution of said mortgages by the persons whose names had been forged to them, and that but for that certificate the money received by said principal would not have been delivered to him. But it was no part of his official duty to receive money upon valid notes and mortgages, and if these notes and mortgages had been valid, and he had received money from the mortgagee for the mortgagors, and neglected to deliver it to the mortgagors, we think no one could contend that the defendants would be liable for such misconduct of their principal to any one who might be injured thereby. The official misconduct for which the defendants were liable to any one who was injured thereby consisted in his making and attaching to the counterfeit mortgages certificates of their due acknowledgments; and the plaintiff is not entitled to recover any more than her loss by reason of said certificates being false instead of true. If the mortgages had been valid in every respect, their value as securities would have depended upon the value of the mortgaged property. If its value had been as great or greater than the sums secured by them, then the loss to the mortgagee might, in case of a false or fatally defective certificate of acknowledgment, be equal to the sums secured to be paid by said mortgages. Otherwise they might be of less value, or no value at all, as in the case of McAllister v. Clement, 75 Cal. 182, 16 Pac. Rep. 775, in which the finding was that the property mortgaged was wholly valueless, and that plaintiff had not suffered any damage by reason of the defective certificate of acknowledgment. The judgment in that case, in favor of the defendants, was affirmed by this court on the ground that no action will lie to recover damages if no damages have been sustained. In that case the mortgage was given to secure the payment of a promissory note for $600. In that case the court found that the mortgaged property was valueless. In this case it did not find that it was of any value. And that distinguishes this case from People v. Butler, (Mich.) 42 N. W. Rep. 273, which more strongly supports respondent's contention than any other cited in her behalf. In that case it was found to be of sufficient value to constitute good security for the loan. If, as we have no doubt, the liability of the defendants is limited to losses sustained through the official misconduct of their principal, the judgment in this case is clearly erroneous. The official misconduct consisted in certifying falsely to the acknowledgments of the mortgages. The defendants are liable only for what would be the value of those mortgages if valid. The court has not found that they would be of any value if valid. Therefore the proper basis for determining the liability of the defendants is wanting. The findings do not support the judgment, and it must be reversed. Judgment reversed.

(Supreme Court of California. May 20, 1891.)

RAILROAD COMPANIES — STOCK KILLING — NEGLIGENCE — FENCES.

1. The fact that a herder, after having rounded up his sheep a mile and a quarter from a railroad track, and after some of them have lain down as if for the night, takes his dog and goes home, is not such contributory negligence as will relieve the railroad company from liability if the sheep afterwards stray on the track and are negligently killed; and the admission of incompetent evidence as to the custom of rounding up and herding sheep is not prejudicial to the company.

2. In an action against a railroad company for negligently killing stock, an allegation that the damage was caused by defendant's failure to maintain a good and sufficient fence will include any defect in the fence without more particular reference to it.

3. One who has only a right to pasture his stock on another's land, adjacent to a railroad, is entitled to the protection of the statute requiring railroad companies to maintain a fence.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tehama county; CHARLES P. BRAYNARD, Judge.

Chipman & Garter, for appellant. John F. Ellison and A. M. McCoy, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This action is for damages for killing plaintiff's sheep by the defendant's locomotive and cars. Plaintiff was the owner of a band of about 3,000 sheep, which he avers were lawfully grazing in a field adjoining defendant's railway, near Rawson's switch, in Tehama county; that, by reason of the failure of the defendant to make and maintain a good and sufficient fence, they, without his fault, strayed upon the track of the railway, and were run over and killed; also that defendant so negligently and carelessly ran and managed its engine and cars that they ran over and killed plaintiff's sheep. The defense is a general denial and a charge of contributory negligence. It appears that Boyd Bros. were in possession of what was known as the "Healey Ranch," as tenants of one Kraft. In the fall of 1889, they sold to plaintiff the stubble feed on the ranch after the grain was removed, and let him into such possession as was necessary to enable him to pasture the fields. Plaintiff was to take charge of his sheep while there, Boyd Bros. assuming no responsibility with reference to them. Boyd Bros. continued to live upon the place, and contracted with plaintiff to board his herder. Plaintiff had possession of no buildings, was not to reside upon the place, but kept his herder there to look after the sheep. Under this contract he drove his sheep on the place on or about the 16th day of September, and they were left there in charge of a herder. On the night of the 7th of October the herder "camped the sheep" about one mile and a quarter from the railroad. After "rounding them up" at this place, he remained until some of them had laid down, apparently for the night, and then went home. The night was rainy, and the sheep strayed from this place to an opening in the fence at Rawson's switch, and out upon the track, and were run over, and some of them killed, by a train running towards Red Bluff, at about half past 7 in the evening. The same train returned in the morning, and again ran over and killed some more of them at about the same place. Rawson's switch, where the sheep entered, was a flag station, and the land inclosed by the defendant at that point is wider than at other places. On the side next this field the fence is some 270 feet further from the track. This extra width is 60 panels measured by the fence, or about 1,000 feet in length along the railway. Near the center of this the Rawson and Healey ranches join, and the opening is near the division fence. The defendant had quite recently constructed a new fence along the right of way and this extra width or reserve, which was evidently intended for use in connection with the station. The opening had been made by Boyd Bros. with the consent of the section boss or master. His duty in reference to such matters appears from the evidence of Davis, the division foreman, to be, if he finds any slight repairs required in the fence which he has the means to make, then to make such repairs, but defects which he has not the lumber or other means to repair it is his duty to report to the division foreman. Boyd Bros. desired this opening for their private accommodation. There was already a gate through which they could have had access to the station, but it was less convenient. They took down a panel 16 feet long, in March preceding the accident, and it had never been replaced, or the fence made good by a gate or any other device. The section master, when he gave consent to make the opening, promised to have a gate placed there, but it had never been done. The old fence, which had shortly before been replaced by the new one, had an opening at the same place, in which there had never been a gate. In short, there had always been an open road there leading from Boyd's house to the station. The field was a large one; how large is not shown. But it extended from the Sacramento river on the south to the railway on the north, and it is stated that the house was about one mile from the railway, and a mile and a half from the river; also that all the bottom land was in grain, and 400 acres of the upland. The plaintiff and his herder both testify that they had not seen this opening before the accident, and did not know of its existence. The plaintiff had seen two gates opening into the right of way, and had given special directions for extra care in keeping them closed. The sheep had been upon the place about 20 days before the accident, and during that time Boyd Bros. had done some hauling through this opening, as they had done before.

A motion for a nonsuit was made at the conclusion of plaintiff's evidence, on the ground of insufficiency, specifying the particular defect claimed; but as the motion was denied, and further evidence put in by both parties, it is not now necessary to consider whether this motion was properly denied; for all the points which can now be urged against this ruling arise also upon the objections to the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict. At the trial very numerous exceptions were taken to the rulings, admitting, or refusing to admit or strike out, evidence. We have carefully examined the record as to these objections, and, as to most, it is sufficient to say there is nothing in them, or the evidence in question was so entirely immaterial that no harm could result either way. A few only we deem it necessary to specially notice. A large number of such exceptions have reference to opinion evidence, as to the proper herding of sheep and the custom of other herders in such cases. The matter in contention seems to have been whether the fact that plaintiff's herder "rounded the sheep up," as the phrase is, a mile and a quarter from the track, and, after some had lain down, took his dog and went off for the remainder of the night, was contributory negligence. But we think, as matter of law or of general knowledge, this would not constitute such negligence as would relieve the defendant of liability. Evidence, therefore, upon this point could not have been prejudicial to the defendant.

One source of damage stated in the complaint is the failure to maintain a good and sufficient fence. In McCoy v. Railroad Co., 40 Cal. 532, it is said: "The neglect of the defendant to build the fence certainly did not operate to dispossess the plaintiff of his entire field, or, what is the same thing, prevent him from making lawful use of it. Besides, he probably knew that, so long as the defendant chose to continue running its cars upon this open track, it undertook at its peril that no harm should come to the stock for the want of a proper fence." It must follow that adjoining proprietors may use their land whether fenced or not, or whether the fence is sufficient or not, and are not bound ordinarily to take any precautions, even when they know the fence to be insufficient, but may use their land in the ordinary manner, relying upon the responsibility of the railroad corporation in case of loss. Whatever complaint the owner of the sheep could have made on the subject of want of care on the part of his herder, as against dogs or coyotes, or panic from any source, the defendant was not interested in it. Had there been a good and sufficient fence, with no openings in it, there certainly would have been no negligence, in reference to the defendant, in leaving such a band of sheep overnight without a keeper, in a stubble field of the extent of this one. There was proof that neither plaintiff nor his herder knew of the open space in the fence. It appears that the fence along the right of way was in general a good one, and there is no allegation in the complaint in reference to the open space through which the sheep passed to get upon the track. Objection is made that, without such allegation, evidence of damage in such case is inadmissible. But it is evident, admitting that the defect in the fence is the fault of defendant, that the averment that defendant failed to maintain a good and sufficient fence would include such a defect, or any defect, which rendered the fence insufficient. The case of Jahant v. Railroad Co., 74 Cal. 9, 15 Pac. Rep. 362, does not sustain appellant. In that case there was no such allegation as to the insufficiency of the fence, but the damage was averred to result from the careless and negligent management of defendant's cars. The horses were on the track, therefore, presumably through the fault of the plaintiff. A remark was made, apparently not necessary for the decision of the case, that this presumption was not sufficiently negated by the general averment that the animals escaped without his fault.

The court refused to give the second instruction asked by the defendant. It reads as follows: "I instruct you, gentlemen of the jury, that a person who pastures his sheep upon the land of another person, required by law to be fenced by a railroad corporation, upon an understanding or agreement with such owner or his tenant, by which it is agreed that such owner or tenant shall not, in any degree or manner, become responsible for the safe-keeping of said sheep, but that said sheep shall be taken care of exclusively by their owner and his herders, and such owner or tenant of the land shall remain in possession of the land, taking care of the fences, making and using openings therein, cultivating and tilling the soil, reserving the use of all buildings and farm implements, and in every way exercising acts of dominion and control over said premises, except merely permitting the owner of the sheep to keep his sheep upon the premises, for the sole purpose of eating the feed therefrom growing upon said lands, is not entitled to the protection of the statute requiring a railroad corporation to fence such lands." We think the court properly refused this instruction. Any person lawfully occupying the land is entitled to the protection of the statute. One who only has the right to pasture his stock temporarily upon the land, as admittedly the plaintiff in this case had, is as much entitled to its benefit as the owner of the land.

The third instruction was properly refused. The objections to it are numerous. It required the court to usurp the province of the jury, and draw conclusions from the evidence. It erroneously implies that there was a necessity of notice to defendant of the opening, although made with its knowledge and consent. It ignores the duty of the defendant to take constant care of its fences, which require it to know within reasonable time of defects, and to repair them. The evidence, we think, plainly tended to show that there was a mixed possession of the ranch by plaintiff and Boyd Bros. The principal dominion and control was doubtless in the plaintiff. But at the same time Boyd Bros. were also living upon the place with such limited possession and rights as would not interfere with the plaintiff. The defendant at the trial took the ground that, under such circumstances, plaintiff had no rights under the statute at all. In this we think it was wrongly advised. No doubt, however, under such circumstances, the parties having a mixed possession, under a contract, each, under certain circumstances, is liable to suffer for the acts of the other. If, for instance, the opening was in the fence through the fault of Boyd Bros. during such co-occupation, and through no fault of defendant, the plaintiff ought not to have recovered. Had an instruction embodying this proposition, and free from objection, been offered, it should have been given. But, although counsel for the defendant made the proposition in various ways, it was always accompanied with something which justified the court in refusing it. Generally, as in the third instruction asked, it was stuffed with an argument which counsel was anxious to have the court make to the jury,—a practice which has become altogether too common. An instruction should be a simple proposition of law, in form, if possible, specially applicable to the facts of the case. But the argument as to its effect should, in general, be left to counsel.

The sixth rejected instruction comes nearest to this simple legal proposition. But there the relation between Boyd Bros. and plaintiff which the jury were required to find, in order to apply the rule, was simply that plaintiff entered into the use of the pasture under contract with Boyd Bros. The fact of co-occupation was ignored. In this case counsel differ widely as to the rights acquired by plaintiff under his contract. Defendant insists that Boyd Bros. were left with full dominion and control, and plaintiff had not even a qualified possession. The instruction lays down no rule which the jury could understand. They are told plaintiff cannot recover if Boyd Bros. could not have recovered under similar circumstances. If similar means the same, the conclusion is quite obvious, and needed no indorsement from the court. If not the same, but in some respects like, in what respects? The jury are not told under what circumstances Boyd Bros. could not have recovered. But why refer to such hypothesis? The question was not as to the liability of Boyd Bros., but whether, under the circumstances, plaintiff could recover. An instruction could easily have been framed to the effect that a joint occupation, by mutual consent, being found from the evidence, plaintiff could not recover if the opening was made by Boyd Bros., without the consent of defendant, and there was no negligence on its part. Outside of the questions already discussed, the charge that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict must depend upon the question whether there was evidence tending to prove the authority of Daly, the section master, to authorize the opening in the fence. We think there was sufficient evidence to justify such conclusion. In their business railroad companies require numerous agents, of whose authority the public knows nothing, save what appearances indicate. It is important both to the public and to the company that such appearances be implicitly relied upon. Unless they were so, the business of such companies would be greatly impeded. It was clearly the duty of the defendant to have some agent whose duty it would be to take care of the fences which it was bound to maintain. The facts show that the agent whose duty it was in this case to keep watch over the fences was Daly. The court and jury were not bound to take his disclaimer of authority as conclusive. We think the weight of the evidence was with the conclusion of the jury upon the subject. We think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

McFARLAND, J. I dissent. The Boyd Bros. were clearly in possession and control of the land and the fences. If they opened the fence, they certainly could not have recovered if their sheep had gone through the opening and been killed. Plaintiff's sheep were being pastured on the land subject to the general control of the land by the Boyds; and, if the sheep were injured by any misconduct of the Boyds, the latter were, perhaps, responsible to plaintiffs for such injury. But if the Boyds kept the fence open for their own convenience, neither they, nor any one temporarily occupying part of the land for a special purpose under them, can complain of the defendant. This proposition is practically admitted in the prevailing opinion of the court, but it is said that this proposition was not presented in the instructions asked by appellant. I think it was clearly presented, particularly in the sixth instruction asked. I think that the phrase, "if the Boyd Bros. could not themselves have recovered damages to their stock under similar circumstances," could not possibly have been understood by the jury in any other way than as meaning that if the sheep had belonged to the Boyd Bros., and had escaped onto the railroad under the circumstances under which plaintiff's sheep so escaped, and the Boyd Bros. could not recover, then plaintiff could not recover. I do not see how any intelligent jury could understand it in any other way. I think that the judgment should be reversed.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent.

RESCISSIION OF SALES—FRAUDULENT REPRESENTATIONS—EVIDENCE.

1. In an action for the balance of the price of certain land and "water certificates," defendants alleged that plaintiff, through his agent, fraudulently represented that water was piped to the land; that the right to the use of a certain amount of water was appurtenant to it, otherwise than as expressed in the water certificates; and that plaintiff would assign to defendants shares of stock in the company other than the water certificates. The evidence showed that the agent's authority was only to find a purchaser at a fixed price, and he denied having made any such representations. One of the defendants, at the time of his interview with plaintiff's agent, visited the land, and there was nothing there to indicate either pipe or water anywhere upon it. The water certificates, which showed on their face what they were, were delivered to defendants with the deed. It was admitted that a short time after the sale defendants knew there was no water piped on the land. Held, that the finding that there was no fraud on the part of plaintiff was justified by the evidence.

2. As defendants claim that the invalidity of the water certificates "is stamped upon their face," their right to rescind, on the ground that the certificates are void, is lost by their unreasonable delay of 17 months after receiving the certificates, and until 2 months after commencement of action for the price, to offer to rescind.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; JOHN L. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Allen & Miller, Waters & Gird, and Harris & Gregg, for appellants. George E. Harpham and H. M. Willis, for respondents.

VANCLIEF, C. On June 11, 1887, the plaintiff sold and conveyed to the defendants six lots of land, containing 20 acres each, and at the same time assigned to the defendants certain written obligations of the Bear Valley Land & Water Company, (a corporation,) to furnish and deliver at a certain point a certain quantity of water, to be used on each of said lots, called "water certificates." The consideration to be paid by the defendants for the land and water certificates was $24,000, of which $6,000 was paid in hand. For the balance of the purchase money the defendants made two promissory notes to the plaintiff for $9,000 each, secured by their mortgage on said land. This action is brought to foreclose the mortgage. The answer of the defendants admits the ex-execution of the notes and mortgage, and then proceeds as follows: "(2) That said notes and mortgage were executed and delivered as and for part of the purchase money of said real estate in complaint described, together with certain water-rights by plaintiff represented as appurtenant thereto, as well as for certain shares of stock in the Bear Valley Land & Water Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the state of California, and for no other or further consideration. (3) That said defendants were induced to so purchase said lands and stock, and to execute and deliver said notes and mortgage, by means of false and fraudulent representations at the time and before that time made by plaintiff to defendants, in this, to-wit: That, at and before the purchase of said real estate, appurtenances, and shares of stock, the said plaintiff, by and through his duly-authorized agent, represented to defendants that water for irrigation purposes was actually piped on said land from the reservoirs of said Bear Valley Land & Water Company; that the right to use twelve miners' inches of said water was appurtenant to said land; that plaintiff would transfer and deliver to defendants shares of stock in said Bear Valley Land & Water Company, representing ownership of twelve miners' inches of water of said corporation; that plaintiff owned the land lying immediately adjacent to the premises in complaint described; that upon said lands plaintiff would at once cause to be constructed a large hotel building at a cost of $20,000, and numerous private dwellings; that the materials to be used in their construction were already purchased by plaintiff, and the contract for the erection thereof let. (4) Defendants, relying upon such representations and believing them to be true, and on the faith thereof, purchased said premises in complaint described, and said stock of plaintiff, and on the 11th of June, 1887, accepted from plaintiff a deed therefor, with six certain instruments in writing, issued under the seal of said Bear Valley Land & Water Company, and signed by its president and secretary, denominated 'water certificates,' and in consideration thereof paid to plaintiff six thousand dollars in cash, and executed the notes and mortgage as in complaint set out and described. (5) That at the date of the acceptance of said deed and said water certificates defendants believed that said water certificates were in fact shares of stock in said corporation, and entitled the defendants, as holders thereof, to the rights and privileges of stockholders in said corporation, and conveyed to defendants the rights and privileges so contracted to be conveyed and transferred by plaintiff, to twelve miners' inches of water of said corporation. (6) Defendants allege that notwithstanding said promises and representations of plaintiff, that neither at the time of said purchase, or now, or at any time or at all, was any water piped on said land from the reservoir of said Bear Valley Land & Water Company, nor from any water supply or source, and no pipes for conveying water were laid on said land at all, nor in the vicinity thereof. (7) That in truth and in fact no water-rights were appurtenant to said lands, and no hotel building or private dwellings or structures of any kind have been erected on said adjacent lands, in whole or in part, except a certain excavation alleged to be for a basement for an hotel, although more than one year has elapsed since said purchase, and no steps have been taken by plaintiff to cause said improvements, or any of them, to be made on said adjacent lands, although he has ever since remained and still remains the owner and holder thereof. (8) That said lands were at the date of said purchase and now are irrigable lands, and without water-rights appurtenant, or water for use in irrigation, are of little value and worth less than $5,000; that water-rights appurtenant to such lands, for purposes of irrigation, would be valuable, and worth $6,000 and more; that shares of stock in said Bear Valley Land & Water Company, representing twelve miners' inches of water, would be of great value, to-wit, of the value of $5,000 and more; that the erection and construction of said hotel buildings and private dwellings, as agreed upon, would enhance the value of said premises $10,000 and more; that, without said improvements on said lands adjacent, the premises so purchased by defendants are worth $10,000 less than with such improvements made as represented. (9) Defendants are informed and believe, and therefore allege the fact to be, that said written instruments, styled 'water certificates,' issued by said corporation to defendants, were and are issued without authority of law and are void; that said corporation had no authority in law to issue the same, and the issuance of the same conveyed and transferred no rights as stockholders or otherwise to defendants; that the same are not shares of stock, and do not transfer or vest in the defendants the privileges or rights of stockholders, and do not convey or vest in defendants twelve miners' inches of water of said corporation, or any water or rights whatsoever, and the same are of no value, and defendants allege that they were ignorant of the true character and value of said written instruments styled 'water certificates' until the commencement of this action, and defendants further allege that plaintiff never transferred, conveyed, or attempted to convey to said defendants any of said water-rights or shares of stock in said Bear Valley Land & Water Company whatever. (10) Defendants allege that the acts, commissions, and representations of plaintiff, above set forth, were done and made by him with intent to defraud, and that he thereby did defraud, defendants of their rights in the premises. (11) Defendants allege, further, that by reason of the acts, omissions, and representations, practices, and fraud of plaintiff, as above set forth, the consideration for said notes in complaint mentioned has wholly failed, and the same were obtained by fraud, and wholly without consideration, and plaintiff should not maintain his action thereon."

The defendants also filed what they denominate "a further answer to complaint, and by way of cross-complaint," in which they allege substantially the same facts alleged in their answer, with only the additional averment that on December 13, 1888, (nearly two months after the commencement of this action,) the defendants tendered to plaintiff a reconveyance of the land and reassignment of the water certificates, and demanded a surrender and cancellation of the notes, and a return of the cash payment of $6,000, all of which was rejected and refused by the plaintiff. The prayer of the cross-complaint is that the notes be canceled, and that defendants have judgment against the plaintiff for the $6,000 paid and interest.

The water certificates and the indorsements thereon are in the following form: "Class A 7,200 certificates. Issue of June 1, 1886. Number 113. Number of certificates, 20. Bear Valley Land and Water Company water certificate. These twenty certificates issued by the Bear Valley Land and Water Company, a corporation, to Rhodes, Mitchell, and Hoopes, for twenty acres, are guaranteed by said company to entitle the holder hereof to receive a continuous flow of one-seventh of an inch of water to each acre of land to which the same shall be devoted, or multiple thereof, as is designated on the face hereof, for the six summer months in each year, for the contract times, beginning under the contracts of this company with the North and South Fork ditches, respectively. The inch mentioned herein is equivalent to a flow of one-fiftieth of a cubic foot per second. The holder of this certificate may elect to accumulate the use of water hereunder in any one or more months of said six months, the aggregate in any one month not to exceed one-fourth of the whole for that year; and the holder is also entitled to his proportion of the six months' winter water accruing under the contracts of the North or South Fork ditches on which it may be used in the proportion which this issue of certificates and those that may be hereafter issued bears to the whole of such benefits. The point of delivery of water used under this certificate shall be at the points designated in the contracts with the North and South Fork ditches, respectively. This issue or award of water is adopted as a method of distribution and of the use of the same to the company's stockholders, in consideration of the covenants contained in the indorsement hereon; and the interest represented by this certificate shall not become appurtenant to or pass by voluntary act or by operation of law with any land upon which the water represented may be used. A transfer hereof shall only be made by surrender of this certificate to the company and the reissuance of a new certificate, and upon the signature of the concurrent contract on the records of the company. J. G. BURT, President. E. A. HOLT, Secretary. [Seal of said Company.] Indorsement: "The holder of this certificate hereby accepts the same on the following conditions: That this certificate shall and is to be held subject to and in accordance with the terms of the contract signed by the holder hereof upon its issuance by the company." The contract mentioned in the indorsement on the certificate, to be signed by the holder, was signed by the defendants on July 7, 1887, and is as follows: "Know all men by these presents, that whereas, the Bear Valley Land and Water Company, a corporation, has this day issued to the undersigned, Rhodes, Mitchell & Hoopes, twenty certificates of said corporation, being certificate No. 113, in consideration of the agreements hereinafter contained, and subject to the conditions hereinafter set forth and contained in said certificate, and the undersigned has received and accepted said water certificates, subject to all such agreements and conditions: Now, therefore, we hereby agree that, in consideration of the issuance of said water certificates to us by said corporation, and in payment for the water which said certificates entitle us to receive each year from said corporation in accordance with the provisions of said certificate, we will, without notice or demand, pay to said corporation annually hereafter, and within thirty days after the first day of January in each year, the sum of $20, being $1 per year on each of said water certificates, such payment to be made at the office of said corporation in the city of San Bernardino, state of California. And if said sum of $20 be not paid to said corporation in full, at the time and in the manner hereinbefore provided, then said certificate No. 113, and all covenants and agreements therein contained, and the water certificates therein referred to, shall become and be null and void, and all rights thereunder shall be forfeited, and shall forever cease and determine, and the foregoing contracts shall be void. And whenever said certificate No. 113 shall be surrendered to and canceled by said corporation, then the foregoing contract shall be void. In witness whereof we have hereunto set our hands and seals this 7th day of July, A. D. 1887. RHODES, MITCHELL & HOOPES. By G. H. CONDEE, Agent." The court found for the plaintiff on all the issues, and decreed a sale of the mortgaged property in the usual form, and the defendants appeal from the final decree, and from an order denying their motion for new trial.

1. The appellants contend that the findings which negative the fraudulent misrepresentations charged in the answer and cross-complaint are not justified by the evidence. It will be observed that the averments are that the plaintiff made the false and fraudulent representations by his agent. The evidence shows that the alleged agent was C. P. Condee, whose authority, if he had authority, extended no further than to find a purchaser of the property at a fixed price, and who, in his testimony on the trial, denied that he ever represented that water was piped or conducted to or upon the land sold; or that the right to the use of any water was appurtenant to the land otherwise than expressed in said water certificates; or that plaintiff would assign to defendants any shares of stock in the water company corporation other than said water certificates, though he may have called those certificates water stock; or that any contract for the erection of an hotel or other buildings had been made by the plaintiff. Such representations as were made by Condee before the sale were first made to the defendant Rhodes (who was acting for the other defendants) at a place on the land where Condee is charged with having falsely represented that the water was then piped, yet there was nothing on the land to indicate that there was either pipe or water anywhere upon it. The water certificates, in the form above set out, were indorsed by the plaintiff, and delivered to the defendants' agent with deed for the land, on June 11, 1887, and received by defendants on July 11, 1887. It is admitted that defendants knew no water had been piped on the land as early as October, 1887, and the evidence strongly tends to show that the defendant Hoopes must have known the same in July, 1887; yet the defendants made no offer to rescind until December, 1888, about two months after the commencement of this action. There is no evidence nor pretense that the plaintiff personally made any false representation whatever. As the defendant Rhodes testified that he had been in the real-estate business a number of years, and had personally visited and examined the land on two occasions before he made the purchase, it is difficult to understand how he could have been deceived by the alleged representations of Condee as to water being piped on the land at the times he examined it, when he saw no signs of pipes, water, or hydrants, and asked no questions as to where they were; and it is still more difficult to conceive how the defendants could have been deceived as to the purport or nature of the water certificates at the time they accepted those certificates with the deed for the land. Considering these circumstances, which, to some extent, justify the application of the maxim, caveat emptor, in connection with the testimony of Condee, which denies all the material misrepresentations charged, I think the finding that there was no fraud on the part of the plaintiff is justified by the evidence.

2. Appellants contend that the water certificates are void and of no value, because (1) "they were issued gratuitously, and consequently amounted to a fictitious increase of the indebtedness of the company;" and (2) they "represent or evidence a division and withdrawal and payment to the stockholders of a part of the capital stock of the company;" and therefore, to the extent of the value of the water, the consideration for the notes and mortgage failed. There is no pretense that the water company has failed or refused to furnish or deliver the water as per certificates, or has denied its obligation to do so; and the only evidence relating to the matter is to the effect that the water company regards the certificates as valid obligations which it has always been ready and willing to perform; but it is claimed that their invalidity "is stamped upon their face." While I am inclined to the opinion that the certificates are valid for what they purport to be, I think it unnecessary, and certainly not desirable, to decide the question in this case to which the water company is not a party. As counsel claim that the alleged invalidity of the water certificates appears upon their face, and have pointed to no extraneous fact on which it depends or from which it may be inferred, the defendants must have known all the facts touching such invalidity on July 11, 1887, when they personally received the certificates, and were informed by Mr. Condee that he, as their agent, had executed for them the agreement above set forth,—to pay the water company $20 a year on each of the six certificates. It is not denied that Condee was authorized to execute this agreement. Under these circumstances, if the defendants desired to rescind their purchase on the sole ground that the water certificates were void, (and it appears that they had no other ground,) they should have offered to rescind promptly, within a reasonable time. A delay of 17 months, and until 2 months after the commencement of this action, and 38 days after the appearance of the defendant Rhodes, was unreasonable. The other points made by appellants' counsel require no special consideration, as those of them which are not founded upon a misconception of facts have no bearing upon the merits of the case as viewed here. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

IRRIGATION—EASEMENT FOR DITCH—TAX-DEEDS.

1. In an action to enjoin the widening of an irrigation ditch it appeared that the ditch had been maintained prior to 1866, but was then allowed to fill up and be disused until 1874, when defendants opened it to a less capacity than formerly, and so used it until 1884, when plaintiff purchased the land through which it ran. There was no evidence to show who constructed and used the ditch before defendants opened it. Held, that defendants could not, after plaintiff's purchase of the land, increase the ditch to its former capacity.

2. A tax-deed reciting that it is based on an assessment to a certain person "and unknown owners" is void.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county; J. M. WALLING, Judge.

J. W. Cross and P. F. Simonds, for appellants. Chas. W. Kitts, for respondent.

VANCLIFF, C. The sole object of this action is to obtain a perpetual injunction against the defendants, restraining them from enlarging a water-ditch running through plaintiff's land. The case was tried by the court, and as a result of the trial an injunction was granted restraining defendants from enlarging their ditch to a greater capacity than 12 inches in depth, 14 inches in width on the bottom, and 20 inches in width at the top, with a carrying capacity of 123 inches of water, measured under a pressure of 6 inches. Defendants moved for a new trial on two grounds: "(1) That the decision of the court giving judgment for the plaintiff is against law;" and "(2) on account of errors occurring at the trial, and excepted to by the said defendants." The motion was made on a bill of exceptions. The court denied the motion, and defendants appealed from the judgment, and from the order denying their motion.

The findings show that the lands of plaintiff through which the ditch runs consisted of 80 acres, to 40 acres of which he acquired title by patent from the United States on July 20, 1874. The other 40 acres were conveyed to him by the Central Pacific Railroad Company on December 20, 1884, having been patented to the railroad company April 30, 1884. "That prior to 1862 there had been constructed on, over, and across the lands herein described [plaintiff's lands] a ditch known as the 'Camp Far West Ditch.' That the same was used up to the year 1866, at which time the further use of the same was discontinued,—the ditch was allowed to go to ruin, became filled up, and the flumes thereon allowed to rot, fall down, and in places to be carried away by strangers," and was totally unused from 1866 to 1873. That in May or June, 1874, and before plaintiff acquired title to any part of his land, defendants entered upon the ditch, and cleaned it out, and reconstructed it to the size and capacity above stated, viz., 12 inches in depth, 14 inches in width on the bottom, and 20 inches at the top, with a carrying capacity of 123 inches of water, measured under a pressure of 6 inches, and in that condition, and to that capacity only, used and conveyed water through it for irrigating purposes until 1888, when they commenced the enlargement of it complained of, and to enjoin which this action was brought. The defendants' right to the possession and use of the ditch to the full extent and capacity to which they reopened it in 1874 and used it until 1888 is not questioned by the action, nor infringed by the injunction granted. But appellants contend that they are entitled to enlarge it to the size and capacity which it had when originally constructed prior to 1862, and while used prior to 1867. The trial court decided as matter of law that defendants' property in the ditch was only such as they acquired by appropriation, possession, and user prior to 1885,—that is, prior to the conveyance of the land to the plaintiff,—because, as matter of fact, there appeared to be no privity between defendants and the person or persons who originally constructed, owned, and used the ditch prior to 1867. It was not proved, nor was there any evidence tending to prove, who constructed the ditch, or who owned or used it prior to the time, in 1874, when defendants took possession of and reopened it.

For the purpose of proving that they had acquired the title of the original constructors and former owners of the ditch the defendants offered in evidence a tax-deed to defendant Smith, dated September 2, 1875, based upon an alleged assessment therein recited, of "certain property, including the property" described in the deed, made, "between the first Monday of March and the first Monday of July, 1874, to R. M. L. Camden and unknown owners." The property sold for taxes thus assessed is described in the deed as "the property so as aforesaid assessed, situated in said county of Nevada, and described as follows, to-wit: Water right and ditch from Wolf creek to Camp Far West." In connection with this offer defendant Smith testified that there was only one ditch "which starts from Wolf creek and goes to Camp Far West." Plaintiff's counsel objected to the admission of the tax-deed on several grounds, and particularly on the grounds: (1) That the assessment to "Camden and unknown owners," upon which the deed rested, was void; and (2) that defendant was in possession of the ditch from May, 1874, until after the sale thereof for taxes, and therefore it was his duty to pay the taxes. The court sustained the objection, and counsel for defendants excepted; and the principal point made by the appellants is that the court erred in excluding the tax-deed. I think the objection to the deed was properly sustained on the ground that the assessment therein recited was void. Grotefend v. Ults, 53 Cal. 686; Grimm v. O'Connell, 54 Cal. 522; Hearst v. Egglestone, 55 Cal. 366. The bill of exceptions states that "in support of their case the defendants offered testimony tending to show that prior to 1874 said ditch was 2 feet wide on the bottom, with flumes 32 inches in width;" and it does not appear that this testimony was disputed. Upon this counsel for appellants base their point that the decision is against law. But, since defendants failed to connect themselves with the title of the former owners or original constructors, it is immaterial what was the size or capacity of the ditch as originally constructed and used. The defendants are entitled to maintain and use the ditch and flumes on plaintiff's lands to no greater width or depth than they reconstructed and used them between 1878 and 1885. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

DIVORCE — CIVIL MARRIAGE — LEGALITY — EVIDENCE.

1. In a suit for divorce, it appeared that plaintiff and defendant, after the birth of an illegitimate child, entered into an agreement for a present marriage. Plaintiff's mother testified to the agreement, and that defendant asked her to take plaintiff to an adjoining county, and authorized her to introduce her as his wife, and that he said he wanted it kept quiet in the county where he lived. Defendant at no time after the alleged agreement cohabited with plaintiff, though on a few occasions they had sexual intercourse, and he only contributed $70 to the support of plaintiff and the child. There was no evidence that any one knew of the relations between the parties except themselves and plaintiff's mother and sister. Held, that there was not such an assumption of marital rights as could constitute a civil marriage, under Civil Code Cal. § 55, requiring that consent to the marriage must be followed by a mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, and obligations.

2. In such case, no marriage having been shown between plaintiff and defendant, evidence of defendant's marriage to the woman with whom he is charged in the bill as having committed adultery is properly excluded as immaterial.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Monterey county; JOHN K. ALEXANDER, Judge.

H. V. Morehouse, for appellant. Wm. H. Webb, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. Action for divorce. The court below, approving and adopting the special verdict of the jury on this point, found that on May 23, 1886, the plaintiff and defendant entered into a contract of marriage, by which they agreed then and there to a present marriage, and that this contract was followed on their part by a mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, and obligations. The defendant, who is the appellant here, contends that the finding is not justified by the evidence. It appears that the parties first met at a skating-rink in Salinas city, in August, 1885. At their second meeting, which was about a week afterwards, this acquaintance ripened into an act of illicit intercourse, followed by other similar acts at opportune times, until, as a fruit of this relation, the plaintiff gave birth to a child on May 16, 1886. One week thereafter defendant went to see plaintiff at the residence of her sister, where she was stopping. Here the plaintiff met defendant in the parlor alone, and at this meeting the plaintiff testifies that she and defendant agreed upon a present marriage, and that it was to be kept secret in Salinas city, but not elsewhere, and the baby was to be named after him. As stated, no witnesses were present; but plaintiff's mother and sister each testifies that she came into the parlor afterwards, and that defendant then repeated to her the said agreement made with plaintiff in reference to a present marriage, and also said that he wanted plaintiff to go into a neighboring county and live for a while, the mother to go with her. The mother also testified that she was authorized by defendant to introduce plaintiff as his wife, and she did so, "only he wanted it kept quiet, so that it would not get back into the valley. He didn't care about it elsewhere." The plaintiff and her mother then went to the city of San José, and there remained until March following. During this period the defendant called to see her once, remaining from 9 or 10 o'clock in the morning until 1 o'clock in the afternoon. From the time of the alleged contract of marriage until the commencement of this action the plaintiff and defendant never cohabited together,—that is, lived together in the same house,—although upon a few occasions they had sexual intercourse with each other; nor is there any evidence that they were generally reputed to be husband and wife in the community where both lived, and defendant never contributed but $70 to the support of plaintiff and her child. There is nothing to show that, if such relation existed, it was known to any one except the parties, and the mother and sister of plaintiff. It is true, the mother testifies that she introduced plaintiff as the wife of defendant, but she does not name the person to whom such introduction was made, nor does such person or persons give evidence in the case. The defendant himself, in his testimony, denies that he ever agreed to marry plaintiff, and there is other evidence which tends to corroborate him on this point; but, as the finding of the court below was in favor of plaintiff, we have only thought it necessary to give the foregoing general outline of the case, as shown by the testimony offered by her, and upon which the court must necessarily have based its findings. With this general statement of the nature of the evidence, we proceed to consider whether it is sufficient to show the existence of a marriage between the parties.

1. Section 55 of the Civil Code provides: "Marriage is a personal relation arising out of a civil contract, to which the consent of parties capable of making it is necessary. Consent alone will not constitute marriage; it must be followed by a solemnization, or by a mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations." As there is a substantial conflict in the evidence as to the contract or agreement for a present marriage between the plaintiff and defendant, we cannot, under the settled rule here, disturb the finding of the court below on this point. This consent being established, our next inquiry is whether the evidence is sufficient to establish the fact that such consent was followed by a mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations, and in order to answer this it is necessary to first determine what is meant by the words "marital rights, duties, or obligations," as here used. We have no doubt that they refer to such rights, duties, and obligations as arise from the contract of marriage, and constitute its object, and therefore embrace what the parties to such contract mutually agree to perform towards each other and to society. "Marriage is considered in every country as a contract, and may be defined to be a contract according to the form prescribed by the law, by which a man and woman, capable of entering into such a contract, mutually engage with each other to live their whole lives together in the state of union which ought to exist between a husband and his wife." Shelf. Mar. & Div. 1. The mutual agreement of the parties to live together in the professed relation of husband and wife is essential to create a contract of marriage, and the contract, when made, imposes upon the parties to it the obligation to do so, and there can be no assumption or entering upon the discharge of such duty or obligation, as contemplated by section 55 of the Civil Code, without the cohabitation of the parties consenting to a present marriage. And by cohabitation is not meant simply the gratification of the sexual passion, but "to live or dwell together; to have the same habitation, so that where one lives and dwells there does the other live and dwell also." Yardley's Estate, 75 Pa. St. 207. This was in effect so held in Sharon v. Sharon, 79 Cal. 670, 22

Pac. Rep. 20, 181, the court there saying: "The commencement of true and open matrimonial cohabitation under such an agreement is a mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, and obligations, while mere copulation, without such cohabitation, is insufficient." The evidence in this case falls far short of showing that, after the alleged consent to marry, these parties ever assumed the marital rights, duties, or obligations of the marriage relation as we have defined them. There was no cohabitation, such as almost universally accompanies marriage, and nothing to indicate to the community that they had assumed such relation.

2. The defendant offered to prove that he was on September 8, 1887, regularly united in marriage with Nellie Rowe, the woman with whom he is charged in the complaint to have committed adultery, and for this purpose offered to introduce a marriage license in due form, authorizing such marriage, and the certificate of a clergyman, showing its solemnization. These papers were excluded by the court. This ruling was correct. This kind of evidence has been considered sufficient to rebut the presumption of marriage which otherwise would follow from proof of cohabitation and general reputation that such cohabitation was matrimonial in its nature. Case v. Case, 17 Cal. 598; Jones v. Jones, 48 Md. 391. We are not called upon hereto either affirm or dissent from the rule announced in these cases. It is sufficient to say that it does not apply to the facts of this case. There was no proof of cohabitation in this case, and we do not see how the excluded evidence, in connection with the other evidence in the case, could have any legitimate or logical tendency to disprove the statements of witnesses who testified directly to the fact that more than a year previous thereto the defendant agreed to become the husband of the plaintiff. This offered evidence, however, demonstrates the wisdom of the law in requiring an open matrimonial cohabitation of the parties thereto as evidence of marriage, where there is no solemnization, so that those contracting this relation may have some reasonable assurance that its validity, and the legitimacy of their children, will not be overthrown by proof of a prior secret marriage upon the part of either the husband or wife, and of which the other had no notice or suspicion. Judgment and order reversed.

CRIMINAL LAW—BAIL PENDING APPEAL—HABEAS CORPUS.

1. Unless extraordinary circumstances intervene, a person convicted of a felony ought not to be admitted to bail pending appeal.

2. On petition for habeas corpus by one convicted of a felony, for the purpose of ordering that he be admitted to bail, the supreme court will pass on the merits of the petition irrespective of an inflexible rule not to admit any person convicted of a felony to bail, adopted by the trial court, in whose discretion the allowance of bail is placed by Pen. Code Cal. § 1272.

3. On such petition the supreme court will not pass on errors of law committed on trial in which conviction was had.

In bank. Application for habeas corpus.
S. J. Hinas and Frank Short, for petitioner.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an application for the issuance of a writ of habeas corpus for the purpose of ordering that the defendant be admitted to bail pending his appeal. The petition for the writ sets forth that "the petitioner was charged by information, in the superior court of Fresno county, of the crime of murder. That thereafter he was convicted of the offense of manslaughter, and sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for ten years. That a motion for a new trial was denied, and the judge of the trial court issued a certificate of probable cause; and an appeal upon the merits of the case is now pending in this court. That the trial court committed errors of law that appear from the face of the record, and that the evidence at the trial was insufficient to justify a conviction. That the trial court has established a uniform rule that it will not admit any defendant to bail pending appeal, upon conviction for felony." In this class of cases, bail is allowed as a matter of discretion, and not as a matter of right. Section 1272, Pen. Code. In Ex parte Smallman, 54 Cal. 36, this court outlined the general character of facts necessary to exist, upon which to base an exercise of this discretion, and held that, except where circumstances of an extraordinary character had intervened, a person convicted of a felony ought not to be admitted to bail pending an appeal; and to the same effect is Ex parte Marks, 49 Cal. 681, and Ex parte Brown, 68 Cal. 183, 8 Pac. Rep. 829. The petition in this case shows no such circumstances. We cannot, in this proceeding, examine into the alleged errors of law committed by the lower court, and thus prejudice the case before it comes before us upon its merits. The fact that the trial court has adopted an inflexible rule not to admit any defendant to bail who has been convicted of a felony can have no weight with us, however inconsistent such rule may be, when compared with section 1272 of the Penal Code. This court passes upon the merits of the petition as presented to it, and regardless of any action or rule the trial court may have adopted. Application denied.

TRIAL—AMBIGUOUS FINDINGS.

A finding of law "that plaintiff is entitled to judgment, that plaintiff take nothing by this action, but that defendants * * * have judgment against plaintiff for their costs herein," is sufficiently clear to support a judgment for defendants.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WILLIAM T. WALLACE, Judge.

Wm. T. Daggett, for appellant. Wm. M. Pierson and Ben Morgan, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. Plaintiff appeals, and the only point made by him is that the findings do not support the judgment, because, as appellant contends, the court finds as a conclusion of law "that plaintiff is entitled to judgment," while judgment is rendered for defendants. But the whole finding of law from which appellant takes the above quotation is as follows: "That plaintiff is entitled to judgment, that plaintiff take nothing by this action, but that said defendants, Hubert Ward and Annie Ward, have judgment against plaintiff for their costs herein." This roundabout way of expressing the conclusion that plaintiff should take nothing by his action, and that defendants should have judgment against him for costs, was probably the result of inadvertence, or, perhaps, the word "not" was accidentally omitted after the word "is;" but the sentence, as it stands, clearly enough expresses the meaning that plaintiff should take nothing, and that defendants should have judgment against him. The judgment is affirmed, with $100 damages, and the superior court is directed to include that sum of money in the judgment, in addition to other costs.

A proceeding under the insolvent act to declare a debtor insolvent is a special proceeding, and not an action, within the meaning of Civil Code Cal. §§ 2466, 2468, requiring partnerships doing business in the state, under a designation not showing the names of the partners, to file a certificate with the clerk, etc., before they shall be allowed to maintain "an action."

3. A partnership doing business in the state, three of whose members are residents of the state, though the other is a non-resident, is a resident of the state, within the meaning of the insolvent act of California, (1880,) providing for declaring a debtor insolvent on petition of five or more creditors, "residents" of the state. HARRISON, J., dissenting.

4. It is not necessary that the petition in insolvency proceedings state the names of the members of the firms signing the same as creditors.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; JOHN W. ARMSTRONG, Judge.

Johnson, Johnson & Johnson, for appellant. Naphtaly, Friedenrich & Ackerman, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an appeal from an order of the superior court of Sacramento county, adjudging appellant an insolvent debtor upon petition of his creditors. In the lower court a demurrer was interposed, which was overruled. The defendant then answered, setting up, among other things, a failure by the petitioning copartnership firms to make, file, or publish any certificate of their copartnership. Petitioners' demurrer to the answer was sustained, and an amended answer was filed, and the matter was heard upon the petition and amended answer. The demurrer to the petition was properly overruled. The petition sets forth every fact required to be set forth by section 8 of the insolvent act, and in addition alleges that the petitioners are creditors of the said Dennery, and the nature of their respective demands is as follows: "The demand of said G. L. Jones & Co. is for $206.25, United States gold coin, and accrued for goods, wares, and merchandise, sold and delivered at San Francisco aforesaid by them to said respondent, within one year last past, at his request." The claims of the other petitioners are set out in the same manner. We think the foregoing statement sufficient. "Involuntary proceedings in bankruptcy are not in any sense proceedings merely for the collection or security of the particular demand of the petitioning creditors. They are for the benefit of all the creditors. * * * The fact that the petitioning creditor has a provable debt to the requisite amount is necessary to be shown for two purposes only, viz.: First, to show that the alleged debtor occupies that relation; and, second, to show that the petitioner has the requisite qualification to commence the proceeding. Its office is then exhausted, and it has not and is never given any other force or effect." In re Sheehan, 8 N. B. R. 345. The form of the petition in the case at bar is practically the same as found under the United States bankrupt act, and which is designated "Form No. 54." Bump Bankr. (9th Ed.) 933. A creditor who can file a petition for involuntary bankruptcy is one whose demand is provable under the act. Phelps v. Clasen, 3 N. B. R. 87. Section 37 of the insolvent act provides that all debts not payable until a future time may be proved against the estate of the debtor; hence it follows that a creditor may join in the petition, although his demand is not yet due. And for these reasons it does not appear necessary to allege in the petition of insolvency a breach of the insolvent's contract, namely, that the debt is due and unpaid; but, be that as it may, these petitioners each allege a demand against the insolvent, and set out the nature of it, which would seem to be ample to put the insolvent upon his defense. In the case of Campbell v. Judd, (Cal.) 7 Pac. Rep. 804, the court held the petition sufficient, where the facts alleged as to the nature of the demand were much more meager than in the present case. The case of In re Russell, 70 Cal. 132, 11 Pac. Rep. 622, cannot be held to overrule Campbell v. Judd; but, upon the contrary, seems to cite it with approval. The facts alleged in that case were far more meager than were found in Campbell v. Judd, and the petition was clearly fatally defective. The insolvent should have an opportunity to deny and contest the claims of petitioning creditors prior to an adjudication of his insolvency, and it is equally true that he should have notice of the facts on which the claims of indebtedness are based, in order to properly make such contest, and when those facts are stated the requirements of the statute are satisfied, even under the principle laid down in Re Russell, supra. As to whether the facts set out in the petition are sufficient upon which to recover in an action for the indebtedness, it is unnecessary to decide.

As to the point raised by the demurrer, that the petition fails to state the names of the members of the firms petitioning, the facts are to the contrary, and, again, this court has already decided it has no merit. Campbell v. Judd and In re Russell, supra. The demurrer to the answer was properly sustained.

Sections 2436, 2468, Civil Code, providing that partnerships doing business in this state, under a designation not showing the names of the partners in such business, must file a certificate with the clerk, etc., or shall not be allowed to maintain an action, etc., is not applicable to the signers of a petition in involuntary insolvency. A proceeding in insolvency is not an action, as defined by section 22, Code Civil Proc., but is in the nature of a special proceeding, and is included within section 23 of that Code. Section 2468, Civil Code, has been so strictly construed by this court that it has been held not to apply to actions for tort. Ralph v. Lockwood, 61 Cal. 155. It does not by express terms include special proceedings, and the court will not by intentment enlarge the inhibition for the purpose of defeating a remedy to which the party otherwise would be entitled.

It is urged that the California Jewelry Company cannot be a petitioning creditor because one member of the firm resides in Germany. It is a copartnership doing business in this state, and three members of the firm reside here. We have already held that it is not necessary to set out the names of the members composing the firms in order to constitute a valid petition, and not necessary to file the certificate required by the Civil Code in order to give a partnership the right to petition, and the mere non-residence of one of the partners should certainly not defeat the right of the firm to become a petitioning creditor. The firm is regarded as an entity, and when the statute speaks of the petitioners being residents of this state it must be construed with reference to the person who may be a petitioner. A copartnership composed of four persons, as in the case of the California Jewelry Company, must be regarded as a resident, within the meaning of the statute, when its business is carried on in this state, and three of its members are residents of this state. The authorities cited by appellant have been carefully examined, and do not overthrow the foregoing views. Let the judgment be affirmed.

HARRISON, J. I dissent. The right of a court to adjudicate an individual to be insolvent is purely of statutory creation, and can be exercised only in the terms and under the conditions prescribed by the statute. Any attempt to confer the control and management of the estate of one person upon another, against the will of the owner, even for the purpose of subjecting the same to the payment of his liabilities, is an extraordinary interference with the natural right of the individual to the management and control of his property, and can be upheld only by some positive statute authorizing such proceeding. Such power is not to be presumed to exist, nor is its exercise to be sustained by any forced or unusual construction of the terms of a statute, but must find its support in clear and explicit language. Section 8 of the insolvent act of 1880 provides that "an adjudication of insolvency may be made on the petition of five or more creditors, residents of this state, whose debts or demands accrued in this state, and amount in the aggregate to not less than five hundred dollars;" and section 9 provides: "Upon the filing of such creditors' petition the court shall issue an order requiring such debtor to show cause, at a time and place to be fixed by the court, why he should not be adjudged an insolvent debtor; and at the same time, or thereafter, upon good cause shown therefor, said court may make an order forbidding the payment of any of the debts and the delivery of any property belonging to such debtor to him or for his use, or the transfer of any property by him." The court acquires no jurisdiction to take any step or make any order, until after there shall have been filed with it "such" a petition as is prescribed by section 8. One of the essential requisites of this petition is that it be made by five or more creditors "who are residents of this state." Although, for the purpose of making such petition, a partnership is a creditor; within the meaning of this section, such "creditor" is not a resident of this state, unless all the members of the partnership are residents of this state. Neither of the individual members of the partnership is a "creditor" of the insolvent, within the meaning of this statute, but such "creditor" is the partnership made up of all of its members. No action can be maintained against a debtor upon a partnership obligation unless it be brought by all of the partners, and, as the debtor is not liable to an action by either member of the partnership, such member is not his "creditor" for the purpose of making a petition that he be adjudicated an insolvent. The insolvency laws of a state are enacted for the benefit of its own citizens, and are limited in their operation to the citizens of that state. It is in recognition of this principle that the statute above quoted requires that the petitioning creditors shall be residents of this state. But, if it should be held that the petition can be made by partnerships of which some or any of the members are non-residents, this legislation would be for others than residents of this state. Such purpose of the legislature should be specifically declared, rather than that the court should so decide from any uncertain language found in the statute. The fact that the business of the partnership is carried on in this state does not make, or tend to make, the partnership itself a resident of this state, and whether one or any number less than all of its members are non-residents is immaterial, if once it be admitted that it is not essential that all of its members be residents here. It might be, and often is, the case, that the non-resident is the chief member of the partnership, while the resident members, although a majority in number, have but a slight interest in the business, and consequently might not represent a sufficient amount of the debt to bring their interest within the minimum requirement of $500. In the present case the court finds that one of the petitioning creditors was the California Jewelry Company, a partnership consisting of four members, and doing business in this state; and that H. Levison, one of its members, was not a resident of this state at the time the petition was signed, but at "all said times was and is a resident at Hamburg, Germany." The California Jewelry Company was not, therefore, a creditor authorized to sign a petition for the adjudication of the debtor as an insolvent, and, inasmuch as the petition was not signed by five creditors, "residents of this state," it was insufficient to confer any jurisdiction upon the court to adjudicate him an insolvent.

CURRAN v. KENNEDY et al. (No. 13,759.)

ADMINISTRATORS—FAILURE TO ACCOUNT—SUFFICIENCY OF FINDINGS—TIME FOR APPEAL.

1. By the express provisions of Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 939, an exception to a decision, on the ground that it is not supported by the evidence, cannot be reviewed, where the appeal is not taken within 60 days after the rendition of judgment.

2. In an action against the executors of intestate's administrator for his failure to account for a sum received from a certain insurance company on a policy on intestate's life, conceding that it is a material issue whether the company was ever incorporated or had an existence, a finding that intestate had insured with said company, "a corporation formed by special act of congress of said United States," is sufficient.

3. On the issue of the administrator's failure to account for the sum received on the policy, a finding that he, in his capacity as administrator of intestate's estate, and for the use of the estate, received $2,672.25, the proceeds of said policy, and failed to account with the estate for $2,642.25, a portion of said proceeds, is sufficient.

4. A finding that on a certain day letters of administration of intestate's estate were issued by a certain court to "plaintiff herein, that said letters have not since been revoked," is sufficient on the issue that an order of said court was duly given, made, and entered appointing plaintiff administrator of said estate.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WILLIAM T. WALLACE, Judge.

Chas. F. Hanlon, for appellants. James Gartlan, for respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J. The plaintiff, as administrator of the estate of Thomas Cushing, deceased, sues the defendants as executors of the last will and testament of Phillip

Kennedy, deceased, and alleges, in substance, that said Phillip Kennedy, in his life-time, was the duly-appointed administrator of the estate of said Thomas Cushing, deceased, and that said Phillip Kennedy, as such administrator, received $2,670.93 from the National Life Insurance Company of the United States of America, on a policy of insurance upon the life of Thomas Cushing, for which he, said Phillip Kennedy, never accounted to the estate of said Thomas Cushing, and that said Phillip Kennedy died before the completion of his duties as administrator of the said estate of said Thomas Cushing. For a separate and second cause of action plaintiff alleges that said Phillip Kennedy, as administrator of the estate of said Thomas Cushing, received other personal property of the appraised value of $130, for which he never accounted. The complaint was demurred to on various grounds, and the demurrer overruled, and properly overruled, we think. A motion to strike out the amended complaint, and the amendments thereto, was properly denied. Conceding that the objections to questions put to the witness Garness should have been sustained, and that the court erred in overruling them, the error was a harmless one. The witness did not contradict or vary anything contained in the copy of the policy attached to the complaint which the defendants admitted to be a true copy. Whether the court erred in denying the defendants' motion for a nonsuit depends upon the evidence then before the court, and we think there was sufficient to justify the order denying said motion. The appeal was not taken within 60 days after the rendition of the judgment, and the exception to the decision on the ground that it is not supported cannot be reviewed. Code Civil Proc. § 939.

Appellants assign as error the failure of the court to find upon material issues, which are specified as follows: "The court fails to find on the issue on the first cause of action alleged, as to whether or not the alleged insurance company was ever incorporated, or had an existence." Conceding that this was a material issue, which we do not, the court found "that Thomas Cushing, plaintiff's intestate, had insured his life for $3,000 with the National Life Insurance Company of the United States of America, a corporation formed by special act of congress of said United States," which we deem a sufficient finding upon that issue; and we think it a sufficient finding that the said Thomas Cushing entered into a written contract of insurance, as alleged in the complaint and denied in the answer. A copy of the alleged contract was attached to the complaint, which was admitted by the answer to be a true copy of said contract. Upon the issue raised by the allegation and denial, that Phillip Kennedy did not account for the sum received by him upon said insurance policy, the court found that Phillip Kennedy, in his capacity of administrator of the estate of said Cushing, and for the use of said estate, received $2,672.25, the proceeds of said policy, and failed to account with the estate of said Cushing for $2,642.25, a portion of said proceeds. We think this a sufficient finding on that issue. The finding "that on the 9th day of July, 1887, letters of administration of the estate of said Cushing, deceased, were issued by the superior court of Marin county, state of California, to plaintiff herein; that said letters have not since been revoked,"—is a sufficient finding upon the issue raised by the allegation and denial that an order of said court was duly given, made, and entered appointing said plaintiff administrator of said estate of said Thomas Cushing, deceased. Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE V. MERKLE. (No. 20,770.)

HOMICIDE—NEW TRIAL—NEWLY-DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—COMMUNICATIONS OF HUSBAND AND WIFE.

The affidavit of defendant's husband that he, and not defendant, killed deceased; that before the trial he told her of it, but refused to allow her to use the communication; and the affidavit of defendant that this fact was communicated to her by her husband, but that he did not give her permission to use it,—are not per se grounds for a new trial.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Napa county; R. CROUCH, Judge.

Henry Hogan and Wm. Gwynn, for appellant. W. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the People.

DE HAVEN, J. The defendant, Margaret Merkle, was charged by information with the murder of one Joseph Von Wyl. Upon her trial the jury returned a verdict finding her guilty of manslaughter, and she was thereupon sentenced to imprisonment in the state-prison for the term of five years. From this judgment, and an order denying her motion for a new trial, she appeals. The ground upon which appellant chiefly relies for a reversal of this judgment and order is her contention that the court erred in not granting her motion for a new trial on account of newly-discovered evidence, which she was not able to produce upon the trial. The nature of this evidence fully appears in the affidavits of herself and husband, filed in support of her motion in the court below. The affidavit of the husband is in substance that he, and not the appellant, committed the homicide; that he told her of the fact that he had done this before the trial, but that he refused to allow her to use the communication in any way in her defense; and that the fact was not during the trial made known to the attorneys for appellant. This affidavit sets out in minute detail the circumstances under which the affiant claims that he inflicted upon Von Wyl the wound which resulted in his death. The affidavit of appellant is to the effect that before her trial her husband told her that he himself had cut Von Wyl, and then proceeds: "I did not see him cut Von Wyl, and all I know about Von Wyl being cut is from what my husband then said to me, and he has never given me permission to state, in court or otherwise, what he confided to me. I asked him if he did not think it would be best for me to state what he had told me about his cutting Von Wyl, and he replied: 'No, do not state that which I told you; you are innocent of any crime, and they will not convict you.' I know that the law cannot compel a wife to testify against her husband, except with his consent, except in cases of criminal violence upon one by the other. I knew that I was innocent, and I did not believe that I would be convicted, and never told any person what my husband had told me relative to his cutting Von Wyl, and I thought it was my duty not to say anything about it." The husband was a witness upon the trial, and testified with particularity as to what he then claimed took place between himself, Von Wyl, the appellant, and others, immediately preceding the death of Von Wyl. We do not consider the fact that appellant could not have produced upon her trial the evidence set out in the affidavit of her husband without his consent, and that such consent was refused, as one which would conclusively entitle her to a new trial. But, undoubtedly, it was the duty of the court below, in passing upon appellant's motion, to give most careful consideration to these affidavits, and if, when weighed in connection with the evidence given upon the trial, there would be in the mind of the judge a reasonable doubt as to the justice of the verdict, a new trial should have been granted. The supreme court of Mississippi, in Cavanah v. State, 56 Miss. 310, in which case a new trial was asked, upon the ground that a person incompetent to testify upon the trial had since been rendered competent, and that his testimony could be had for the defendant on another trial and might secure the acquittal of the defendant, use this language, which we consider equally applicable here: "We do not consider this as per se a ground for a new trial. It is to be considered. It is an important element, and may be entitled to much weight, as one circumstance in determining a motion for a new trial, but it has no higher character than this. In some cases it would be more persuasive than in others. In no case is it alone sufficient to entitle a party to a new trial. Each case must be determined by its circumstances, and the new trial granted or refused, according to the view taken of the whole evidence, in connection with the evidence of the acquitted party, now made competent as a witness for the other." Granting or refusing a new trial must necessarily rest largely in the discretion of the court in which the trial has been had, and we cannot say from the record before us that the court below failed to exercise a fair and reasonable judgment in denying appellant's motion for a new trial. The court was not bound to accept as true the confession of the husband that he alone committed the homicide, and which exonerated the appellant from the charge against her, so far as his affidavit could do so, but it was the duty of the judge to consider the probability of its truth when placed beside all the other evidence in the case. In thus viewing it, the court must necessarily have passed upon the credibility of Hancock, the main witness for the prosecution, who testified clearly to the fact that appellant had a knife, and with it struck at the deceased, in the encounter immediately preceding his death, and whose testimony, if true, makes it hard to believe that any other than she could have inflicted the wound which caused the death of Von Wyl. In addition to this positive testimony of the witness Hancock, it was proper for the court to consider that no one of the witnesses to the occurrences immediately preceding the death of Von Wyl saw the husband engaged in the conflict at the time when he now says that he cut Von Wyl, and that no one of those present during the altercation and fight, immediately preceding his death, appears to have suspected that the husband did the cutting. It is sufficient, however, to say that the whole question presented by appellant's motion for a new trial necessarily involved a consideration of the credibility of the witnesses who testified upon the trial, and we cannot say that the court erred in its judgment as to the witnesses to whom credit should be given. Judgment and order affirmed.

MECHANICS' LIENS—FINDINGS AS TO TIME—ABANDONMENT OF CONSTRUCTION—FURNISHING MATERIAL—PLEADING—NOTICE OF LIEN—TERMS OF CONTRACT.

1. In an action to enforce a mechanic's lien, the right to which depends on the filing of a notice within a certain number of days after the completion of the building, a finding that the building was completed "on or about" a certain day is insufficient.

2. A finding that parties, after commencing the construction of a building, abandoned the construction, is insufficient, where it appears that such abandonment was only on their conveyance of the property, and there is no finding that their grantee abandoned the construction.

3. Conceding that a notice of lien attached to a complaint and marked as an exhibit may, by reference, be made part of a complaint, and treated as a sufficient averment of the terms and conditions of the contract, by an allegation that the materials were furnished on the terms and conditions therein set forth, there must still be a direct allegation in the complaint that the materials were furnished to be used in the construction of the building on which the lien is claimed.

4. The allegation of the notice of lien that it was "agreed that the price of all materials furnished * * * should be due on the delivery of the same" is a sufficient statement of the terms of the contract.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; W. W. Cross, Judge.

O. L. Abbott, for appellants. N. O. Bradley and G. E. Lawrence, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is an action to foreclose a material-man's lien. It is alleged in the complaint that the barn and corral mentioned in the notice of lien were completed on the 25th day of November, 1889, and that the store-room had not been completed because the defendants had abandoned the work, and did not intend to complete it. The defendants denied that the barn, or corral, was completed at any time subsequent to November 22, 1889, and alleged that the store-room was completed before said date. The court failed to find on the issues thus raised. The only finding on these issues is as follows: "That said shed and store-room were completed on or about the 22d day of November, 1889, and on or about the 27th day of November, 1889, said defendants D. L. and N. B. Wright commenced the construction of said store-room building; * * * that on the 6th day of December, 1889, said defendants D. L. and N. B. Wright sold and transferred to said defendant E. E. Giddings all of said real property above described, and thereupon said defendants D. L. and N. B. Wright abandoned their intention to complete said store-room." Inasmuch as the notice of lien was not filed until December 23, 1889,—31 days after the time when defendants claim the buildings were completed,—the exact date of the completion of the buildings is a material fact to be determined by the court below. "On or about the 22d day of November, 1889," is too indefinite and uncertain. "On or about" is a relative term. It is sufficiently definite in certain connections, but in cases of this kind, where the right of a person depends upon his doing a particular thing within a definite number of days after a certain event, it is necessary for him to allege and prove that the acts were performed within the time required by law. An allegation that the plaintiff had filed his notice of lien "on or about" a certain day would not be good, and a finding in those words is equally insufficient.

The court found that D. L. and N. B. Wright had abandoned the construction of the store-room. This would have been sufficient if they had continued to own the property, but it appears that they conveyed to Giddings, and it does not appear whether the latter had or had not completed or abandoned the construction of the building.

There is no allegation in the complaint that the materials were furnished for or to be used upon the property sought to be charged with the lien. It is not enough to allege that the materials were furnished by plaintiff, and actually used by defendants in the construction of the building. Bottomly v. Grace Church, 2 Cal. 90; Houghton v. Blake, 5 Cal. 240; Holmes v. Richet, 56 Cal. 310. There is an allegation in the complaint that "the materials were furnished upon the terms and conditions set forth in plaintiff's notice of lien hereto attached, marked 'Exhibit A,' which is hereby referred to and made a part hereof;" but, conceding that an exhibit of this kind may be thus made a part of the complaint, and treated as a sufficient averment of the terms and conditions of the contract, there should be a direct allegation in the complaint that the materials were furnished to be used in the construction of the building or structure upon which the lien is claimed.

The demurrer of Giddings pointed out the particular defect and uncertainty referred to, and should have been sustained. The complaint refers to the exhibit, and makes it a part of the pleading, simply for the purpose of showing the terms and conditions of the sale to defendants, viz., the price of the materials, and when payable.

We think that the notice of lien is sufficient in form and substance, and, if filed in time, would support a judgment in favor of the plaintiff. Tredinnick v. Mining Co., 72 Cal. 80, 13 Pac. Rep. 152. It states it was "agreed that the price of all materials furnished by said firm of Cohn & Co. should be due on the delivery of the same." In Hooper v. Flood, 54 Cal. 221, the notice of lien under consideration stated simply that the terms and conditions of the contract "are and were cash." The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial, with directions to sustain the demurrer to the complaint, and to allow the plaintiff a reasonable time in which to amend, and the defendant a reasonable time in which to answer.

SMITH v. HILL et al. (No. 13,853.)

TOWN-SITE LANDS—EXISTING MINES—CONVEYANCE TO COUNTY JUDGE—CHANGE IN COURTS.

1. Under Rev. St. U. S. § 2392, providing that "no title shall be acquired" under the provisions relating to town-sites, and the sale of lands therein, "to any mine of gold, silver, cinnabar, or copper, or to any valid mining claim or possession held under existing laws," the grantee of such lands cannot be deprived thereof because of the discovery of minerals in them subsequent to the grant, but there must be at the time of the grant a paying mine known to exist, or one which there is good reason to believe exists.

2. Under Const. Cal. art. 6, §§ 5, 6, (St. 1880, pp. 2, 23,) making the superior courts the successors to the county courts, and clothing the judges of the superior courts with the powers formerly exercised by the county judges, where land was patented to the county judge under the town-site act, to be held in trust for the use and benefit of the inhabitants of a town, the superior court judge who succeeds him is the proper person to convey the land, as the trust is an official one.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Placer county; J. M. WALLING, Judge.

Wallace & Prewett and D. W. Spear, for appellants. John M. Fulweller, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is an action to quiet title. The answer denies that the plaintiff is the owner or ever was entitled to the possession of any lands in block 1, except as a miner under the mining laws of the United States, and avers that any right he ever had was lost by reason of his failure to comply with the provisions of section 2324 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; alleges that defendant Belle Hill is the owner and entitled to the possession of the property. In further defense, the defendants alleged that the lands in controversy are part of section 10, township 12 N., range 8 E., Mt. Diablo base and meridian, and are, and for 20 years last past have been, mineral lands; that in 1871 the lands were, and ever since have been, generally and well known to contain, and did in fact contain, a valuable mine of gold-bearing quartz, and since said year have been worked as such under valid mining locations, and large quantities of gold have been from time to time extracted therefrom; that on June 1, 1887, and while the lands were open to location as public mineral lands, the defendant Belle Hill duly located the mine and ground as a quartz mining claim by posting a notice in due form, and filing a copy thereof in the office of the county recorder, as required by the mining customs of the district; that she took possession under her said location, and has ever since, and for more than five years last past, held the same, and has complied with the provisions of said section 2324. The court found that on April 15, 1879, a patent was issued to J. I. Fitch, county judge of Placer county, for the lands in controversy, among others, to be held by him in trust for the use and benefit of the inhabitants of the town of Auburn; that thereafter the lands were surveyed and platted in blocks and lots, and the lands were described therein as lot 2, block 1, in N. W. ¼ of said section 10, and were designated as surveyed to and claimed by M. Dodsworth, (plaintiff's grantor;) that at the time of the issuance of the patent to said county judge there was no mine of gold, silver, cinnabar, or copper therein, or any valid mining claim or possession; that on June 8, 1881, B. F. Myres, judge of the superior court of the county of Placer, a successor of said Fitch, conveyed the land to said Dodsworth, and at that time there was no such mine or mining claim thereon; that on April 18, 1888, said Dodsworth conveyed to plaintiff; that on January 1, 1887, defendant Belle Hill posted a notice of location on the lands as mining lands, and on September 29, 1888, posted an amended notice claiming the lands as mining lands, copies of which were recorded; that plaintiff and his grantors held the possession of the lands, claiming the same under the town-site patent and the deed from Judge Myres, from April 15, 1879, until the 1st day of January, 1887; that defendants have no claim to the lands other than through the location and improvement of the land under the mining locations referred to. The court rendered judgment for the plaintiff. The defendants' motion for a new trial was denied, and they have appealed.

Appellants contend that the lands contained a mine of gold at the time they were patented to Judge Fitch, and therefore no title passed to Dodsworth. In support of this contention, they cite section 2392 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. That section reads as follows: "No title shall be acquired, under the foregoing provisions of this chapter, to any mine of gold, silver, cinnabar, or copper, or to any valid mining claim or possession held under existing laws." The evidence shows that from 1872 to 1874

some mining was done on the land, but there is nothing to show that on April 15, 1879, when the patent was issued, the land was regarded as valuable for mining purposes. Long prior to that time mining on the land had ceased because it would not pay. The mine appeared to be worked out. As the land was not known to be mineral land at the time of the issuance of the patent, and as there was no good reason to believe at that time that the land contained any mine of gold, silver, cinnabar, or copper which would pay to work, it is unnecessary to consider whether the evidence shows the subsequent discovery of a valuable mine on the lands. The term, "mine of gold, silver, cinnabar, or copper," as used in the exception found in the act, and in the reservation of the patent, means a paying mine known to exist at the time of the grant to the county judge, or one which there was good reason to believe then existed. A similar question was presented in Francœur v. Newhouse, 40 Fed. Rep. 618, 43 Fed. Rep. 236. In that case Judge SAWYER held that where a grant to a railroad excepts mineral lands, the term "mineral lands" means land known to be mineral land when the grant took effect, or which there was then good reason to believe was mineral land. And in a town-site case recently decided by the supreme court of the United States, it was held that the grantee of the county judge could not be deprived of the lands because of the discovery of minerals in them subsequent to the grant. Justice FIELD, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "It is true the language of the Revised Statutes touching the acquisition of title to mineral lands within the limits of town-sites is very broad. The declaration that 'no title shall be acquired,' under the provisions relating to such town-sites and the sale of lands therein, 'to any mine of gold, silver, cinnabar, or copper, or to any valid mining claim or possession held under existing laws,' would seem on first impression to constitute a reservation of such mines in the land sold, and of mining claims on them, to the United States; but such is not the necessary meaning of the terms used. In strictness they import only that the provisions by which the title to the land in such town-sites is transferred shall not be the means of passing a title also to mines of gold, silver, cinnabar, or copper in the land, or to valid mining claims or possessions thereon. They are to be read in connection with the clause protecting existing rights to mineral veins, and with the qualification uniformly accompanying exceptions in acts of congress of mineral lands from grant or sale. Thus read, they must be held, we think, merely to prohibit the passage of title under the provisions of the town-site laws to mines of gold, silver, cinnabar, or copper, which are known to exist, on the issue of the town-site patent, and to mining claims and mining possessions, in respect to which such proceedings have been taken, under the law or the custom of miners, as to render them valid, creating a property right in the holder, and not to prohibit the acquisition for all time of mines which then lay buried unknown in the depths of the earth. The exceptions of mineral lands from pre-emption and settlement, and from grants to states for universities and schools, for the construction of public buildings, and in aid of railroads and other works of internal improvement, are not held to exclude all lands in which minerals may be found, but only those where the mineral is in sufficient quantity to add to their richness, and to justify expenditure for its extraction, and known to be so at the date of the grant. There are vast tracts of country in the mining states which contain precious metals in small quantities, but not to a sufficient extent to justify the expense of their exploitation. It is not to such lands that the term 'mineral,' in the sense of this statute, is applicable. * * * In connection with these views it is to be borne in mind also that the object of the town-site act was to afford relief to the inhabitants of cities and towns upon the public lands, by giving title to the lands occupied by them, and thus induce them to erect suitable buildings for residence and business. Under such protection, many towns have grown up on lands which, previously to the patent, were part of the public domain of the United States, with buildings of great value for residence, trade, and manufactures. It would in many instances be a great impediment to the progress of such towns if the titles to the lots occupied by their inhabitants were subject to be overthrown by a subsequent discovery of mineral deposits upon their surface. If their title would not protect them against a discovery of mines in them, neither would it protect them against the invasion of their property for the purpose of exploring for mines. The temptation to such exploration would be according to the suspected extent of the minerals, and, being thus subject to indiscriminate invasion, the land would be to one having the title poor and valueless, just in proportion to the supposed richness and abundance of its products. We do not think that any such results were contemplated by the act of congress, or that any construction should be given to the provision in question which could lead to such results. Our conclusion, as already substantially stated, is that congress only intended to preserve existing rights to known mines of gold, silver, cinnabar, or copper, and to known mining claims and possessions, against any assertion of title to them by virtue of the conveyances received under the town-site act, and not to leave the titles of purchasers on the town-sites to be disturbed by future discoveries." Davis v. Wiebold, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 628, (filed April 6, 1891.)

It is claimed by appellants that Judge Myres had no authority to convey the land to plaintiff, because the constitution of 1879 abolished the county court and the office of county judge; that the superior judge could not lawfully convey the property to plaintiff without express legislation authorizing him to do so. We do not think this contention is sound. Under the constitution and laws of this state, the superior courts are the successors of the county courts which existed prior to 1879. Sections 5, 6, art. 6, Const.; St. 1880, pp. 2, 23. The judges of the superior courts are clothed with all the powers formerly exercised by the county judges, and as the trust created by the patent to Fitch was an official trust, and in no sense a personal one, Judge Myres became the successor of the county judge, and as such was authorized to convey the lot. Supervisors v. Railroad Co., 24 Wis. 126; Whittlesey v. Hoppenyan, (Wis.) 39 N. W. Rep. 355.

There is no evidence of any valid mining claim or possession at the time of the grant to Dodsworth, and, as it was not known to be mineral land, it was not "public mineral land" when the defendant Belle Hill located thereon. Deffenback v. Hawke, 115 U. S. 392, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 95. The court did not err in excluding Exhibits A and B. They were clearly incompetent and immaterial evidence. Although the appellants' specifications of insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings are not set forth with particularity or in proper form, we have disregarded the objection made by respondent, and considered all of the points made by appellants. The judgment and order are affirmed.

MAYRHOFER v. BOARD OF EDUCATION et al.

MECHANICS' LIENS—SCHOOL BUILDINGS.

Const. Cal. art. 20, § 15, gives materialmen a lien upon the "property" to which they have furnished material, and Code Civil Proc. § 1183, grants them a lien upon "any building" to which they have furnished material; but Const. art. 11, § 18, prohibits school-districts from incurring indebtedness exceeding the annual revenue provided therefor, unless provision shall be previously made for the payment thereof by taxation. Held, that a public school-house is not subject to the mechanic's lien laws.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; W. L. PIERCE, Judge.

John M. Lucas, for appellant. J. P. Goodwin, Wellborn, Parker & Stevens, and Watson & Hicks, for respondents.

TEMPLE, C. This action was brought to foreclose a lien for materials furnished to a subcontractor for the building of a public school-house. Final judgment was entered upon demurrer to the complaint, and plaintiff appeals from the judgment. Whether the laws of this state give to mechanics and material-men the right to have a lien upon such buildings is the only question necessary to consider upon this appeal. Section 15, art. 20, of the constitution, provides: "Mechanics, material-men, artisans, and laborers of every class shall have a lien upon the property upon which they have bestowed labor or furnished material for the value of such labor done and material furnished; and the legislature shall provide, by law, for the speedy and efficient enforcement of such liens." Section 1183, Code Civil Proc., enacts that mechanics and material-men shall have a lien for labor or material used in the construction of any building or other structure. The following sections prescribe the procedure and the effects of certain acts. The claim is made that public buildings are included both in the word "property" used in the constitution, and in the phrase "any building" used in the Code, and therefore it must necessarily follow that mechanics and material-men are by these provisions given a right to a lien upon such buildings. But this ignores the rule of statutory construction, that the state is not bound by general words in a statute which would operate to trench upon its sovereign rights, injuriously affect its capacity to perform its functions, or establish a right of action against it. Says Mr. Justice STORY in U. S. v. Hoar, 2 Mason, 314: "In general, acts of the legislature are meant to regulate and direct the acts and rights of citizens; and in most cases the reasoning applicable to them applies with very different, and often contrary, force to the government itself. It appears to me, therefore, to be a safe rule, founded in the principles of the common law, that the general words of a statute ought not to include the government or affect its rights, unless that construction be clear and indisputable upon the text of the act." To the same effect are the following cases: Swearingen v. U. S., 11 Gill. & J. 373; Com. v. Baldwin, 1 Watt, 54; Bank v. U. S. 19 Wall. 239; U. S. v. Davis, 3 McLean, 464; U. S. v. Williams, 5 McLean, 133; Com. v. Johnson, 6 Pa. St. 136; Josselyn v. Stone, 28 Miss. 753; People v. Herklimer, 4 Cow. 345; and a great many others. It is misleading to say that this construction is adopted on the ground of public policy. The import of the language is not limited, because it would be against public policy to give to the words their natural effect, but because, in view of familiar rules of construction, a different intent is manifested in the language used. The government was created and shaped by the constitution. It is not an end in itself, but a mere instrumentality for public service. Its powers and functions exist only for the people. One of its functions is to enact laws for the government of the inhabitants within its limits, thereby affording them protection and advancing their general welfare. The property it holds is simply to enable it to perform the service required of it. It is as much devoted to public use as are the streets and highways, though in a different way, and it is generally held by a different tenure. Instead of being the natural and obvious conclusion that a general law providing remedies for private individuals was intended to enable a creditor of the state to seize this property for the satisfaction of his debt, it would be a most unnatural inference. The constitution has itself provided, as the only means which the state has for the payment of its debts, the exercise of the sovereign power of taxation. And for each political subdivision the rule is the same. These revenues are divided into specific funds, and one furnishing labor or materials to the state knows to what he must look for payment. He becomes a creditor of a specific fund, and has no rights except with reference to such fund. The law conferring the right to a mechanic's lien implies a right of action to enforce it. One cannot sue the state, unless expressly authorized by statute, and this principle is embodied in our constitution. General statutes creating new remedies for individuals have never been held to authorize such suits. The former constitution of the state provided: "All property in the state shall be taxed in proportion to its value." There was no express limitation upon the meaning of the words used, and unquestionably in their natural import they included public property. It was held that such construction would be inconsistent with the purposes of taxation, (People v. Doe, 36 Cal. 220,) and it is strange that such a case ever arose. The inconsistency there was perhaps a little more obvious than here, but the principle is the same, and the claim here is really as inconsistent as there with the theory, plan, and policy of the government with reference to its revenues and its tenure of the property it holds for public service.

The public policy appealed to is laid down in the constitution itself. It is a constitutional policy. The section under consideration on its face purports to be a Code provision providing a remedy by individuals against individuals. The constitutional policy referred to but emphasizes the rule of construction which would have been sufficient of itself. And the position is firmly fixed beyond cavil by section 18, art. 11, which prohibits school districts from incurring indebtedness exceeding the annual revenue provided for it, unless before the indebtedness is incurred provision shall be made for the payment of the debt by taxation. Could there be a plainer declaration that all indebtedness shall be paid from the revenue provided by law? Supposing, therefore, as we must, that the section in the constitution was framed in view of the well-known rule of construction, and in the same instrument in which are the other provisions alluded to, and that it omits to mention public buildings, it is manifest from the language itself that they are not included. It would follow that the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: FITZGERALD, C.; FOOTE, C.

ELTZROTH v. RYAN et al. (No. 13,723.)

PUBLIC LAND—PATENTS—QUIETING TITLE—EVIDENCE—RECORDS—EXCEPTIONS—PRACTICE.

1. Receipt by the patentee of a patent for land issued to him by the United States is not necessary to pass title.

2. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1919, provides that a public record of a private writing may be proved by a certified copy, and section 1951 provides that the certified copy of the record of a conveyance may be read in evidence with like effect as the original, on proof by affidavit or otherwise that the original is not in possession or under control of the party producing the copy. Held, that it is not necessary to prove the loss of an original patent before introducing a certified copy thereof in evidence.

3. If it were necessary for a patentee to prove the loss of the original patent before introducing a certified copy in evidence, his testimony that he never received the original, and did not know what had become of it, would be sufficient.

4. In an action to quiet title to land, where plaintiff proves his title, it is not incumbent on him to show that he has not parted with it, or that he is entitled to possession.

5. It is no defense to an action to quiet title to land that a patent under which plaintiff derived title was not recorded until after the action was commenced.

6. In such action, where defendant relies for his title on a constable's sale under execution on a judgment of a justice of the peace, he must show affirmatively that the justice had jurisdiction to render the judgment.

7. The supreme court cannot consider an exception on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence, unless the particulars wherein it is insufficient are specified, as required by Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 648.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; WILLIAM W. CROSS, Judge.

Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1919, provides that "a public record of a private writing may be proved by the original record, or by a copy thereof, certified by the legal keeper of the record." Section 1951 provides that "every instrument conveying or affecting real property, acknowledged or proved, and certified as provided in the Civil Code, may, with the certificate of acknowledgment or proof, be read in evidence, in an action or proceeding, without further proof; and a certified copy of the record of such conveyance or instrument thus acknowledged or proved may also be read in evidence with like effect as the original, on proof, by affidavit or otherwise, that the original is not in the possession or under the control of the party producing the certified copy." Section 648 provides that "when the exception is to the verdict or decision, upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify it, the objection must specify the particulars in which such evidence is alleged to be insufficient."

Welles Whitmore, (David Stoddart, of counsel,) for appellants. Chas. G. Lamberson, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an action to quiet title to a quarter section of land in Tulare county. The complaint was filed March 13, 1888, and is in the usual form in such cases. Defendant Ryan did not appear. Defendant Wythe appeared, and by his answer denied all the averments of the complaint, and alleged that each of the defendants had a legal title and interest in the land and premises in question. At the trial the plaintiff was a witness, and testified that he purchased the quarter section in controversy from the United States, but that he never received the patent for it, and did not know what became of the original patent. He further testified, on cross-examination, that he lived in Tulare county during the year 1874, and then left, and did not return to the county until March, 1888. He then introduced in evidence the copy of a United States patent, dated April 15, 1875, conveying to him the said quarter section. Attached to the copy was a certificate of the acting commissioner of the general land-office at Washington, under seal, certifying "that the annexed copy of patent in favor of David Eltzroth, founded on Visalla, Cal., cash entry No. 2,212, is a true and literal exemplification from the record in this office." The copy was recorded in the recorder's office of Tulare county on June 27, 1888. The defendant objected to the copy of the patent being received in evidence, on the ground that the loss of the original had not been accounted for; that it appeared from the testimony that the plaintiff never received a patent for the land; and that it appeared upon its face to have been recorded in the county after the action was commenced. The court overruled the objection, and the defendant reserved an exception. The plaintiff then rested his case, and the defendant moved for a nonsuit, on the ground that the plaintiff had failed to make out a case, in this: That his title, if any, appeared to have been acquired subsequent to the commencement of the action; that it appeared from the evidence that he had never received a patent for the land; and that it did not appear that he was ever entitled to the possession thereof. The motion was denied, and an exception taken. To make out his case the defendant attempted to show that he had acquired title to the quarter section by and through a constable's sale thereof to his grantors, under an execution issued on a judgment rendered against the plaintiff by a justice of the peace on the 21st day of October, 1875. To this end he offered in evidence the constable's certificate of sale and deed, in proper form, and conveyances from the grantees named therein to himself. He then proved that the plaintiff named in the judgment commenced an action against the plaintiff herein in the justice's court in 1875, and obtained a judgment therein for $76 and costs, and that the record of the action was destroyed by fire, in the year 1886. The justice of the peace, in whose court the action was commenced, testifies: "I remember that there was a judgment rendered in that action in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant. I know that there was an execution issued on that judgment against the property of the defendant, but I cannot describe the land sold." The plaintiff objected to the certificate of sale and deeds being received in evidence, upon the ground that they were irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent, for the reason that no foundation had been laid for their introduction. The court sustained the objection, and the defendant duly excepted to the ruling. The case was thereupon submitted for decision, and the court made its findings, and gave judgment for the plaintiff. In due time the defendant moved for a new trial upon a bill of exceptions. The motion was denied, and he then appealed from the judgment and order.

The rulings complained of were clearly right. It was not necessary that the plaintiff should have received and accepted the patent in order to vest in him title to the land granted. It is settled law that title by patent from the United States is title by record, and the delivery of the instrument to the patentee is not, as in a conveyance by a private person, essential to pass the title. U. S. v. Schurz, 102 U. S. 378; Donner v. Palmer, 31 Cal. 514; Chipley v. Farris, 45 Cal. 589; Miller v. Ellis, 51 Cal. 73; Cruz v. Martinez, 53 Cal. 239. It was not necessary that the plaintiff prove the loss of the original patent before he could introduce the copy in evidence. Sections 1919, 1951, Code Civil Proc. But, if such proof had been necessary, we think the plaintiff's testimony that he never received the patent, and did not know what had become of it, quite sufficient. And it was not necessary that the plaintiff prove that he had not parted with his title, or that he was entitled to the possession of the land. A status once established is presumed by the law to remain until the contrary appears. Kidder v. Stevens, 60 Cal. 414. The objection that the copy was not recorded until after the action was commenced was frivolous. It was entirely immaterial, for the purposes of the case, whether the copy had been recorded or not.

As to the defense. A justice's court is an inferior court, and its jurisdiction must be shown affirmatively by a party relying upon, or claiming any right under, its judgments. Jolley v. Foltz, 34 Cal. 321; Kane v. Desmond, 63 Cal. 464. Here there was no proof that the defendant in the justice's court case relied upon was ever served with summons, or voluntarily appeared therein. It must be presumed, therefore, that the justice had no jurisdiction to render the judgment which he testified was rendered in his court, and that the same was void. This being so, the purchasers at the constable's sale acquired no interest in the property bid in by them. The appellant contends that the findings of the court were not justified by the evidence, and that the judgment should therefore be reversed. But the bill of exceptions brought up in the record contains no specifications of particulars in which the evidence is alleged to be insufficient to justify the findings, and this point cannot therefore be considered. Section 648, Code Civil Proc. It follows that the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed, and we so advise.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; FOOTE, C.

MANDAMUS TO BOARD OF ELECTION COMMISSIONERS.

Under the repeated decisions of the supreme court of California, a writ of mandate will not issue to compel the registrar and board of election commissioners of the city and county of San Francisco to count the votes cast in certain precincts for candidates for the offices of supervisor and police commissioner, to declare the result, and to issue certificates of election accordingly.

In bank. Application for mandamus.
N. S. Wirt, for petitioners. Davis Louderback, for respondents.

PATERSON, J. This is an application for a writ of mandate to compel the respondents, the registrar and board of election commissioners, to count the votes in certain precincts of the city and county of San Francisco alleged to have been cast for candidates to fill the office of supervisor for the first board of supervisors, and also those cast for candidates for the office of police commissioner. The first 12 petitioners named herein were candidates for the office of supervisor, and the last 8 named were candidates for the office of police commissioner. It is alleged that every one of the petitioners received about 1,500 votes, and was elected to the office for which he was a candidate, there being no opposing candidate; and petitioners ask that the respondents be required, after counting the votes, to declare the result, and to issue certificates of election accordingly. The questions argued by counsel for petitioners are not new. They may not have been presented so forcibly or with as great perspicuity before, but they have been determined adversely to the contentions of the petitioners after careful consideration of the constitutional and statutory provisions germane to the subject, and we feel constrained to adhere to the construction heretofore adopted. The contention of petitioners who claim to have been elected as members of the first board of supervisors has been settled adversely to them by the decisions in Desmond v. Dunn, 55 Cal. 248, 249, and People v. Board, 3 Pac. Rep. 412; and the claim of the others, by the decisions in Staudé v. Board, 61 Cal. 313; Heinlen v. Sullivan, 64 Cal. 378, 1 Pac. Rep. 158; and People v. Hammond, 66 Cal. 655, 6 Pac. Rep. 741. The effect which a decision overruling those cases would have upon municipal proceedings for over 10 years past is so apparent that it is unnecessary for us to point out the reason why we should adhere to the decisions referred to, at least so far as the board of supervisors is concerned, even though we should believe that they were based upon an erroneous construction of the provisions involved; and, although the rule applies with less force to the case of the police commissioners, no good reason has been shown why the decisions heretofore rendered should be departed from. If the principle is wrong, or the system works unsatisfactorily, the remedy remains with the people. Writ denied.

APPEAL—FAILURE TO FILE TRANSCRIPT.

An appeal will be dismissed if the transcript is not filed within the time prescribed by rule of court.

In bank. Motion to dismiss appeal.

Jos. M. Kinley, for appellant. W. C. Belcher, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. It appears by the certificate of the county clerk of the city and county of San Francisco that appellant filed her notice of appeal upon the 5th day of January, 1891, and her undertaking on appeal upon the 10th day of the same month. That the bill of exceptions was settled upon the 2d day of January, 1891, and was filed the day following. A motion to dismiss the appeal was made April 15, 1891, upon the ground that no transcript had been filed within the time prescribed by the rules of this court. Although the time to file the transcript in the cause had long since gone by at the hearing of this motion, still no transcript was on file at that time, and no cause shown for such failure to file the same.

Let the appeal be dismissed.

INNKEEPERS—REFUSAL OF ENTERTAINMENT—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. In an action against an innkeeper for refusal to entertain plaintiff, an invalid, thereby preventing him from receiving the benefit of the water of a mineral spring appurtenant to the hotel, from which it is alleged that he had derived much benefit theretofore, it is not error to allow plaintiff to testify that deprivation of the water had injured his health.

2. Where there is no evidence that defendants refused to allow plaintiff the use of the water, it is not error to refuse defendants' request to instruct that they were not bound to furnish such water.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1.

Appeal from superior court, Lake county; R. J. HUDSON, Judge.

Marshall Arnold, for appellants. R. W. Crump, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. Appeal from judgment and order denying defendants' motion for a new trial. Action for damages for refusal to entertain plaintiff at defendants' hotel, thereby preventing him from receiving the benefit of Bartlett Springs water. It appears that defendants were proprietors of Bartlett Springs, in Lake county, and of a hotel at the springs, for the accommodation of guests, who resorted there in great numbers for the water, which was the principal inducement for guests to visit the hotel. The plaintiff was an invalid, and had on several occasions been entertained at the hotel and benefited by the water. On the 9th day of June, 1888, he again requested entertainment as a guest. There was room for his accommodation. He was a fit and proper person, and had ample means of payment. The manager, one of the proprietors, being present, refused him entertainment, saying: "I'll teach you how to get up a petition to have me removed." It is claimed here that the court erred in allowing plaintiff to testify that preventing him from using the water had a very injurious effect upon his health. Under the circumstances, however, this amounted to no more than the previous statement that the water had benefited him; that he was an invalid, and had visited the springs hoping to be benefited again. The jury could not have been misled, for it could have had no other meaning. The complaint avers, and the evidence shows, that the water was the principal inducement to visitors of the hotel, and was the sole inducement to plaintiff. Necessarily, to be deprived of it would be an injury in his estimation. Error is also claimed in the refusal to give defendants' fourth instruction, to the effect that defendants were not bound to furnish water of the spring. There was no evidence that they refused to allow plaintiff the use of it. His injury was in being refused entertainment at the hotel, and, in consequence, the use of the water. We think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

APPEAL—UNDERTAKING—SUFFICIENCY.

Where defendants have filed an undertaking on appeal from the judgment against them and one for stay of execution, in neither of which is made any reference to an appeal from an order denying their motion for new trial, they cannot perfect the latter appeal by filing an undertaking in the supreme court, and claiming the benefit of Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 954, for that section refers to defective undertakings, while in this appeal from the denial of a new trial there is no undertaking at all.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. H. REARDON, Judge.

J. M. Wood, for appellants. Otto Tum Suden, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is a motion to dismiss an appeal from an order denying a new trial. It is based upon the ground that the appeal was not perfected within the time required by law, inasmuch as appellants filed no undertaking on appeal from the order denying the motion for a new trial. It appears that appellants filed an undertaking on appeal from the judgment in the sum of $300, coupled with an undertaking in the sum of $500, for the purpose of staying the execution, conditional upon the affirmance of the judgment. No reference whatever is found in the undertaking as to any appeal from the order denying defendants' motion for a new trial. At the time this motion was heard appellants had filed a sufficient undertaking in this court, approved by the chief justice, claiming the benefits to be derived from section 954 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and claiming that the original undertaking was simply insufficient. Their contention in this regard cannot be sustained, and their action in filing the undertaking in this court is of no avail. The filing of a new undertaking in this court in accordance with the foregoing section of the Code is limited to cases of defective undertakings, and in this case there is nothing whatever upon which to found a valid undertaking upon an appeal from the order denying the new trial. The undertaking filed in the lower court does not refer to any appeal from the order denying the motion for a new trial, and upon its face there is an entire absence of anything to indicate that such was its purpose and intent. The foregoing facts of this case are the same as are found in Schurtz v. Romer, 81 Cal. 244, 22 Pac. Rep. 657, and the court in dismissing that appeal said: "For these reasons the bond approved and filed in this court was ineffectual for any purpose, and the appeal must be dismissed;" and to the same effect is Bernlaud v. Beecher, 74 Cal. 618, 16 Pac. Rep. 510. Appellants' counsel relies upon section 965 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that executors who have given official bonds may rely upon such bonds in appeals from orders and judgments of the superior court in matters pertaining to the estate, etc. It is sufficient to say that there is nothing in the record to show that the defendant executors ever gave any official bond, and this is not an appeal from an order made in the "proceedings had upon the estate." While the notice of the motion to dismiss the appeal is technically defective, it is plainly apparent that the error is clerical, and it should not invalidate the notice. Let the appeal from the order be dismissed.

HOMICIDE—EVIDENCE—WAIVER OF OBJECTION—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. On indictment of an employe in a low theater, resorted to by immoral women, for murder, the admission of evidence that defendant had solicited a woman inmate to live with him is prejudicial error.

2. The inmates of such resort having been called as witnesses, the jury are the sole judges of their credibility, and it is error for the court to instruct that, since the law licenses such resorts, it is submitted whether it is justifiable to charge the inmates with want of veracity, unaccompanied by other proof.

3. On indictment for murder, a witness cannot testify that when the shot was fired, killing deceased, a third person, shown to have shortly before conversed with defendant, exclaimed that he would bet defendant killed deceased; nor can he testify to the fact that a remark was made without giving its substance, the evidence being mere hearsay.

4. The fact that defendant's attorney, after repeatedly objecting to the admission of such evidence, persistently sought to be brought out by the state notwithstanding the court ruled it incompetent, consents to the witness' saying what the remark was in reply to inquiry from the jury, is not a waiver of defendant's objection. The evidence being incompetent and prejudicial, the court should not have admitted it, even with consent of counsel, and, having done so, should have stricken it out. PATERSON, J., dissenting.

5. Error in the court's refusal to strike out such evidence is not cured by a subsequent instruction that defendant is not bound by anything said, not in his hearing or presence, by the person who made the remark, such instruction not being a plain and unequivocal direction to disregard the evidence.

6. The court cannot, on appeal, disregard evidence erroneously admitted, and look into the unobjectionable evidence to determine whether it is sufficient to sustain the verdict.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. MCM. SHAFTER, Judge.

Robert Ferral and Samuel Shortridge, for appellant. W. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the People.

DE HAVEN, J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of murder in the first degree, for the killing of one Albert H. Rice, and adjudged to suffer the penalty of death. From this judgment, and an order refusing him a new trial, this appeal is taken. The homicide was committed at a place known as the "Elite Theater," in San Francisco. The deceased was the proprietor of this resort, and the defendant was employed there for the purpose of keeping order and suppressing disturbances. This so-called "theater" is spoken of by one of the witnesses as a "cellar," and was denominated by counsel for the appellant, during the trial, as a "dive," and its character is sufficiently disclosed by the testimony, which shows that the theater is below the street, and that it is a part of the duty of the "actresses" there employed to serve drinks, attend the "boxes," and solicit patronage for the bar. Upon the trial Lulu Vernon, an "actress" in this "theater," was a witness for the people, and was permitted to testify that defendant knocked at her bedroom door on the day of the shooting, and that she did not admit him. The attorney for the people then asked her: "Since you have been working at the Elite Theater, has this man Wallace asked you to be his girl?" The question was objected to by appellant, whereupon the attorney for the people made this statement: "If your honor please, this defendant has had his counsel ask this woman if she has been leading a decent and virtuous life, and I want to show what endeavors this defendant has made to induce her to live with him." The objection of the defendant was overruled, and the witness answered: "Yes; he asked me to be his girl." She further said she told him "No," that she "didn't wish any fellow." The admission of this testimony was erroneous. It was not relevant to any issue involved in the case, and was clearly calculated to present the appellant before the jury as a low and degraded character. It may be that there are those who look with some indifference upon the moral delinquencies of men in their social relations with the other sex, if such conduct is not too flagrant and notorious. But, even if this should be assumed as the fact, it would not follow that this evidence was not prejudicial, as its object—its declared purpose and effect—was to show that appellant had proposed to "live" with this woman in a state of shameless immorality. One of the attorneys for the people concedes this in his brief. He says: "The whole testimony at full length amounts to one single verbal request by him that she should take up with him the relations which are common to people of their class and surroundings, and which make no greater figure in our estimation of such people than would marriage among people of a different social plane, and whose lives are ordered more in accordance with conventionalities." The occupation of this witness, all of the surroundings and character of the so-called "theater" in which she was employed, were fully disclosed by the evidence, and the proposition to "live" with her, and she to become his "girl," looked to a relation which need not be characterized here, but which the jurors, as men of ordinary observation, must be presumed to have fully understood. But one inference could be drawn from this testimony, and that most prejudicial to the appellant, in the minds of men of ordinary decency and of average morality. The evidence, having only this tendency, and being wholly irrelevant, should not have appeared in the case. People v. Fair, 43 Cal. 137; People v. Dye, 75 Cal. 112, 16 Pac. Rep. 537; People v. Tilley, (Cal.) 24 Pac. Rep. 290.

2. One Moore was called as a witness for the people, in rebuttal, and referring to the time of the homicide, and a restaurant near the Elite Theater, this question was asked him: "Between five minutes to eight and five minutes past eight, and while you were in the restaurant after you had left Wallace and had a conversation with him, in which he mentioned Rice's name to you, did you not hear a pistol shot, and exclaim immediately, 'Wallace has killed Rice?'" The witness answered, "No." This question called for irrelevant and incompetent testimony, but, as it was answered in the negative, of itself did no harm; but afterwards one Guthrie, the keeper of the restaurant in which the remark was alleged to have been made, was placed upon the witness stand by the prosecution and asked: "After the firing of the shots, did this man Moore say to you that Wallace had killed Rice?" The court sustained an objection to this upon the ground that the matter was hearsay, and inadmissible under any circumstances. This ruling was clearly right. The incompetency of the evidence called for by the question is glaring, but, notwithstanding this, and the ruling of the court asserting its inadmissibility, the question was immediately repeated by the attorney conducting the prosecution, and the defendant was again compelled to appeal to the court. The court finally ruled, notwithstanding the objection of defendant, that the witness might answer directly whether Moore did or did not make any remark at the time and place referred to, indicating that he heard the shots which killed Rice, but must not repeat the language used, to which defendant duly excepted. In this ruling the court erred, as it was immaterial whether Moore heard the shots or not, and the answer of the witness that Moore did say something, taken in connection with the direct question as to the language used, which was not allowed, could hardly fail to suggest to the jury the nature of the remark made, and was little less damaging to the defendant than if such rejected question had been answered in the affirmative. At this point different jurors began to more particularly question the witness about the circumstances, and finally one juror said: "We have not heard yet what the language was that this Moore used at the time." Whereupon the attorney for the people, instead of answering that such testimony was not under the rulings of the court proper to be laid before the jury, said: "That is what we would like to have, and we do not object to letting it go in." Objection was made by the attorney for appellant, and the court once more ruled the testimony inadmissible. In the face of these objections, and in contempt of the repeated rulings of the court, the counsel conducting the prosecution again announced: "I would like to have the juror's question answered as to what Moore said." Thereupon counsel for appellant withdrew his objection, and the witness answered: " * * * He said, 'No; I will bet you it was Wallace shot Rice, the proprietor;' and I said to him, 'No; it was two of the women that were shot.' He says, 'The reason that I think it was him was this: that I was with him this afternoon, and that he had sent a messenger boy for his pistol, and said he would shoot him.'" That this testimony was merely hearsay, and therefore incompetent, is plain, and that it bore directly upon a most vital point in the case, namely, whether the killing of Rice had been contemplated by appellant, and was the result of a fixed purpose after deliberate premeditation, is also apparent. The rule which forbids the introduction of hearsay evidence is one which is so generally understood, and closely adhered to, that it is seldom that the admission of such evidence is assigned as error in an appellate court. But in the case of People v. Jacobs, 49 Cal. 384, the trial court admitted evidence similar to that which we are now considering, and it was there held that when a witness is called by a party, and does not testify as expected, nor give testimony against him, the party calling him is not permitted to prove that the witness had made at some other time the statement to which he had refused to testify, for to do so would enable the party to get the naked declarations of the witness before the jury as independent evidence, as was done in the present case. Here the alleged declarations of the witness Moore, not made under oath, or in the presence of appellant, were given to the jury as evidence in the case, to prove that the killing of Rice was the result of a preconceived design upon the part of appellant. The character of this testimony cannot be disguised by calling it an impeachment of the witness Moore. Viewed in every light, and reduced to its last analysis, it was hearsay; simply one witness testifying that he heard another person say that the defendant had told him that he intended to kill the deceased.

After the reception of this testimony the appellant moved that it be stricken out. The motion was denied, the court giving as a reason for its action that the evidence was admitted without objection. It has undoubtedly been held in many cases that it is a sufficient answer to such a motion that the evidence was received without objection. The rule is one of practice, and is applied in order to save the time of the court, which otherwise would be uselessly consumed in listening to testimony, and then striking it out; and also to prevent a party from obtaining an advantage by deliberately consenting that a witness may give evidence upon a certain point with the expectation or belief that it may be favorable to him, and then having it excluded when the evidence is not satisfactory. Under its operation, when without objection secondary evidence has been received where primary should have been produced, or evidence of confessions, or dying declarations, or of experts, without proof of the preliminary facts required by law, or when competent evidence of an irrelevant or immaterial fact has been allowed by consent, the trial court may properly deny a motion to strike out such evidence thus admitted. In such cases it is held that a party has no legal right to complain, if the court, in the exercise of its discretion, retains the evidence. The motion to strike out is addressed to the sound legal discretion of the trial court, and when the objection to the evidence is not merely technical, as in the instance above given, but is substantial, and it also appears to the court that the justice of the particular case before it requires such action, the subsequent motion to strike out should be allowed. Indeed, a court may properly refuse to receive, even with the consent of the parties, evidence which in law is not recognized as fit and appropriate. In Monfort v. Rowland, 88 N. J. Eq. 185, the court declares: "The court is not bound to accept anything but legal evidence, and should seldom, if ever, allow its judgment to be controlled by anything else. The parties are at liberty to make such agreements respecting the evidence as they may see fit, but the court is not bound by them. The court may recognize them if it thinks proper to do so, but it should in no case sanction them if they are against the policy of the law, or dangerous to the safe administration of the law." In the case of Parker v. Smith, 4 Cal. 105, it was held that the court might of its own motion strike out and instruct the jury to disregard the illegal testimony of a witness, although given without objection from the opposing party. The court there say: "On the trial of this cause one of the witnesses deposed to a state of facts which upon his cross-examination proved to be hearsay evidence, and wholly inadmissible; whereupon the court ordered the testimony of the witness to be stricken out, and instructed the jury to disregard it. The appellant assigns this as error—First, because the testimony was not objected to in limine by the respondent; and, second, because the court of its own motion ruled it out. * * * The right of the court to interfere is also undoubted. The testimony was clearly improper. The duty of the court was not confined to passing upon such portions of the testimony as may be excepted to, but extends to the preservation of the rights of litigants, and a proper disposition of the matters in controversy." If this is the right and duty of the court in a civil case, with much greater reason can it be said that in a trial for murder, in which the life of a defendant is involved, the court ought not to refuse to strike out testimony which is inherently illegal and incompetent, and which, under well-settled rules of law, cannot be received as legal proof of any fact. We think the court should have excluded this incompetent evidence upon defendant's motion. The court ought to have done so, not only because of the nature of the evidence, but because the defendant had more than once objected to its introduction, when the counsel conducting the case for the people was endeavoring by repeated questions to get it before the jury, in open defiance of the rulings of the court, and the objection to it was only yielded in deference to what seemed to be the wish of a juror to hear the evidence. But the court ought not to have permitted the defendant to be placed in this position, and should have enforced its previous rulings on its own motion. But, whether it did this or not, the testimony should have been excluded upon the subsequent motion of the defendant.

8. The court afterwards, in its charge to the jury, gave this instruction: "Some evidence has been admitted of a statement made by one Moore, at the restaurant of a Mr. Guthrie, immediately after the shooting; but in this connection I say to you that the defendant at the bar is not bound by anything Moore may have said not in his presence and hearing." This was not equivalent to excluding this evidence from the consideration of the jury. It was not a plain and unequivocal direction to them to wholly disregard it as illegal, and not proper to be considered at all, and therefore cannot be regarded as obviating the error in the previous ruling of the court.

4. The court erred in charging the jury: "In this connection I think it proper to say the law allows and licenses this class of theaters. It allows and licenses the sale of liquor therein. While this state of things exists it is submitted whether, by the mere keeping of such a place, it is justifiable to charge its inmates with want of veracity, unless accompanied with other proof." In this instruction the court very clearly intimates that in its opinion the witnesses referred to had been unjustly assailed, and that any argument against their credibility, based upon the fact that they were inmates of this "theater," was not justifiable. But whether such an argument was justifiable—that is, whether it ought to influence the judgment of the jury in passing upon the credibility of these witnesses—was a question solely for the consideration of the jury, and the instruction quoted was an invasion of their province, and erroneous. Com. v. Barry, 9 Allen, 276; People v. Fong Ching, 78 Cal. 169, 20 Pac. Rep. 396. Jurors must be left to determine for themselves whether an attack upon the credibility or truthfulness of a witness is sustained by the facts before them, and whether an argument addressed to them for the purpose of convincing their judgment upon the point is one which ought in fairness and justice to have been urged; and, no matter how flimsy, unreasonable, or unjust such attack may appear to him, the judge is not allowed in his charge to oppose the weight of his opinion against the argument of counsel as to the credibility of the witnesses, but must leave the whole matter to be disposed of by the good sense of the jury, which will generally be found adequate for that purpose. In this case the record discloses that the witnesses referred to in this instruction gave material evidence against the defendant, and the giving of this instruction cannot be overlooked, as an immaterial error, which could not possibly have affected the verdict of the jury. There are other assignments of error, but we do not deem it necessary to pass upon them. We are not authorized to disregard the errors above pointed out, and look into the unobjectionable evidence in the case for the purpose of determining its sufficiency to justify the verdict. To weigh the evidence, and determine whether it establishes the guilt or innocence of the defendant, is the exclusive province of a jury; and the defendant is entitled to have this issue submitted to the jury upon legal and competent evidence alone, and upon proper instructions from the court. We cannot speculate or know what the verdict of the jury would have been if the errors referred to in this opinion had not appeared in the case, but are compelled to render judgment upon the questions of law presented by the exceptions of the defendant. Judgment and order reversed.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J., GAROUTTE, J.; HARRISON, J.

PATERSON, J., (concurring.) I think the defendant waived his right to complain of the ruling of the court with respect to the statement made by Moore at the restaurant, immediately after the shooting, by withdrawing his objection to the questions asked; but, if this were not so, the error was cured by the court in its instruction to the jury that the defendant was not bound by anything Moore may have said not in his presence and hearing. For the reasons stated in paragraph 4 of the opinion, however, and on account of other errors not noticed in the opinion, I think the defendant was prejudiced by the rulings of the court, and that he is entitled to a new trial. The written statement of Charles F. Smith contained evidence of conversations other than the conversation inquired into in his examination in chief,—statements which were clearly hearsay. The testimony of Asche, as to what the deceased stated before he met the defendant prior to the homicide, may not have had any important bearing on the case in the minds of the jury, but it was, nevertheless, erroneously admitted. The instruction of the court that "the killing must take place while the person killed is in the very act of making such unlawful and violent attack, and under such circumstances that the person assailed cannot resort to other legal means to save and protect himself, except retreating or running, which he is not bound to do," omits the element of appearances on which the party assailed is entitled to act, provided for by section 197, subd. 2, Pen. Code. People v. Flanagan, 60 Cal. 2. The same is true of the instruction of the court that, to justify a person for killing another upon the ground of self-defense, the killing must be done under a well-founded belief that it was absolutely necessary for such person to kill the deceased to save himself from great bodily harm. People v. Anderson, 44 Cal. 68.

MASTER AND SERVANT—DEATH OF EMPLOYEE—FELLOW-SERVANTS—DAMAGES.

1. In an action against a railroad company for the negligent killing of an employee, the evidence showed that deceased, who was a car-repairer, was sent by the foreman to repair a car standing in defendant's yard, and while he and others were under the car, upon which they had failed to display a red flag, an engine was heard. One of the men went out, and, in the hearing of deceased, told the switchman directing the engine of deceased's position. The engine was stopped within six feet of the car, but the switchman signaled it to back, which it did, striking the car, and killing deceased. Held, that a verdict for plaintiff was proper. BLACKBURN, J., dissenting.

2. One who is employed by a railroad company, under a foreman, to make repairs in its repair-shops and on cars standing in its yards, is not a fellow-servant of a switchman, who, under orders of the yard-master, directs the movement of cars in the yard.

3. Under Comp. Laws Utah 1888, §§ 2962, 8179, giving the personal representative and heirs of one whose death is caused by the wrongful act of another the right to sue for damages for the benefit of his distributees, and providing that such damages may be given as are just, the jury, in an action for the death of a husband and father, may consider the number and ages of his family, his age, his ability to earn wages and provide for his family, and what his expectancy may have been, in order to arrive at the pecuniary loss sustained by his family.

Kimball & White and E. M. Allison, for appellant. Ma. shull & Royle, for appellee.

MINER, J. This action was brought by the plaintiff, as administratrix of the estate of Joseph S. Pool, deceased, to recover damage for the alleged negligent killing of Joseph S. Pool while repairing a car in defendant's yard at Ogden, Utah, September 12, 1888. The action was tried with a jury in the first district court at Ogden, April 4, 1890, and a verdict rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $10,000. This defendant assigns as error: (1) Contributory negligence on the part of the deceased, Joseph S. Pool; (2) that Switchman Kilpatrick was a fellow-servant of deceased, and his contributory negligence, if any, caused the death of the deceased, who was a fellow-servant at the time; (3) excessive damages; (4) errors in instructions of the court to the jury.

The undisputed facts in the case show that at the time of the accident in question the deceased, Joseph S. Pool, together with two co-laborers, named Powers and Rice, were engaged as car-repairers for the defendant at their shops at Ogden, under the orders of Mr. Starr, their foreman. That on the day in question Powers and Pool were ordered by Starr to repair a car on the repair track No. 1 in defendant's yard, where it was customary to make slight repairs to cars. At this place there were six or seven parallel tracks besides the main track on defendant's line. That Pool and Powers were engaged in repairing this car in question, and they were in a position under the car near the draw-bars, between the rails of the track, when the noise of an approaching switch-engine warned them of their dangerous position. Plaintiff produced one Frank J. Powers, who testified in substance that he heard a noise, and remarked to Pool, who was under the car: "I have an idea that they are coming." He said, "Yes; they are coming in here." Says I, "Let's get out;" and Pool immediately moved to get out on the east side of the car. Mr. Rice [the co-laborer] was standing by the side of the car, outside of the track; and I told him in the hearing of Pool to go and stop the engine and caboose, and not let it hit the car. I told him that the car could not go out until it was repaired. Rice said, "All right," and then he stepped down to the other end of the car, and made signal to stop the engine. The engine came down within six feet of our car and stopped. I heard Rice tell somebody not to hit the car; that we were working on it. As soon as I heard that order given I went to work with Pool under the car. I felt uneasy, however, and I looked out soon after, and saw one of the yard-men, Kilpatrick, giving a signal to back up. I said to Pool, "Look out, Pool; they are right on us;" and I threw myself over the rail, and was injured. After I got out I saw Pool lying between the two cars badly injured. He died soon afterwards. The cars came together with great force, and caught Pool between them. The engineer on the engine was Mr. Weaver; the fireman was Mr. Purdy; the switchman and brakeman were Benjamin Kilpatrick and William Taylor. At the time of the accident, they, Kilpatrick and Taylor, were standing about one hundred feet from us. Kilpatrick was acting as one of the switchmen. We both relied on Rice seeing that the engineer was notified that we were under the car, and we thought he would attend to it. We put out no red flag as a signal to the engineer before we went under there. Such flag would have notified the engineer. We didn't do it because it was too much work, and we thought it would only take a few minutes to make the repairs; and we also knew that I had told Rice to warn the engineer to watch us, and not to back up. I heard Rice tell the switchman, Kilpatrick, not to hit the car; and supposed that they would not do so. I heard Rice tell the switchman not to hit the car, and that was satisfactory to me. I heard Rice talking to the switchman, Kilpatrick,—I think it was Kilpatrick,—and I think Kilpatrick, the switchman, signaled the engineer to back up after he had been warned not to do so by Rice. Kilpatrick was a brakeman in the yard, and was sometimes called a switchman. He attended to switching in the yard, and doing ordinary work of a brakeman, and helps to make up trains, and gives signals to engineers to back up and start. Kilpatrick gave the signal to back up, and that caused the accident. Kilpatrick was acting at the time under orders from the yard-master. The duty of the car-repairers was to obey the foreman's orders, and work in the shop, and make small repairs in the yard occasionally. When Rice spoke to and warned Kilpatrick, the engine was about twenty feet away, and I was under the car with Pool, and heard Kilpatrick make some reply to Rice." George C. Rice, a witness produced by the plaintiff, testified, in substance, "that at this time Kilpatrick was riding on the steps on the forepart of the caboose as this engine backed down towards our car. I told Kilpatrick, the switchman, not to attach to the car,—not to hit it; that there were men working under the car. The engine came to within six feet of this car being repaired, and stopped after this notice by Rice to Kilpatrick. Soon after this Kilpatrick gave a signal to the engineer for it to come back. The engine came back with great force, and Pool was injured and killed." The defense offered no proof, and Kilpatrick was not sworn in the case. Pool was an able-bodied man, of good character, 29 years of age at the time of his death, and was receiving $75 per month from the defendant, and had a wife and several children dependent upon him for support. The jury found as special findings of fact, upon questions submitted to them by the court, that Kilpatrick was negligent in the discharge of his duty as switchman in giving signals to the engineer to back his engine down against the car under which the deceased, Pool, was working, knowing when he gave such signal that Pool was working under the car. They also found that at the time of the injury Pool was using such precaution and care to avoid injury as a prudent man, in the exercise of due care should do; and that Kilpatrick was not a fellow-servant of Pool.

From the testimony given in the case we are satisfied that Kilpatrick was not a fellow-servant of the deceased, but was then engaged in a different kind and department of service, and was not in the same common employment, and was under the orders of a different master. Nor can there be any question made but that Kilpatrick heard the signal from Rice to stop the engine, and that he acted upon such signal, and did stop the engine about six feet from the car in question, under which the deceased was working at the time. The signal was understood by the switchman, Kilpatrick, and obeyed by him. The verbal communication to Kilpatrick to stop the engine was a notice and warning as certain, positive, and safe as if there had been a red-flag signal used in such case. In any event, Kilpatrick received it, understood it, and replied to it, and complied with it at the time, and he would have done no more had there been a red-flag signal placed by the car. Powers and the deceased, Pool, assumed, as they would have a right to assume under the circumstances, and as the jury found, that there would be no danger in proceeding with their work, and before they had completed it Kilpatrick, the switchman, with notice of their position and danger, and without giving any warning, negligently gave the signal to back up, and the engine immediately backed up with great force, and Pool was caught between the cars and killed. "An employer is not liable for injuries to his servant caused by the negligence of a fellow-servant in a common employment; but this exemption does not extend to injuries caused by the carelessness or negligence of another person in the master's service in an employment not common to that in which the person injured is engaged, and upon a subject in regard to which the person injured has a right to look for care and diligence on the part of the other person as the representative of a common master." Daniels v. Railway Co., (Utah,) 23 Pac. Rep. 762; Railroad Co. v. Kelly, 127 Ill. 637, 21 N. E. Rep. 203; Railway Co. v. Ross, 112 U. S. 377, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 184; Morton v. Railway Co., (Mich.) 46 N. W. Rep. 111; Railway Co. v. Morgenstern, 106 Ill. 216; Kane v. Railway Co., 128 U. S. 91, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 16; Reddon v. Railway Co., 5 Utah, 344, 15 Pac. Rep. 262; Hough v. Railway Co., 100 U. S. 213; Railway Co. v. Herbert, 116 U. S. 642, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 590.

The special instructions were properly submitted by the court to the jury, and their findings under the evidence should not be disturbed. Comp. Laws 1888, §§ 3374, 3978; Webb v. Railway Co., (Utah,) 24 Pac. Rep. 616. So, also, we think the question of negligence or contributory negligence was properly submitted to the jury. In such cases, in order to determine whether an employe, by recklessly exposing himself to peril, has failed to exercise that degree of care for his personal safety that might reasonably be expected, has thus by his own negligence contributed to cause the accident, regard must always be had to the circumstances of the case, and to the exigencies of his position; and the decision of this question ought not to be withheld from the jury unless the evidence, after giving the plaintiff the benefit of every inference to be fairly drawn from it, so conclusively shows contributory negligence that the court would be compelled, in the exercise of sound judicial discretion, to set aside any verdict rendered or returned in his favor. Kane v. Railway Co., 128 U. S. 91, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 16; Morton v. Railway Co., (Mich.) 46 N. W. Rep. 111; Railway Co. v. Steuburg, 17 Mich. 99. Defendant's counsel contend that the trial court erred in instructing the jury, among other things, that they should "determine, in the first place, the number of the family, the number of the children, and the ages of the family, and determine the age of the deceased, his ability to earn wages and provide for the family; determine from your own experience. You can judge as to what his expectancy may have been, and from all these circumstances determine what in a pecuniary sense this family has lost by the loss of the husband and father; the care he may have given those children; and determine it in a business way, and without sentiment, just how much in a pecuniary sense they ought to recover for the injury that they have sustained." Section 2962, Comp. Laws 1888, reads as follows: "That every such action shall be brought by and in the name of the personal representative of such deceased person, and the amount received in every such action shall be distributed, by direction and decree of the proper probate court, to such persons (other than creditors) as are by law entitled to distributive shares of the estate of such deceased person, in such proportions as are prescribed by law." Section 3179, Id., reads as follows: "When the death of a person, not being a minor, is caused by a wrongful act of another, his heirs and personal representatives may maintain an action for damages against the person causing the death; or if such person be employed by another person, who is responsible for his conduct, then also against such other person. In every action, under this and the preceding section, such damages may be given as under all the circumstances of the case may be just." The evident purpose of these provisions of the statute was to allow the widow and heirs or personal representatives of the deceased to recover such pecuniary damages as, under all the circumstances of the case, were just. Now, what were the circumstances of the case contemplated by the statute from which the jury are to estimate the damages? Plainly, they should determine from the evidence in the case, based upon well-defined facts or known circumstances, what the pecuniary injury and loss to the wife and children was, resulting from the death, which was made the basis of the action; and to ascertain these fairly the jury should know and determine the number in the family dependent upon him for support and previously provided for; the number and ages of the children; their kindly demeanor towards each other, or the lack of it; the loss of his society as a husband and father; the age and health of his wife, and age and health of the deceased; his ability to earn wages and provide for his family; determine what he has done, and was then doing, or would be likely to do, for his family; and from these facts and circumstances determine what pecuniary damages the wife and family were justly entitled to as pecuniary compensation to them resulting from the death in question. What the family would lose by the death would be what it was accustomed to receive or had reasonable expectation of receiving in his life-time. The extent of the loss should not be measured by the wealth or poverty of the recipients or giver, but by his beneficent and pecuniary contributions given, or in reasonable expectation of being given, to the widow and heirs, as shown by the proof and judged from all the circumstances of the case to be just, but measured by pecuniary standard. If the testimony did not show that there were heirs living who were pecuniarily injured by his death, no recovery should be had, as in that case no one had sustained any pecuniary loss or injury by his death. On the whole record we find no error. The judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

ZANE, C. J., and ANDERSON, J., concur.

BLACKBURN, J., (dissenting.) This suit is brought to recover damages for the death of Joseph S. Pool, caused, as is claimed, by the negligence of the defendant company. A trial was had, and verdict and judgment for plaintiff. Defendant moved for a new trial, which was overruled, and it appealed. The undisputed facts are substantially as follows: Decedent and one Powers were employees of the defendant company, at work at Ogden, in its repair-shops, and were directed by the foreman to make some slight repairs on a car on a track in the yard. They went to the car, and had to go under it to make the repairs, and did not put out the usual signal—a red flag—for their protection, thinking, as the witness explained, it was too much trouble for the length of time it would take them to do the work. After they had commenced work they heard an engine coming, and one of them requested a man by the name of Rice, a follow-servant, engaged in the repair-shop, to stop the engine, and give warning that they were at work on the car. The engine stopped a few feet from the car they were at work upon, and they resumed work; and in a very short time a switchman employed in the yard, by the name of Kilpatrick, gave a signal to the engineer to back up, which he did with great force, and the decedent was injured, and died in a very short time. The evidence in behalf of the plaintiff in reference to what took place immediately preceding the accident is as follows: Powers: "When I saw the engine come down upon us, I said to Rice, 'Go and stop him, and don't let him hit this car at all, as it has to be repaired before it can go out.' I saw him go to the other end of the car, and give the usual signal to stop. He did not say anything at that time. They came within about six feet of the car, and stopped. I heard Mr. Rice tell somebody not to hit this car; that they were working there. We went right to work again under the car. I heard Rice speak to Kilpatrick, and I heard Kilpatrick make some reply; but I did not know what it was. The car was moving then, and moved up to about six feet, and stopped. He told Kilpatrick not to hit the car; and I think he told him we were working there." Rice: "I had no conversation further than to tell Kilpatrick not to touch the car, for men were working there. He was twenty or thirty feet away at the time. They stopped within about six feet of the car. The next thing I saw was Kilpatrick signaling the engineer to back up, and it came back with great force." Three errors are assigned for the reversal of this case: (1) Contributory negligence of the decedent; (2) Kilpatrick was a fellow-servant of the deceased; (3) excessive damages.

I think Kilpatrick was not a fellow-servant of the deceased, under the rule laid down by this court in the case of Daniels v. Railway Co., (Utah,) 23 Pac. Rep. 762. I adhere to that decision, and think it states the best rule, considering the many divers decisions on that subject. The jury found that he was not a fellow-servant, and also his negligence caused the death of the decedent. These findings would sustain the verdict if there was no want of reasonable care contributing to his death on the part of the decedent. This question was also submitted to the jury: "Did the deceased use such care and precaution to avoid the injury as a prudent man in the exercise of due care should have used?" To this question the jury answered, "Yes." I have disposed of the question as to whether Kilpatrick was a fellow-servant of the deceased. But the important one was, was the decedent guilty of contributory negligence? The jury found he was not. Was that finding right, and, if not right, is the appellate court bound by it? The rule is, if the finding of the jury is clearly and manifestly against the weight of the evidence, the trial court should grant a new trial, and if it fails to do that, it is error, and the appellate court should reverse. Hill, New Trials, 336, 339; Keaggy v. Hite, 12 Ill. 100; Belden v. Innis, 84 Ill. 78; Insurance Co. v. Beck, 74 Ill. 165; Bolton v. Howell, 18 Ind. 181; Smith v. Ireland, 4 Utah, 187, 7 Pac. Rep. 749; Hopkins v. Ogden City, 5 Utah, 390, 16 Pac. Rep. 596.

I think in this case the jury wholly misconceived the force and effect of the evidence. It was all given in behalf of the plaintiff. The decedent neglected to put out the well-known and usual signal of warning, a red flag, because it was too much trouble, and trusted to one Rice to protect him. Rice was his fellow-servant, and if he was hurt by the negligence of Rice, his fellow-servant, the plaintiff cannot recover. Rice says he told Kilpatrick, the switchman, who was controlling the engineer running the engine, not to touch the car; the decedent was at work under it; that Kilpatrick was 20 or 30 feet away. He does not say that Kilpatrick heard him. Indeed, he was not asked that question. If Kilpatrick heard the warning, and, notwithstanding, signaled the engineer to move back, his act was more than negligence,—it was malice and murder. We cannot think that Kilpatrick heard the warning. We are not ready to presume him guilty of deliberately killing the decedent. Rice must have failed to make Kilpatrick hear and understand him. If so, Rice's negligence contributed to the injury, and the defendant was not guilty of negligence through Kilpatrick, and the plaintiff cannot recover. But were the decedent and Powers, his companion, guilty of contributory negligence in not hanging out the red flag, the usual signal, and one that the switchman and the engineer and everybody connected with the operation of the railroad understood and respected? I think they were. In all human probability the accident would not have happened if the red flag had been put up. The engineer would have seen it, and not have obeyed the signal of the switchman. The switchman would have seen it, and not have given the signal to back up. By intrusting their safety to Rice, they took the chances of his carelessness in giving the proper information to the switchman, and the chances of the switchman hearing and understanding Rice. Their safety would have been certain if the flag had been hung out. It was a mute and silent warning, but neither switchman nor engineer could have mistaken it, nor would they have disobeyed it. I think, therefore, as a matter of law, that the decedent, by neglecting to use the well-known signal,—the usual and well-understood precaution,—and trusting to the chance of a fellow-servant protecting him, was guilty of contributory negligence on his part, and the plaintiff cannot recover. Railroad employes occupy very responsible positions. The safety of themselves, their fellow-employes, the safety of the property of the company, and the lives of the traveling public depend upon their diligence in the performance of their duties, and in the strict use of the ordinary precautions, well understood and prescribed by the company. Railroad employes may not at their pleasure set aside the rules and precautions made by the company for their protection, and substitute others, without assuming all the risks consequent upon such substitution. The other alleged errors need not be noticed, as this one is sufficient to reverse the case. I think the trial court should have granted a new trial; and this case should be reversed, and a venire de novo awarded.

BURKHARD v. MITCHELL

AUTHORIZED ACT OF AGENT—RATIFICATION.

Where an owner gives his agent authority to rent his premises, and it is not shown whether the authority of the agent as to the length of the lease was limited or not, and the agent leases for two years, while the owner claims that he had no authority to execute a lease for more than a year, but notwithstanding accepts rent from the tenants for four months after the end of the first year, he thereby ratifies the lease for the entire term, and cannot demand a higher rent for the balance of the term, and oust the tenant for refusal to pay it.

Commissioners' decision. Appeal from Las Animas county court.

James M. John, for appellant. J. H. Croxton, for appellee.

BISSELL, C. Mitchell instituted these proceedings in forcible entry and detainer against Burkhard, to recover possession of certain premises in Trinidad. The trial resulted in a judgment in favor of the owner for the possession, and for the rent for the months of November, December, and January. The November rent was found to be $75, and that for the two succeeding months $100. This amount of rent was not fixed by any specific agreement. The controversy was as to what, if any, tenancy had resulted, by operation of law, from what had been done by the parties. In June, 1884, Mitchell was the owner of the premises, and at that time was evidently indebted to the firm of John & Gunter in a very considerable sum of money. To secure this indebtedness, and provide means for its payment, he assigned all rents and profits of the property for two years; and by due power authorized them, upon such terms as to price and parties as to them might seem proper, to lease the premises and collect the rents. By some stipulation, which does not appear, Mitchell continued this authority after June, 1886, the date named in the original power. He admits that they had such authority up to August 1, 1887, and concedes that they rented the premises, and collected the rent, by his consent, to that time. Whether there was, in the extension, any specific limitation of time which would, ex vi termini, terminate their power on that date, is not shown. Mitchell simply concedes the existence of the power during 1887, shows the liquidation of his debt August 1st, and insists that the power ceased on that date. July 24, 1886, while the authority of John & Gunter was in force, they leased the premises to Burkhard for two years, at a monthly rental of $40, payable at the end of each month. The tenant went into possession under the lease, and paid his rent to John & Gunter to July 1, 1887. During that time no question was made as to his tenancy, or as to the rental. Whether Mitchell had actual notice of the existence of the lease which had been made by John & Gunter cannot be learned from the record. On the 1st of August, when the obligation to John & Gunter was paid off and the property came back under the owner's control, he went for his rent for July, and was tendered the $40 stipulated for in the lease. He received the money, but protested that the rent was an inadequate price, and contended that John & Gunter had no authority to lease the premises beyond August 1, 1887. At that time he received full notice of the lease, its duration and terms. Without other or further objection, he continued to receive the rent each month, according to the terms of the agreement which had been made between Burkhard and John & Gunter, till the 1st of November, 1887, when he served the notice to quit, which initiated these proceedings. By this notice he attempted to force the tenant to vacate the premises or pay a rent of $75 for November. This notice seems to have been abandoned, and another was served a few days later for the same purpose, which fixed the rent at $100 for the month of December. In rendering judgment the court held the defendant liable to pay the rent named in these two notices, and entered judgment of ouster and for the sum of $275.

Manifestly, the judgment was entered without a correct conception of the relations and legal rights of the parties. At the time John & Gunter leased the premises to Burkhard they had ample authority to act. Possibly the authority is not to be found in the instrument which originally granted it, but the plaintiff concedes that it continued during the entire year following the date named in the letter of attorney. Whether it was continued by express letter of extension, or by tacit or verbal concession, can make no difference. If the power was conferred, as the plaintiff proved when establishing his own case, the lease made by John & Gunter was operative, and legally binding on the owner of the premises at the time of its execution. The estate was granted, and Burkhard thereby acquired the right to enjoy it for the term named, and at the rental specified. This cannot be disputed, except upon the hypothesis that, as the power was only extended for one year, the lease could not be granted by the firm for a time exceeding the limit named in their authority. This might be true if there was a limit expressed, and the person dealing with the agent had notice of the limitation placed on the general authority, or if he was bound before dealing with him to ascertain what authority the agent had. But the plaintiff failed to show any such restriction on the general authority to rent, which he admits the agent had. It must be conceded to be the law that, if the agent have general authority to lease, his contracts will bind his principal. When it was admitted that John & Gunter had a general authority to lease during the year 1887, when the contract was made, it was incumbent on the plaintiff who proved it to show that the authority was limited as to time, and that the defendant either had notice of the restriction, or was chargeable with knowledge of it. The power of the firm over the matter of leases and rents was apparently absolute. The property was, and for several years had been, under their exclusive control, with the right to lease, collect the rents, and appropriate the money. Such authority is wholly inconsistent with any limitation which would defeat contracts of lease into which they might enter. It is plain, on any theory, that the lease as executed was good from July, 1886, to July, 1887. The proof offered by Mitchell was of a right to lease to August 1, 1887. He made no question that the lease was good to that date. It then was a good contract of lease at $40 per month for one year. What followed rendered it a good lease for another year, and the original contract of John & Gunter was effectuated, and the defendant was entitled to stay his term out. On the 1st of August, when Mitchell came for the July rent, he was tendered the $40. He demurred, and protested that he ought to have more rent, but he accepted it. Without protest he took the rent for August, September, and October. The legal result of this conduct is the creation of a new lease for another year at $40 per month. The original lease of John & Gunter was admittedly good for a year. When the year expired which terminated the contract, it was capable of legal, as well as contractual, renewal. Assuming that the lease was valid only for the term ending on the 1st of August, if the tenant held over and paid the rent, he became, by virtue of the application of a well-established principle of the law of landlord and tenant, a tenant for a year, upon the same terms and conditions that measured and defined his leasehold estate for the preceding year. Sears v. Smith, 3 Colo. 288; Reithman v. Brandenburg, 7 Colo. 481, 4 Pac. Rep. 788; Zippa v. Reppy, 25 Pac. Rep. 164, (September term, 1890.) It was not possible for Mitchell to receive his rent, and continue the tenancy in the manner he did, without subjecting his premises to the burden of the lease for another year. The plaintiff's conduct was likewise, in legal effect, a ratification of the contract made by his agents. The premises were, for at least a year, in the occupation of the tenant, who was paying the stipulated rent from month to month. Whether this rent was turned over to the principal by the agents, or was applied by them in the discharge of the principal's debt, in either event knowledge of the tenancy, and its terms, must presumably have come to his knowledge long before the 1st of August, 1887. On that date he certainly knew of it, because it is in evidence that it was then shown to him. He continued to receive the rent for at least four months, according to the terms of the contract as made by his agents. The receipts which he gave are in the usual form, and are without restriction or exception of any sort. It does not appear that after the 1st of August he made any objection whatever to the lease, or to the tenancy as asserted by the tenant. According to all reasonable rules, this must be held a ratification of the contract. A principal cannot acquiesce in the unauthorized contract of his agent, accept its benefits, and escape the responsibility of its obligations. In whatever aspect the case is viewed, the contract of lease was a valid one, and afforded a perfect defense to the action. The judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded.

INSTRUCTIONS—HARMLESS ERROR—REVIEW ON APPEAL—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

1. A mere misuse of the conjunctive "and" in the place of the disjunctive "or" in a charge which has clearly and repeatedly correctly stated the law is harmless error, which will not warrant a reversal.

2. Where the evidence is conflicting, the verdict of a jury will not be disturbed.

Appeal from district court, Latah county.

Reynolds, Buck & Winston, for appellant. Poe & Piper, for respondent.

HUSTON, J. This is an action of claim and delivery for the recovery of two horses or the value thereof. The horses were seized by defendant upon an execution issued upon a judgment recovered in justice's court of Moscow precinct, Latah county, Idaho. Plaintiff claims that the property so seized was exempt under the statutes of Idaho, for the reason that he, the plaintiff, was an actual resident of Idaho at the time of the seizure, and engaged solely in teaming with said team as a means of livelihood. The answer of defendant denies both the actual residence and occupation of plaintiff. The case was tried to a jury, and verdict rendered for plaintiff for recovery of property, and damages for detention. The appeal is from the order of the district judge overruling defendant's motion for a new trial. The errors charged are:

First, error in the charge of the court to the jury, in this: The court charged the jury as follows: "There must be two things that must occur in order that this plaintiff may have his property exempt: (1) He must at the time have been an actual resident of Idaho territory; and (2) he must have been a teamster, using his team habitually as a means of livelihood." This instruction was substantially repeated, at least three times, in the instructions of the court; but it appears that in its excess of repetition the court, evidently by inadvertence, used the word "and" in one case where the word "or" should have been used, to-wit, after stating the law as above given, the court says: "If you find, however, the contrary, that he [the plaintiff] was not an actual resident of this territory, and that he did not use those horses habitually as a means of livelihood," etc. It is the use of the conjunction "and" in place of the disjunctive "or" that is charged as error. We cannot think that this mere lapsus linguae, occurring in a charge which had repeatedly stated the law of the case correctly, could have misled the jury. If technically error, it was harmless, and will not warrant a reversal.

The second error urged is that the attorney for the plaintiff, in his closing argument to the jury, used the following words: "Gentlemen of the jury: If you could have only seen this young man, the plaintiff, come into my office with tears in his eyes, lamenting the loss of his horses, all that he had in the world, the day of the sale, you would not suspect him of endeavoring to deceive you." It is claimed by appellant's counsel that in making the above statement of facts, of which there was no proof in the testimony, the only evidential statement was as to the horses being "all that plaintiff had in the world," and this fact was testified to by the plaintiff, and was undisputed. The agony alluded to by his counsel may be fairly inferred to have been intended to meet some charge of dishonesty or deception charged to have been attempted by the plaintiff. Without the argument upon both sides before us, it is impossible for us to say what degree of relevance there was. At any rate, the matter is too trifling to warrant a reversal.

The only other error charged by the appellant is that the evidence does not warrant or sustain the verdict. The evidence upon the fact of the occupation of plaintiff was undisputed. The evidence of residence was somewhat conflicting, but we think fully warranted the finding of the jury. Order of the court below overruling motion for new trial is affirmed, with costs to respondent.

ADVANCE THRESHER CO. v. WHITESIDE.

FORECLOSURE OF CHATTEL MORTGAGE — ACTION FOR DEFICIENCY.

The plaintiff held a chattel mortgage given by defendant to secure the payment of three certain promissory notes made by defendant, for purchase price of certain personal property. Default having been made by defendant in the condition of mortgage, plaintiff foreclosed by notice and sale, as provided by statute. The return of the sheriff showed a deficiency of some $900, to recover which amount plaintiff brings this action. To a complaint setting forth all the details of the transaction, including the foreclosure sale, and report of sheriff showing deficiency, in proper form, defendant enters a general demurrer, which was sustained by the court. Held, that the action was properly brought, and that the action of district court, in sustaining demurrer to complaint, was error.

Forney & Tillinghast, for appellant. D. C. Mitchell, for respondent.

HUSTON, J. This is an appeal from an order and judgment of the district court for the county of Latah, sustaining defendant's demurrer to the complainant's complaint. The facts as they appear from the record are substantially as follows: On the 19th day of September, 1890, at Moscow, Latah county, Idaho, the defendant made and delivered to plaintiff his three promissory notes,—one being for the sum of $750, payable on the 1st of November, 1890; and the other two being each for the sum of $725, one payable the 1st day of November, 1891, and the other the 1st day of November, 1892. Said notes were given in payment for a threshing-machine, engine, etc., bought of the appellant by the respondent. Contemporaneous with the execution and delivery of said notes the defendant, for the purpose of securing the payment of the same, made, executed, and delivered to the plaintiff a chattel mortgage, in the usual form, and also a written agreement to which was attached one of the aforesaid notes, by the terms of which agreement the defendant agreed to deliver to the plaintiff certain other security in addition to said chattel mortgage, namely, certain bankable notes, to be taken from farmers for threshing to be done by the defendant to the amount of $50 for each week from October 3, 1890, to the 1st day of November, 1890. It was also agreed in the said agreement that, in case the additional security mentioned therein was not delivered upon demand made by appellant upon respondent, and upon five days' notice of such demand, and failure upon the part of the respondent to so deliver the said security, the said three promissory notes should become immediately due and payable. The complaint alleges that demand was made and notice given, and that the respondent failed and refused to deliver the security so agreed to be delivered. Default having been made by the defendant in complying with the conditions of the chattel mortgage, the plaintiff proceeded to foreclose the same, as provided by statute; and on the 29th day of October, 1890, sold the property at public auction for the sum of $1,500. The sheriff, after deducting his fees, paid the balance of the proceeds of such sale to the plaintiff, the mortgagee in said chattel mortgage. There being an unpaid balance due upon the notes and mortgage, after applying the proceeds of the sale aforesaid, the plaintiff brings this action to recover the same. The foregoing facts are set forth in the complaint of the plaintiff, to which the defendant demurs, upon the ground that the same does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and from the action of the district court in sustaining such demurrer this appeal is taken. The contention of respondent is that the plaintiff, in bringing his action for the recovery of the deficiency, has mistaken his remedy. The statutes of Idaho provide how chattel mortgages may be foreclosed in this state, namely, either by notice and sale, as was done in the case under consideration, or by action in the district court. When the former course is adopted, the officer making the sale is required to make return upon the affidavit of all his proceedings, and file the same with the clerk of the district court having jurisdiction in the county in which the same was made, all of which was done in the present case; and from the return of the officer so made it appeared that, after applying the proceeds derived from the sale of the mortgaged property upon the mortgage debt, there still remained a deficiency of something over $900. The statutes of Idaho provide, in the case of foreclosure of a mortgage on real estate, for the docketing of a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, and against the defendant or defendants personally liable for the debt; but this provision does not apply in case of a foreclosure of a chattel mortgage by notice, affidavit, and sale. How, then, was the plaintiff to recover the deficiency? We know of no other proper course, except the one adopted by it. All the rights of the defendant were fully protected. Any defense he might have, or desire to make, to the foreclosure proceedings, was permissible in this action, and we cannot divine what reasonable objection could be raised to it. By the terms of the chattel mortgage and contemporaneous written agreement, upon default in any of the conditions all three notes were to become due. The judgment of the district court is reversed, and the cause remanded, costs to appellant.

WATER-RIGHTS—IRRIGATION—CONTRACTS FOR USE.

1. An agreement between parties who have settled upon lands in the vicinity of a stream of water capable of being utilized for the purposes of irrigation, as to the appropriation of the water for such purpose, and as to the relative quantity which each shall be entitled to use, where such agreement has been acted upon for a long time by the parties, and a violation of it by any of them would produce irreparable damage to others, will be enforced in a court of equity.

2. Where certain parties settled upon lands as above mentioned, and their lands would have been of little, if any, value without irrigation, and they co-operated in constructing dams and digging ditches for the purpose of conveying the water onto their respective parcels of land in order to irrigate them, held, in the absence of direct proof to the contrary, that it was evidence of a tacit agreement between them that each should be entitled to enjoy an equal share of the water which the stream afforded, which a court of equity in a proper case would enforce.

Appeal from circuit court, Cook county;
J. H. BIRD, Judge.

George H. Williams, for appellant.
George W. Barnes, for respondent.

THAYER, C. J. It appears from the pleadings and evidence in this case that the appellant's premises consist of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 2, the N. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ and the W. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 1, all in township 15 S., range 16 E., Willamette meridian; that he has been the owner of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of said section 2 since about the year 1870, and of the N. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ and the W. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of said section 1 since the 12th day of September, 1876, at which last-mentioned time he purchased the same from James McDonald, who was the owner thereof from about the year 1870 to the time of the sale to appellant. The evidence further shows that about the year 1870 a ditch was cut from the north side or right bank of the said creek to a point northerly through a part of the land of said Snoderly, where it intersected a slough or old channel, which extended west through the lands of said Snoderly and the appellant in the same course as the creek, northerly therefrom; that by means of said ditch the water from the creek ran into the said slough, and formed one of the channels referred to in the complaint; that the water from the said slough has been used more or less ever since it was turned into it by the appellant for the purpose of irrigating his land; that about the year 1876 the respondent located and constructed the ditch in question, which is connected at its head with the former ditch, and extends northerly over the lands of Snoderly and of said Wilson for some distance, and from thence in a westerly direction through Wilson's said land across the S. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ and the S. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 35 onto the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of said section 34, the lands of the respondent; that ever since the construction of the last-mentioned ditch the respondent has used the water of said creek for the purpose of irrigating his said lands, with the knowledge of the appellant, who acquiesced in such use except when, in consequence of the low stage of water in the creek, it interfered with his (appellant's) use thereof; that after the first ditch was constructed, and the waters of the creek were turned into the said slough, they washed out so large a channel that the waters of the entire creek were liable to run through it, and damage the lands over which it extended; that the settlers living in the vicinity thereupon built a dam at the point of connection of the said ditch and creek; that afterwards the respondent built another dam across the ditch about 100 yards below the first one, by means of which he turned the waters into his ditch, and about the same time the appellant built another dam across the slough about 200 yards below the one built by the respondent, by means of which he took the water out to irrigate his lands. The said lands require irrigation in order to insure a reasonable crop, and would be of little value for agricultural purposes without it. The said creek furnishes sufficient water for that purpose until about the 1st of June of each year. The flow from that time diminishes gradually until the latter part of August, when it usually ceases altogether. If the waters of the creek could be justly apportioned among the several land-owners above referred to it would doubtless enable each of them to cultivate his land with profit, and it is evident from the testimony and proofs in the case that such was the understanding among them in the outset. No one seems to have claimed any exclusive right to the water, and each has generally evinced a desire to respect the rights of the others in its use.

In view of the condition of the subject-matter and of the manner in which the several parties interested have treated it, I am convinced that there was a tacit agreement among them that each should be entitled to appropriate a just proportion of the water of the creek for the purpose of irrigating his land. Said parties were doubtless induced to locate where they did in order to secure the benefit of the water of the creek for the purpose mentioned, and the exercise of a liberal policy in extending the privilege was best calculated to influence the greater number of persons to make permanent settlement there, which is an important consideration in the founding of a frontier community. The parties appear to have co-operated in providing facilities for using the water to render their lands productive, and they no doubt intended to afford to each an equitable share of it. None of them could have reasonably supposed that he was acquiring an exclusive right to a definite and certain quantity of the water, or that he would be permitted to use it to the exclusion of the rights of the others in its use for similar purposes. Whether the respondent has appropriated more of the water than a due share thereof does not definitely appear; but he has set up an arbitrary claim to a thousand inches of it, which he insists he has secured by adverse user of a sufficient length of the time to establish a right by prescription. His claim, however, is not supported by the facts and circumstances attending the affair, and is inconsistent with the acts and conduct of the parties in the premises. He may have been entitled to the amount of water claimed for the purpose of irrigating his lands, but whether or not he was depends entirely upon the quantity which the stream was capable of furnishing. The rights of each of the parties regarding the use of the water are merely relative. Nor was the appellant entitled to an injunction restraining the respondent from diverting and using water from said creek for the purpose of irrigating his lands unless he sought to appropriate more than a just share thereof under the implied arrangement before referred to. There are, however, some items of testimony in the depositions which would indicate that the respondent's right to the use of the water was merely permissive; but a court of equity in such a matter will give effect to the intention of the parties as ascertained from their acts regarding it, and the circumstances connected therewith, where it is not satisfactorily shown by direct evidence. I am fully satisfied in this case that it was the intention of the parties before named, as between themselves, to enjoy equal rights in the use of the waters of the said creek, and that they acted upon such intention in building the said dams and in the construction of said ditches, and that the same should be carried into effect. This court held in Coffman v. Robbins, 8 Or. 278, that a parol agreement to divide water which passed through the lands of different persons, each of whom prepared ditches for conducting the water, and took and enjoyed it for a number of years under the agreement, would be upheld and enforced in equity, although the only consideration for the agreement was the digging of the ditches and the taking care of the water. The principle determined in that case is, I think, applicable to this one; and if the said parties were all before the court I should be in favor of rendering such a decree as would enforce it, but we cannot bind persons who have not been made parties to the suit. There is, however, some direct proof in the case, and rather strong inferences that the respondent has been accustomed at times to use more of the said water than he was entitled to upon the basis suggested, and he claims an absolute right to use certain specific amounts, regardless of the amount of the supply. I am of the opinion, therefore, that the circuit court, instead of rendering the decree appealed from, should have decreed that the respondent be restrained and enjoined from using any more of the water than an equal share with the other parties named, whenever there was a sufficient quantity of it in the said stream to fully supply them all. Such a decree can be enforced in the mode pointed out in Olmsted v. Loomis, 9 N. Y. 423, and approved by this court in the City of Salem v. Flouring-Mills Co., 12 Or. 387, 7 Pac. Rep. 497, or by any other suitable and practical mode which may be adopted. The contention in Olmsted v. Loomis was in regard to the use of water for hydraulic purposes, but I think the principle is equally applicable to a case like the present one. Under this view the decree appealed from must be reversed, and a decree entered in accordance with the principle above laid down, and the case remanded to the said circuit court with directions to enter such decree as the decree of that court, and enforce it by such mode of procedure as to the said court may seem most suitable, and proper. Neither party will be entitled to costs and disbursements in the suit or upon the appeal, but each is required to pay the costs and disbursements which he has incurred. The costs and disbursements, however, which may be incurred in the enforcement of the decree shall be taxed against the respondent in case he refuses to observe its terms.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. July 1, 1890.)

PUBLIC LANDS—HOMESTEAD CLAIMANT—TITLE BY RELATION—RIPARIAN RIGHTS—TITLE UNDER EXECUTION SALE—HOMESTEAD EXEMPTION—WATER-RIGHTS.

1. By the act of congress of March 14, 1880, (21 St. 141,) any settler who had or should thereafter settle on any of the public lands of the United States, whether surveyed or unsurveyed, with the intention of claiming the same under the homestead laws, was allowed the same time to file his homestead application and perfect his original entry, in the United States land-office, as was allowed to settlers under the pre-emption laws to put their claims on record, and his right relates back to the date of settlement, the same as if he settled under the pre-emption laws.

2. A homestead claimant's riparian rights attach from the date of his settlement, provided he complies with the law, and obtains a patent for the land; and, when such patent is issued, it relates to the date of settlement, and cuts off the right to divert a stream of water running through such homestead.

3. An execution, regular upon its face, emanating from a court of competent jurisdiction, will protect an officer who obeys it; but, when a purchaser claims title under an execution sale, the judgment upon which the execution was issued must be proven.

4. By section 278, Hill's Code, an execution is returnable within 60 days after its receipt by the sheriff; and by section 298 the time may be enlarged 30 days by the consent of the plaintiff indorsed upon the writ.

5. When there has been no levy under an execution, and the return-day has expired, and the writ is functus officio, and confers no authority whatever, a levy and sale by virtue of it is a nullity.

6. Under the act of congress granting homesteads to actual settlers on the public lands of the United States, a homestead is not liable to be sold by virtue of an execution issued upon a judgment rendered for a debt contracted before a patent is issued for such homestead. Clark v. Bayley, 5 Or. 343, followed.

7. The sheriff in office at the time the certificate is produced and the deed demanded is the proper officer to make the deed, and not the one whose term of office has expired, although he may have made the sale before his office expired.

8. The evidence as to adverse user of water in controversy examined, and held insufficient to prove an adverse user for 10 years.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from circuit court, Baker county; JAS. A. FEE, Judge.

C. H. Carey, for appellant. M. L. Olmsted and J. F. Watson, for respondent.

STRAHAN, J. A proper disposition of this case requires that we should notice the sources of title set up by the respective claimants, and in doing so it will be most convenient to first examine the defendant's title. In the year 1869 the lands through which Connor creek flows, and which are described in the defendant's answer, were unsurveyed and unoccupied public lands of the United States. During that year one Christian Hinckler settled upon the same as a homestead, and after the said land had been surveyed, on the 6th day of March, 1883, he made his regular application therefor, alleging his settlement thereon in February or March, 1869. On this application a patent was duly issued by the United States to said Hinckler, dated the 13th day of March, 1885. After Hinckler had perfected his right to said land under the homestead laws of the United States, he died intestate, in Baker county, Or., and John Geiser was duly appointed his administrator. Thereafter such proceedings were had in the county court of Baker county Or., in the administration of said estate, that an order was duly made by said court, by virtue of which order the said real estate was sold by said administrator to the defendant, Cooke, for the sum of $1,550. This sale was duly confirmed by said court, and on the 5th day of July, 1887, said administrator executed and delivered to the defendant, Cooke, a deed to said premises, together with all the water-rights and privileges, ditches and ditch-rights, and all and singular improvements, tenements, hereditaments, and appurtenances. The evidence tends to show that as early as 1872 Hinckler, commencing on his homestead and near the line, cut a ditch extending nearly the entire length of his claim, by means of which he diverted the waters of Connor creek for the purposes of irrigating his land for agricultural and horticultural purposes, and that this claim is bounded on one side for almost its entire length by Snake river, and that Connor creek flows almost directly across the defendant's land, and empties into said river on said premises, so that there are no riparian owners below the defendant on said creek. In 1874 Hinckler dug another ditch, by which he diverted a portion of the waters of Connor creek, commencing a short distance above his land, by which means he conveyed the water to his land, and for a long distance through the same, and then, again leaving his land, the water was conveyed to a placer mining claim, where the same was used for some time for mining. After the mine was worked out, the water flowing in this ditch was also used by the said Hinckler for irrigating his land. Hinckler's ditches are numbered, respectively, 1 and 2. Ditch numbered 3 taps Connor creek above No. 2, and conveys water to the land of Hill, mentioned in the pleadings. This is an old ditch, but was dug after the ditches numbered 1 and 2, and was repaired and used by Hill some 3 or 4 years ago. The ditch marked "No. 4" on the plat taps Connor creek a long distance above No. 3, and is known as the "Tartar & Huffman Ditch," and was used for a while to convey water to a placer mine in Douglas gulch. It was also constructed after Hinckler had settled upon his homestead, and had diverted the water from Connor creek in both ditches numbered 1 and 2. Whatever right, title, or interest Hinckler had in the land described at the time of his death passed to the defendant by virtue of the deed made by the administrator of Hinckler. It is therefore necessary to determine what rights Hinckler acquired in said land by virtue of his homestead settlement and subsequent compliance with the act of congress granting homesteads to actual settlers upon the public lands of the United States, and the issuance to him of a patent therefor by the United States. Under the third section of the act of congress of March 14, 1880, c. 89, (21 St. 141,) it is provided that "any settler who has settled, or who shall hereafter settle, on any of the public lands of the United States, whether surveyed or unsurveyed, with the intention of claiming the same under the homestead laws, shall be allowed the same time to file his homestead application and perfect his original entry in the United States land-office as is now allowed to settlers under the pre-emption laws to put their claims on record, and his right shall relate back to the date of settlement, the same as if he settled under the pre-emption laws." In Larsen v. Navigation Co., 23 Pac. Rep. 974, (decided at the present term,) it was held, in effect, that a settlement made by a homestead claimant upon the public lands of the United States, and compliance with act of congress on the subject, segregated the same from the public lands, and cut off intervening claims, and such is the ruling of the land department of the United States. Since the announcement of the opinion in Larsen v. Navigation Co., supra, this case was argued, and our attention has been called to the recent opinion of the supreme court of the United States in Sturr v. Beck, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 350. The opinion of the court in that case is very exhaustive, and fully and conclusively settles the legal question under consideration adversely to the appellant. In that case the identical question, in principle, involved here, was presented; and it was held that a homestead claimant's riparian rights attached from the date of his settlement, provided he complied with the law, and obtained a patent for the land; and that when such patent was issued it related to the date of settlement, and cut off the right to divert a stream of water running through such homestead. But the claimant claims to have a superior right to this water, and he seeks to prove title to same in two ways: First, through an ex-sheriff's deed offered in evidence, purporting to convey certain ditches and water-rights of Hinckler to A. J. Lawrence; and, second, by prior appropriation and adverse possession of the water for more than 10 years.

2. These claims will therefore be examined. The deed of Ex-Sheriff Boyd, of Baker county, is dated the 24th day of April, 1877. The deed recites that the execution upon which the sale was made was tested the 13th of May, 1866, on a judgment rendered the same day by the circuit court of the state of Oregon for Baker county in favor of Louis Pfeiffenberger & Co., and against Christian Hinckler. The date of the levy is not recited in the deed, but it is recited that the sale was made on the 17th day of September, 1874, more than eight years after the execution. The amount of judgment is not mentioned, but the deed recites that the sum of $300 was realized upon the sale, and it is stated that the sale was confirmed on the 13th day of October, 1875. After reciting the sale of the two ditches running through the Hinckler homestead, before referred to in this opinion, and numbered 1 and 2, the deed undertakes to convey the same to A. J. Lawrence. The respondent takes several objections to this deed. One is that no judgment was offered in evidence, and therefore it is not shown that the execution recited in the deed was legally issued. An execution, regular upon its face, emanating from a court of competent jurisdiction, will protect an officer who obeys it; but the rule is different when a purchaser claims under an execution sale. In such case, it is well settled that a person seeking to recover property, and basing his claim upon an execution sale, must prove the judgment upon which the writ issued. 2 Freem. Ex'ns, § 850; McRae v. Daviner, 8 Or. 63.

3. It is next objected that the execution at the time of sale was dead in the hands of the ex-sheriff; that the official life of the sheriff had terminated; and that the writ, by lapse of time, had ceased to be of any validity for any purpose whatever. This objection must also prevail. By section 278, Hill's Code, an execution is returnable, within 60 days after its receipt by the sheriff, to the clerk's office from whence it issued; and by section 293 this time may be enlarged 30 days by the consent of the plaintiff indorsed upon the writ. In this case it does not appear that the officer had made a levy under the execution while it was still in force. The sole question, therefore, is whether or not a sheriff may hold an execution until long after the return-day, and until his term of office has expired, and then make a levy and sale. No authority was cited upon the argument to uphold such a proceeding, and I think none can be found. On the contrary, such a writ is functus officio, and confers no authority whatever, and any attempted levy and sale by virtue of it are nullities. Freem. Ex'ns, 58, 106; Lehr v. Rogers, 3 Smeles & M. 468; Kane v. Preston, 24 Miss. 133; Dale v. Medcalf, 9 Pa. St. 108; Cash v. Tozer, 1 Watts & S. 519.

4. Another difficulty presents itself. The two ditches dug by Hinckler, and which are claimed to have been sold by virtue of this execution, were dug mainly through his homestead. One was used exclusively to irrigate his land, and the other also after a small placer mine had been worked out. Without the use of this water upon the land, it would be of but little value, and could probably never have been occupied as a homestead, or for any agricultural or horticultural purposes. I think, therefore, that we must treat the ditches, and the water in them, flowing over this homestead, and used for the purpose of irrigating it, as a part of the land itself, and not severable therefrom. In such case, the homestead is exempt from liability for debts contracted prior to the issuing of the patent. Clark v. Bayley, 5 Or. 343.

5. Finally, it is objected that an ex-sheriff has no power in this state to make a deed to property sold on execution. This question appears to have been considered by this court in Moore v. Locks Co., 7 Or. 359, in which the conclusion was reached that the sheriff in office at the time the certificate is produced and the deed demanded is the proper officer to make the deed, and not the one who made the sale, and whose term of office expired. The plaintiff does not use, or seek to use, either one of the Hinckler ditches described in this ex-sheriff's deed, and, so far as I can see, the only object of its introduction was to extinguish Hinckler's right to the water flowing in his ditches, and to transfer the title to the water, as severed and separated from the land, to the plaintiff by mesne conveyances from Lawrence. In other words, it is claimed that by this deed Lawrence acquired this right to the water, and that he, or his successors in interest, might lawfully divert it into other ditches, and take it for their own use and benefit, and that Hinckler's right to the water, whether as riparian owner or first appropriator, thus became vested in Lawrence and his successors in interest. If there were no valid objection to the deed, and the land and water where it flowed had been subject to levy and sale, I doubt very much whether the results claimed by the appellant would have followed. What Lawrence claimed to have acquired by that sale were the ditches across Hinckler's land, and the water in them. I do not see how it gave him any right to the water before it entered the ditches, or conferred upon him the right to go higher up the stream, and there dig ditches of his own, and take the water out at another and different place. But it is unnecessary to decide this question, for the reasons already indicated.

6. The remaining question is whether or not the plaintiff, and those under whom he claims, had acquired a title to this water by adverse user prior to the commencement of this suit. Did the plaintiff, and those under whom he claims, have such open, exclusive, notorious, and continuous adverse use of this water as to bar the rights of the defendant, either as riparian owner or first appropriator of it? On this subject I have carefully read all of the plaintiff's evidence two or three times, to ascertain the real foundation of his claim, and it all rests on the ex-sheriff's deed to Lawrence. One Davis claims to have been in possession of the water in Hinckler's ditches as Lawrence's tenant, and he delivered possession to Tartar & Huffman, from whom the plaintiff seeks to deraign title; but the possession was never exclusive, and it was not continuous. Hinckler, as long as he lived, firmly asserted his right to this water against all claimants, and maintained it with so much firmness that he lost his life in a difdifficulty with Davis, growing out of the disputed claims to the water now in controversy. Giving full effect to the evidence on each side, and it appears that for several years no one had the exclusive use of the water,—sometimes one was using it and then another,—but the possession of none of the claimants was continuous, or of such a character as to constitute adverse possession against the others. It was intimated on the argument by the appellant's counsel that the water in controversy ought equitably to be divided between the parties; but I am unable to find in the evidence anything whatever upon which a division might properly be made. Finding no error in the decree of the court below, it must be affirmed.

STATE V. HORNE:

(Supreme Court of Oregon. April 14, 1891.)

INDICTMENT—STRIKING OUT SURPLUSAGE.

All unnecessary words in an indictment may, after judgment, be rejected as surplusage, and, if the indictment is good after striking them out, the conviction must stand.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from circuit court, Multnomah county; L. B. STEARNS, Judge.

V. K. Strode and Sears & Beach, for appellant. T. A. Stephens, Dist. Atty., and W. T. Humm, for the State.

BEAN, J. The defendant was tried, convicted, and sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary for the term of 10 years, under an indictment, the charging part of which is as follows: "The said Samuel J. Horne, on the 26th day of August, A. D. 1890, in the county of Multnomah and state of Oregon, did willfully, unlawfully, feloniously, forcibly, and violently make an assault in and upon one Ella Bennett, a female child under the age of fourteen years, by then and there unlawfully, feloniously, forcibly, and violently ravishing and carnally knowing her, the said Ella Bennett, against her will," etc. The contention of appellant is that this indictment charges only the crime of an assault, and that the court erred in sentencing him to imprisonment in the penitentiary. The argument is that the language, "by then and there unlawfully, feloniously, forcibly, and violently ravishing and carnally knowing her, the said Ella Bennett, against her will," is only descriptive of the means by which the assault was committed, and does not charge the crime of rape. No objection was made to the indictment in the court below, but the question is raised here for the first time, and therefore the only question to be considered is, does the indictment sufficiently charge carnal knowledge of the female under the age of fourteen years? By section 1733, Hill's Code, it is provided that, "if any person shall carnally know any female child under the age of fourteen, * * * such person shall be deemed guilty of rape, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be punished," etc. By this section a female under the age of 14 years is conclusively presumed to be incapable of consenting to sexual intercourse, and a man who has connection with such a female, although she may have in fact consented, is guilty of rape. As carnal knowledge, with or without force, in such case, is rape, it follows that the allegations of force and want of consent in an indictment are mere surplusage, and need not be proved, and, as a consequence, that all the allegations in the indictment before us of the assault by defendant may be rejected, and, if the indictment is good after striking them out, the conviction must stand. State v. Abrams, 11 Or. 169, 8 Pac. Rep. 327; State v. Tom Louey, 11 Or. 326, 8 Pac. Rep. 353; State v. Webster, 39 N. H. 96; Davis v. State, 42 Tex. 226. Turning, now, to the indictment, we find it inartificially drawn, and containing much unnecessary language; but we think it clearly charges the defendant with carnally knowing Ella Bennett, female child under the age of 14 years, and that is all that is necessary to support a conviction. Sections 1279, 1280, Hill's Code. The indictment seems to have been drawn in a somewhat careless manner, and without regard to the form provided by statute, and that accuracy which should always be used in the preparation of such instruments; but the defendant did not see proper to avail himself in the court below of any defect in the indictment, and we think it is now too late for him to do so. The judgment of the court below will therefore be affirmed.

PACIFIC EXP. CO. v. FOLEY.

CARRIERS OF FREIGHT—LIMITING LIABILITY.

1. Where the receipt or contract of a common carrier contains a stipulation that the company is not to be held liable for any loss or damage, except as forwarders only, nor for any loss or damage of any box, package, or thing for over $50, unless the just and true value thereof is stated in such receipt, and where the receipt fails to show any value of the box or goods shipped, the receipt or contract, if fairly and voluntarily entered into, will be upheld as a proper and lawful mode of securing a due proportion between the amount for which the carrier may be responsible and the freight he receives, when the loss or injury to the box or goods carried results only from slight, common, or ordinary negligence on the part of the carrier, its agents or servants.

2. The case of Kallman v. Express Co., 8 Kan. 205, referred to and commented on.

3. Railroad Co. v. Simpson, 30 Kan. 645, 2 Pac. Rep. 821, distinguished, as the carrier in that case arbitrarily and unfairly fixed in the bill of lading or receipt a limitation on the value of the property shipped.

VALENTINE, J., dissenting.

Error from district court, Douglas county; A. W. BENSON, Judge.

On the 4th day of November, 1887, Peter T. Foley brought his action against the Pacific Express Company before a justice of the peace of Douglas county to recover $175, for damages alleged to have been sustained by him in the transportation of a box containing type and electrotype plates from Kansas City, Mo., to Lawrence, in this state, on October 15, 1887, from the A. N. Kellogg Newspaper Company at Kansas City, Mo., by the Pacific Express Company. The following is a copy of the receipt given by the express company for the box in controversy:

The Pacific Express Company.

"Not negotiable.

"Received from ——— the following articles, which we undertake to forward to the point nearest to destination reached by this company only, perils of navigation excepted. And it is hereby expressly agreed that the said Pacific Express Company are not to be held liable for any loss or damage, except as forwarders only, nor for any loss or damage of any box, package, or thing for over $50, unless the just and true value thereof is herein stated, nor for any loss or damage by fire, the acts of God, or of the enemies of the government, the restraint of governments, mobs, riots, insurrections, or pirates, or from any of the dangers incident to a time of war; nor upon any property or thing, unless properly packed and secured for transportation; nor for any fragile fabrics, unless so marked upon the package containing the same; nor upon any fabrics consisting of or contained in glass. If any sum of money, besides the charge for transportation, is to be collected from consignee on delivery of the property described herein, and the same is not paid within thirty days from date hereof, the shipper agrees that this company may return said property to him, at their option, at the expiration of that time, subject to the conditions of this receipt, and that he will pay the charges for transportation both ways, and that the liability of this company for such property, while in its possession, for the purpose of making such collection, shall be that of warehousemen only. And it is further agreed that the said Pacific Express Company shall not be held liable for any claim, of whatsoever nature, arising from this contract, unless such claim shall be presented in writing sixty days from date hereof, in a statement to which this receipt shall be annexed; and the shipper and owner hereby severally agree that all the stipulations and conditions in this receipt contained shall extend to and inure to the benefit of each and every company or person to whom the Pacific Express Company may intrust or deliver the above-described property for transportation, (which the said Pacific Express Company is hereby authorized to do,) and shall define and limit the liability thereof of such other company or person:

Date, 1887.	Articles.	Value.	Consignee.	Destination.	Receipt by.
Oct. 15.	1 box.		P. T. Foley.	Lawrence, Kansas.	Glass."

On the first page of the receipt book, after the printed words, "Received from," there was written, "A. N. Kellogg Newspaper Co.;" and on the following pages nothing was written in the blank after the words, "Received from." Before the commencement of this action, J. K. Johnston, superintendent of the Pacific Express Company, tendered to Mr. Foley for that company $50, in payment for the damage to the box, but Mr. Foley refused to accept that amount. Trial had before the justice of the peace on November 8, 1887, and the plaintiff recovered judgment for $144.55 and interest and costs. The action was appealed to the district court. Trial had before the court with a jury at the February term, 1888. The jury returned a general verdict for the plaintiff for $144.55, with interest, and also made special findings. Subsequently judgment was rendered upon the general verdict. The defendant excepted, and brings the case here.

A. L. Williams and Chas. Monroe, for plaintiff in error. John Hutchings, for defendant in error.

HORTON, C. J., (after stating the facts as above.) The principal question in this case is, what effect is to be given to the following language of the receipt executed by the express company? "It is hereby expressly agreed that the said Pacific Express Company is not to be held liable for any loss or damage, except as forwarders only; nor for any loss or damage of any box, package, or thing for over $50, unless the just and true value thereof is herein stated." It appears that the type and electrotypes plates were shipped from Kansas City to Lawrence by the A. N. Kellogg Newspaper Company, who, in making the shipment, acted for Peter T. Foley. It also appears that the newspaper company had a receipt-book furnished by the express company, and in the heading to each page were printed conditions, and, among others, the one quoted. The newspaper company, having this book in its possession and control, and using it from day to day, must be presumed to have known of its conditions, and to have shipped with reference to it. In this they acted for the plaintiff, and he must be presumed to have assented to the terms and conditions of the receipt. The jury made the following special findings in answer to questions submitted to them: "Question. Was not the box containing the type and electrotypes in controversy broken while it was still in the car in which it was brought from Kansas City? Answer. It was found broken in the car. Q. If you should find that said box was broken open by any negligence of the company, state what act or thing caused said box to be broken. A. We do not know. Q. Do the jury know where on the journey the box was broken open? If so, state where. A. We do not know. Q. Were not the agents of defendant negligent in taking the box out of the car? A. Yes. Q. Could they not have saved the contents of the box by handling the box carefully when it was taken out of the car? A. Yes, to the best of our knowledge and belief."

The district court, among other things, instructed the jury that "while a common carrier is generally, in the absence of any such limitation, liable absolutely, as an insurer, against all loss except that caused by the act of God and the public enemy, it may limit such liability by special conditions such as contained in this receipt, but such special contract cannot relieve the company from its own negligence. It follows that in this case the company is liable, if at all, not as an insurer, but solely for negligence in the transportation of the property. 'Negligence' is a negative term, implying the want or absence of ordinary care; that is, that care and caution that men of ordinary prudence usually exercise under like circumstances. Whether the defendant company was so negligent, and, if so, whether such negligence caused the injuries complained of, are questions of fact for the jury, to be determined from all the evidence. You should consider the condition of the material when delivered to them; the manner in which it was boxed; the nature of the articles, so far as they could be seen and known by the shipper; the manner in which such property is handled; the condition and circumstances in which it was found at the place of destination; and taking into consideration all the surrounding circumstances and facts proven, and using that ordinary knowledge, observation, and experience in life that men generally possess, you must say whether the loss and injury were attributable to the want of ordinary care and diligence on the part of the express company. If they were, the plaintiff may recover his actual loss; otherwise, he cannot recover beyond the sum of fifty dollars." The express company asked the court to instruct the jury as follows: "(1) The jury are instructed to return a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of fifty dollars. (2) The agreement in the receipt that defendant will not be liable for more than fifty dollars for any shipment, unless the true value of such shipment is stated in the receipt, is a valid agreement, and relieves the defendant of liability as insurer for all amounts over fifty dollars, leaving it liable in excess of fifty dollars only for gross negligence, and the burden of proving gross negligence is upon the plaintiff."

1. It is settled by the decisions of this court, and by the great weight of authority, that a common carrier cannot stipulate for exemption from responsibility for the negligence of himself or his servants, on grounds of public policy, even by express contract. Railroad Co. v. Simpson, 30 Kan. 645, 2 Pac. Rep. 821; Railroad Co. v. Lockwood, 17 Wall. 357, and the cases therein cited; 2 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 822. But this is not the question presented by the record in this case. The receipt executed by the express company, and knowingly and voluntarily accepted by the shipper through his agent, expressly provided "that the express company was not to be liable for any loss or damage to the box, for over fifty dollars, if the just and true value thereof was not stated." The true and just value of the box was not stated in the receipt or to the company by the shipper. The trial court very properly instructed the jury "that the shipper must be presumed to have assented to the terms and conditions of the receipt." Two questions are therefore presented for our determination: First, May a common carrier limit his liability to an amount stated in a written receipt or special contract, in the event of loss or injury to the goods or property through ordinary negligence, if such special contract is freely, voluntarily, and fairly entered into by the parties, and such contract is just and reasonable in its terms? Second, Did the written receipt or special contract between the shipper and express company in this case limit the liability of the company for loss or injury to the amount of fifty dollars?

The better authorities declare the law to be that the value of the property transported may be agreed upon, and the damage or loss to the property occasioned by the negligence of the company or its servants will be limited to the agreed valuation. The Hart Case, 112 U. S. 331, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 151, may now be called the leading case in America. Mr. Justice BLATCHFORD, delivering the opinion of the court in that case, said, among other things, that "it is the law of this court that a common carrier may, by special contract, limit his common-law liability, but that he cannot stipulate for exemption from the consequences of his own negligence or that of his servants. * * * There is no justice in allowing the shipper to be paid a large value for an article which he has induced the carrier to take at a low rate of freight, on the assertion and agreement that its value is a less sum than that claimed after a loss. It is just to hold the shipper to his agreement, fairly made as to value, even where the loss or injury has occurred through the negligence of the carrier. * * * The limitation as to value has no tendency to exempt from liability for negligence. It does not induce want of care. It exacts from the carrier the measure of care due to the value agreed on. The carrier is bound to respond in that value for negligence. The compensation for carriage is based upon that value. The shipper is estopped from saying that the value is greater. The articles have no greater value, for the purpose of the contract of transportation, between the parties to that contract. The carrier must respond for negligence up to that value. It is just and reasonable that such a contract, fairly entered into, and where there is no deceit practiced on the shipper, should be upheld. There is no violation of public policy. On the contrary, it would be unjust and unreasonable, and would be repugnant to the soundest principles of fair dealing and of the freedom of contracting, and thus in conflict with public policy, if a shipper should be allowed to reap the benefit of the contract if there is no loss, and to repudiate it in case of loss." See, also, Harvey v. Railroad Co., 74 Mo. 539; Brehme v. Dinsmore, 25 Md. 829; Railroad Co. v. Sherrod, 84 Ala. 178, 4 South. Rep. 29; Duntley v. Railroad, (N. H., 1890), 20 Atl. Rep. 327; Magnin v. Dinsmore, 62 N. Y. 35; Squire v. Railroad Co., 98 Mass. 239-245; Graves v. Railroad Co., 137 Mass. 33; Hill v. Railroad Co., 144 Mass. 284, 10 N. E. Rep. 836; Falkenau v. Fargo, 35 N. Y. Super. Ct. 332, 55 N. Y. 642; Ghormley v. Dinsmore, 53 N. Y. Super. Ct. 36; Westcott v. Fargo, 6 Lans. 328; Grace v. Adams, 100 Mass. 505; Pemberton Co. v. New York Cent. R. Co., 104 Mass. 144; Breese v. Tel-

As to the second question proposed, we think that the limitation in the written receipt or special contract not to be liable for any loss or damage over $50, in this case, stands as if the carrier had asked the value of the box and its contents, and had been told by the shipper "that the value was fifty dollars only," or, which is the same thing, had been told by the shipper "that, if loss or damage occurred to the box or its contents, he would not demand over fifty dollars." In Kallman v. Express Co., 3 Kan. 205, it was said that "no value was given in the bill of lading which was delivered to the shipper by the express company, and received by him without objection; thus consenting and agreeing that the plaintiffs should be bound by its terms. If he had desired to make the company responsible for the full value of the goods, he had only to furnish them with the amount, and have it inserted in the bill. But it may be said that the company was bound to make inquiry as to the value of the goods, if they desired to obtain the benefit of this limitation upon their liability. We confess that we are not able to see any good reason for making such a requirement a condition precedent in such case. The company exhibits to the employer the exact condition upon which they will receive his property for carriage, to which he may assent or not, as he may choose. If he assent, we think he should be bound thereby. As in this case, if the real value of the property was $592.53, the employer, in case of loss, would be as much, nay more, interested in having such value truly stated in the bill of lading or receipt as the company could possibly be in having the value understated. He ought, then, to have made known to the company the true value of the goods, and more especially as the limitation upon the liability of the company was so plainly stated in the receipt." We do not quote this part of the opinion in the above case because it is necessarily conclusive or binding as a prior decision of this court, as, in that case, the trial court granted a new trial. This court affirmed the action of the court below. Much said in the former opinion, outside of affirming the action of the court in granting a new trial, we consider obiter dictum. The trial court in that case, in granting the new trial, did not pass upon a pure, simple, and unmixed question of law. This court has decided time and again that "the granting of a new trial is largely in the discretion of the trial court; and where a new trial is given, and the record does not show upon what grounds the court granted such new trial, but the record does show errors upon which the trial court might have granted a new trial, the order granting such trial will not be disturbed." Barney v. Dudley, 40 Kan. 247, 19 Pac. Rep. 550; Howell v. Pugh, 25 Kan. 96; (City of Sedan v. Church, 29 Kan. 190. See Betz v. Land, etc., Co., ante, 456, recently decided.) "It is a maxim not to be disregarded, that general expressions in every opinion are to be taken in connection with the case in which those expressions are used. If they go beyond the case, they may be respected, but ought not to control the judgment in a subsequent suit, when the very point is presented for decision. The reason of this maxim is obvious." Cohens v. Virginia, 6 Wheat. 264, 399, 400. But we have referred to that part of the Kallman opinion because the court below charged the jury "that the Kellogg Newspaper Company, having this receipt-book in its possession and control, and using it from day to day, must be presumed to have known of such conditions, and to have shipped with reference to it. In this it acted for the plaintiff, and he must be presumed to have assented to the terms and conditions of the receipt;" and because this part of the charge of the trial court and the part of the opinion quoted from the Kallman Case is in accordance with reason, fairness, and justice. This part of the opinion also answers the objection "that the value of the property transported was not agreed upon."

As is forcibly argued by counsel, "the express company took the property, and signed a receipt presented to it by plaintiff's agent. It is true that it was one of a book of receipts furnished by the express company, but the receipts were all in blank, the printed part containing all the regulations that the express company required the shipper to comply with. The blanks were all left for the shipper to fill in any way he pleased; and in whatever way he filled the blanks the express company was bound to receipt for the property covered by the receipt. When the shipper had filled the blank and presented it to the express company for its signature, he was in the attitude of proposing an agreement to the express company for acceptance. The signature of the express company was the completion of the agreement, and the agreement as completed so far as it related to the value of the property, was not a limitation of liability for negligence in any way, but a square agreement that the property presented for carriage and covered by the receipt was only worth fifty dollars." In Oppenheimer v. Express Co., 69 Ill. 62, the facts were about as follows: May and Stern shipped by the United States Express Company a box weighing 25 pounds, from New York city to Oppenheimer & Co., at Chicago, Ill. It contained jewelry of the value of $3,800. The receipt given by the express company was similar in that case to the receipt given by the Pacific Express Company in this case. The blank for the value of the box and contents was not filled in. But the limitation of $50 was in the receipt in that case, as in this. The box and its contents were destroyed by fire in the office of the express company at Chicago. Oppenheimer & Co. brought an action to recover for the value of the contents of the box. Judgment was rendered in their favor for $50 only. They appealed. The judgment of the lower court was affirmed by the supreme court of Illinois. In rendering its opinion that court said: "The terms and conditions on which the company received the property for transportation were clearly expressed in the body of the receipt, and in a way not calculated to escape attention. It must be supposed that these men paid some attention to the transaction of their business, and were reasonably well informed in regard to the nature of their contracts. That they should have been so, doing business with this company for years, handling, filling out, and procuring the execution of these shipping receipts without a knowledge of their general character and effect, it is difficult to believe. They must be held to have had such knowledge. * * * A distinction exists between the effect of those notices by a carrier which seek to discharge him from duties which the law has annexed to his employment, and those, like the one in question, designed simply to insure good faith and fair dealing on the part of his employer.—In the former case, notice alone not being effectual without an assent to the attempted restriction; while in the latter case, notice alone, if brought home to the knowledge of the owner of the property delivered for carriage, will be sufficient." A part of the syllabus of that case reads: "An express company has the right to demand from a consignor such information as will enable it to decide on the proper compensation to charge for the risk, and the degree of care to bestow in discharging its trust; and a limitation of its liability, not to exceed $50, unless the value of the goods forwarded is truly stated, if brought to the knowledge of the consignor, is reasonable and consistent with public policy." The court finally disposed of the above case upon the ground that there was a "designed suppression of the value of the goods." It was said in the opinion, among other things, that "there was an actual attempt here by the agent of the shippers to fill in this blank space, but, instead of inserting '3,500,' (the value,) a mark or character was inserted inexpressive of any value. This shows that there was a designed suppression of the value of the goods. That was unfair conduct on the part of the shipper of the goods. The effect of such conduct to relieve the carrier from his liability as insurer is asserted in many cases, [here decisions are given.] Had the true value of the goods been disclosed, there would have been an extra charge of $9.50, increased precautions would have been taken for the safety of the goods, and, as the evidence shows, they would have been saved."

It may be said, in every case, that where a shipper fixes an agreed valuation upon his goods to be transported, or enters into a special contract with the carrier that if his goods are lost or injured he will not demand over $50, and thereby obtains cheaper rates, he is guilty of fraud, or attempted fraud, if his goods are lost or injured, and he demands for his damages an amount above the valuation or limitation agreed to. If it be true, as the trial court charged the jury, that "the plaintiff must be presumed, under the facts of this case, to have assented to the terms and conditions of the receipt," then, within the better authorities, the limitation of the carrier's liability, not to exceed $50, was the same as fixing the value of the property transported at $50 only, and the limitation of the express company's liability, not to exceed the $50 stated in the receipt, was reasonable and just. Boorman v. Express Co., 21 Wis. 154, is a case like this. A limitation of $50 was contained in the receipt. Chief Justice Dixon, writing the opinion, held that "an express company may exempt itself by special contract from liability as insurer; or for the default or negligence of any person to whom the property may be delivered by it, for the performance of any act or duty in respect thereto, off its own routes; or for loss or damage of any package for over $50, unless the just and true value thereof is stated in the receipt." In Duntley v. Railroad, supra, it was decided that "a regulation of a carrier with respect to the transportation of live animals, which fixes the ordinary value of horses, for which it will hold itself responsible in case of loss, at $200 each, and requires extra compensation for transporting animals of greater value, is reasonable and valid." In Durbin v. Express Co., (N. H., 1890,) 20 Atl. Rep. 828, the receipt was like the one in this case, and limited the liability to $50. It was held that "a shipper of goods who fills out one of the blank receipts contained in a book previously furnished by an express company for his use, and obtains the signature of the company's agent thereto, upon delivering to him a package for transportation, will be presumed to know the contents of the receipt; and, if he receives such receipt without objection, his assent as to its conditions will, in the absence of fraud, be conclusively presumed." CLARK, J., in delivering the opinion in that case, said: "The receipt signed by the defendant's agent and servant at the time of the delivery of the package was taken by the plaintiff as evidence of the fact and purpose of its delivery, and of the terms and conditions on which the defendants received it. The receipt was contained in a book of blank receipts previously furnished by the defendants for the use of the plaintiff, and the written portions were in his handwriting, and the law presumes that the contents were known to him. The plaintiff understood it to be the shipping contract, and, in the absence of fraud, by receiving it without objection, he was conclusively presumed to assent to its conditions. Merrill v. Express Co., 62 N. H. 514; Grace v. Adams, 100 Mass. 505. It is now generally held that the responsibility imposed on the carrier of goods by the common law may be restricted and qualified by express stipulation, where such stipulation is just and reasonable; and a stipulation that the carrier shall be informed as to the value of the goods delivered to him for carriage, as affecting the risk, and the degree of care required, is clearly reasonable. * * * The plaintiff understood that he was securing transportation of the box to New York at a reduced rate, (in fact, at one-fifth of the regular rate,) by calling the value $50, and assuming a portion of the risk of carriage himself; and, having agreed upon a valuation for the purpose of fixing the express charges, he cannot insist that the goods are of greater value, for the purpose of increasing his claim for damages for the loss. Nor is it material whether the loss arose from the negligence of the defendants or some other cause. The defendants agreed to respond in a sum not exceeding $50 in case of loss, and, for the purpose of the contract of transportation between the parties to the contract, the goods had no greater value." See, also, to the same effect, Squire v. Railroad Co., 98 Mass. 239; Railroad Co. v. Henlein, 52 Ala. 615; Magnin v. Dinsmore, 56 N. Y. 168; Railroad Co. v. Weakly, 50 Ark. 397, 8 S. W. Rep. 134. In Railroad Co. v. Wynn, (Tenn., Jan. 2, 1890,) 14 S. W. Rep. 311, special contracts for a limitation of the liability of a carrier are not sustained. It is said in that case, among other things, that "to our minds it is perfectly clear that the two kinds of stipulation—that providing for total, and that providing for partial, exemption from liability for the consequences of the carrier's negligence—stand upon the same ground, and must be tested by the same principles. If one can be enforced, the other can; if either be invalid, both must be held to be so,—the same considerations of public policy operating in each case." In our opinion, the reasons stated are wholly untenable. They proceed upon false premises. That court overlooks the power of the shipper to freely and fairly fix a valuation upon his own property. The carrier has the right to make reasonable rates for carriage. A total exemption from the liability on the part of a carrier would not be just or reasonable, and no person, having reason, would willingly and freely contract with a carrier that the property which he wished to have transported was absolutely worthless. The carrier is bound to receive and transport the property of the shipper. The shipper can place his own valuation upon the property delivered by him to the carrier to be transported. The carrier cannot arbitrarily fix any valuation on the property received from the shipper, but may reasonably insist on proper information as to the value of the property which he receives. He ought to have a right to know what it is that he undertakes to carry, and the amount and extent of his risk. Upon the value of the property, the risk incurred, and the distance the property is to be transported, the charges for carriage are fixed. Therefore it would seem to us that a contract fixing the value of the goods delivered to the carrier, or fixing a limitation of damage in case of loss or injury, is clearly reasonable, as affecting the risk and the degree of care required concerning the property to be transported. With the above and foregoing limitations, we cannot conceive how the carrier can evade his duty or nullify the law. Upon the authorities cited, the instructions of the trial court were erroneous, and the instruction prayed for by the express company for limitation as to damages should have been given.

There is nothing appearing in the evidence or the findings of the jury that show, or tend to show, gross negligence, fraud, or intentional wrong upon the part of the express company. In the case of Railroad Co. v. Simpson, 30 Kan. 645, 2

Pac. Rep. 821, the limitation was arbitrarily fixed by the carrier without the consent of the shipper. That contract was not just or reasonable, or freely or fairly entered into. It was in violation of public policy. It is unlike this case, because, when the box in controversy was shipped, the shipping clerk of the Kellogg Newspaper Company filled out a receipt, and a man by the name of Glass, a driver for the Pacific Express Company, signed it. No deceit or unfairness was practiced by the express company. In the case of Telegraph Co. v. Crall, 38 Kan. 679, 17 Pac. Rep. 309, gross negligence was involved. Whether a telegraph company could exempt itself by contract from ordinary negligence was not passed upon. That question was reserved. We do not think it is necessary to follow all that was stated in Kallman v. Express Co., supra, because, although that decision was made nearly 25 years ago, the question now at issue was not necessarily embraced in that decision, for the reasons heretofore named. The case of Railroad Co. v. Simpson, supra, followed Railroad Co. v. Lockwood, 17 Wall. 357. This case is referred to and clearly distinguished in the latter case of Hart v. Railroad Co., supra. Again, the box containing the type and plates was shipped from Kansas City, Mo. The receipt executed by the express company was executed and delivered at Kansas City, Mo., to the Kellogg Newspaper Company for P. T. Foley, the plaintiff below. In that state the law declared by the supreme court is that "a contract fairly entered into between carrier and shipper, specifying a fixed sum as the value of the property and limiting the recovery in case of loss to that sum, is binding on the shipper." Harvey v. Railroad Co., 74 Mo. 538. We must assume, so far as this case is concerned, that the parties, including the shipper and the express company, contracted with reference to the law of Missouri. The receipt was signed there, the box was delivered there, and was shipped from Missouri to Kansas. It seems to us that the shipper ought not to complain. If he had desired to insert in the receipt, which the express company was asked to sign, $144.55 as the full value of the box, or if he had desired to insert any larger amount, he had the option so to do, and if he had inserted the full value of the box and its contents he could have recovered the value. But as the shipper voluntarily limited his loss or damage to the sum of $50 only, why should he refuse to receive the sum of $50, which was tendered him by the superintendent of the express company when he presented his claim for damages? The receipt, as executed, was just as he desired and wished it. The damage in case of loss or injury to the box or its contents was liquidated in advance by the voluntary action of the parties. "The limitation as to the damages or value has no tendency, in such a case as this, to exempt from liability for negligence." Hart v. Railroad Co., supra. Generally, the charges for transporting a box or package valued at $144.50, $500, or $1,000 are more than when the value is $50 only, and if the shipper wishes to pay full charges and recover full value, in case of loss or injury from negligence, why should he not state to the carrier, or write in the receipt to be signed by the carrier, the full value? We now repeat what was said upon this point in the Kallman Express Co.'s Case, 3 Kan. 205, where the receipt was left blank as to the value, as in this case, but where a limitation was inserted in the receipt in case of loss or damage: "The company exhibits to the employer the exact conditions upon which it will receive his property for carriage, to which he may assent or not, as he may choose. If he assent, we think he should be bound thereby. As in this case, if the real value of the property was $592.53, the employer, in case of loss, would be as much, nay more, interested in having such value truly stated in the bill of lading or receipt as the company could possibly be in having the value understated. He ought, then, to have made known to the company the true value of the goods, and more especially as the limitation upon the liability of the company was so plainly stated in the receipt." The judgment of the district court will be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

JOHNSTON, J., concurs.

VALENTINE, J., (dissenting.) I think we should follow the decision made in the case of Kallman v. Express Co., 3 Kan. 205—First, because it is right; and, second, for the following reasons. It was made on February 17, 1865, more than 26 years ago; the courts have been open ever since, and 20 or more sessions of the legislature have intervened, and yet no modification of any of the rules therein enunciated have been made, but all seem to have been acquiesced in; and for these reasons it must be presumed that the parties to this action, and especially the express company, contracted with reference to such rules; and now, to overturn them, and to declare different rules for this case, would virtually be to make a new contract for the parties; and construing the present contract as the contract in that case was construed would render the contract valid, while to construe it as the express company now desires to have it construed would render it void. To construe the contract so as to limit the express company's common-law liability only as an insurer, and only for losses and injuries brought about by other causes than the company's own negligence, fraud, or willful wrongs, would render the contract valid; while if it be construed in such a manner as to reach to the domain of negligence, fraud, and willful wrongs on the part of the express company itself, and to limit the company's liability so that the company would not be liable for losses occasioned by its own negligence, fraud, or willful wrongs, would render the contract to that extent invalid and worthless. It must be remembered that in this case the value of the property transported was not agreed upon. Whether it was worth one cent, one dollar, one hundred dollars, one thousand dollars, or any other sum, greater or less, is left wholly blank.

There seems to have been no thought of fixing, by contract or otherwise, the actual value of the property, or any value, but it was actually worth $144.55. In this failure to fix the value of the property by contract, this case differs essentially from the case of Hart v. Railroad Co., 112 U. S. 332, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 151. There are other distinctions between the present case and those relied on by the express company. For instance, the shippers themselves, in some of the cases relied on by the express company, were guilty of fraud or unfair dealing, as in the case of Oppenheimer v. Express Co., 69 Ill. 62, 68. In that case the shippers delivered to the express company for transportation a certain box containing watches and jewelry of the value of $3,800, without disclosing its contents or their great value, and paid only $1.40 for its transportation; while, if they had disclosed its contents and their value, they would have had to pay $10.90 for its transportation. The receipt which they took from the express company did not state the contents or the value of the goods, but stated, "Contents unknown." The court, in commenting upon these matters, used the following, among other, language: "There was an actual attempt here by the agent of the shippers to fill in this blank space, but, instead of inserting '3,800,' (the value,) a mark or character was inserted inexpressive of any value. This shows that there was a designed suppression of the value of the goods. That was unfair conduct on the part of the shippers of the goods. The effect of such conduct to relieve the carrier from his liability as insurer is asserted in the cases of—[here certain cases are given.] Had the true value of the goods been disclosed, there would have been an extra charge of $9.50, increased precautions would have been taken for the safety of the goods, and, as the evidence shows, they would have been saved." In this case of Oppenheimer v. Express Co. no pretense of fault or negligence on the part of the express company was imputed, but, on the contrary, it was admitted by the parties that the company was not guilty of any fault or negligence; and in the later case of Railroad Co. v. Chapman, 24 N. E. Rep. 417, 419, (decided by the supreme court of Illinois on May 14, 1890,) it is stated as follows: "In Oppenheimer v. Express Co., 69 Ill. 62, the court held that the contract exempting carriers from liabilities is not to be construed as providing against loss or injury occasioned by actual negligence on their part." Indeed, the case of Oppenheimer v. Express Co. has no application to this present case. In the present case the shipper was not guilty of fraud or unfair dealing, and the express company was unquestionably guilty of culpable negligence. In the case of Bank v. Brown, 9 Wend. 85, 114, et seq., an intended passenger on a steam-boat, without paying extra fare, took with him on the steam-boat as baggage an ordinary traveling trunk containing $11,250. In a few minutes afterwards the trunk and its contents were removed, and the owner never recovered them. The owners of the steam-boat had no knowledge of the contents of the trunk, nor of their great value, and it was held that they were not liable for their loss. Other distinctions might be shown between this case and the cases relied on by the express company, if it were thought necessary. The stipulation contained in the receipt given by the express company in the present case, limiting its liability for loss or damage, does not limit its liability, except with respect to an amount in excess of $50. Up to that amount the express company's liability remains precisely the same as it would be at common law, or as it would be if no contract limiting its liability had ever been made. But for the excess above $50 the express company claims that it has obtained a boundless immunity from liability; that it has not only obtained an absolute exemption from all liability for all loss or damage above that amount, where the loss or damage has occurred without fault or negligence on its part, but that it has also obtained such an exemption where the loss or damage has been occasioned by its own negligence, or by its own fraud or willful wrongs, including the willful destruction of the property, or the greater wrong of feloniously stealing it. This cannot be correct. The stipulation in such receipt ought to be so construed as to exempt the company from liability for only such loss or damage in excess of $50 as might be occasioned by the fault or negligence of others, or as might result from some accident, casualty or misfortune over which the company could have no control. I think the weight of authority sustains this view. While a common carrier may make a valid contract exempting himself from his common-law liability as an insurer and for losses occasioned by the acts of others without his fault, or occasioned by such of his own acts only as do not involve any kind of wrong, or occasioned by circumstances over which he has no control, yet he cannot make a valid contract exempting himself from liability for losses occasioned by his own carelessness or negligence or improper acts. Such a contract would be against public policy, and void. I think the contract in the present case should be construed precisely as though it did not attempt to limit the express company's liability at all for losses occasioned by its own negligence or improper conduct, and I would refer to the following authorities in support of this view: Kallman v. Express Co., 3 Kan. 205; Railroad Co. v. Simpson, 30 Kan. 645, 2 Pac. Rep. 821; Railway Co. v. Peavey, 29 Kan. 169; Telegraph v. Crall, 38 Kan. 679, 17 Pac. Rep. 309; *Farnham v. In my opinion, notwithstanding the stipulation in the aforesaid receipt, limiting, to some extent, the liability of the express company, the company was still bound, at its peril, to act in good faith, as towards its employer, and to exercise reasonable care and diligence with respect to its employer's goods. There was ample evidence to show negligence on the part of the express company, if not gross negligence. The goods were shipped from Kansas City in good order. When they arrived at their destination, at Lawrence, the box containing them was found broken. With due care, however, they might still have been saved, as is fairly inferable from the evidence, and as was the opinion of the jury according to their findings. The box, however, was turned over by one of the express company's agents, and a piece came out. Afterwards the company's agents attempted to take the box and contents from the express-car in which they were transported, and to put the same on a truck, and in doing so some of the type and some of the electrotype plates fell down between the car and the platform. Afterwards they gathered them up, and put them into a coal scuttle, and took them to a house belonging to the express company, where they remained for some time, and were afterwards removed to the express company's office, where they still remain, so far as is shown. This seems like gross negligence. It was not necessary, however, that gross negligence should have been shown. Ordinary negligence only, or, in other words, a want of ordinary care, was all that was necessary. In the case of Kallman v. Express Co., supra, the following, among other, language, with reference to express companies limiting their common-law liability, is used: "An examination of the authorities bearing upon this point will, we think, show that they may do so, provided, however, that due care and diligence be used in the discharge of their trust. But carriers cannot in this way shield themselves from the consequences of fraud, gross negligence, and want of care. * * * It is only when such carriers act in good faith, and use due care and diligence in and about their business, that the law permits them to have the benefit of limitations like that under consideration." In the case of Railroad Co. v. Wynn, supra, the following, among other, language is used by the court:

"The author of American and English Encyclopædia of Law says: 'By the clear weight of authority in England, Canada, the United States, and almost without exception in the states of the Union, the rule has been adopted that the common carrier can make no contract the effect of which will be to exempt him from liability for negligence.' 2 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, §22. Is the limitation in the contract before us within the prohibition of this eminently just and generally accepted principle? Manifestly the stipulation does not contemplate total exemption from liability; it only provides for partial or limited exemption. Upon that distinction the nice and important question arises, can a stipulation of the latter character stand before the law when one of the former kind cannot? Or, to state the same question differently, and so as to apply it more directly to the facts of this case, the rule of law being established, as we have seen it is, that the defendant company could not lawfully have contracted with the plaintiff that it would in no event be liable for any part of the value of the mare, if lost or destroyed, can the limitation of its liability to $100 be upheld in the courts, if it should appear that her death resulted from the negligence of the company, and that she was in fact worth eight times that amount, as the jury found her to be? We unhesitatingly answer, 'No.' The carrier cannot by contract excuse itself from liability for the whole or any part of a loss brought about by its negligence. To our minds, it is perfectly clear that the two kinds of stipulation—that providing for total, and that providing for partial, exemption from liability for the consequences of the carrier's negligence—stand upon the same ground, and must be tested by the same principles. If one can be enforced, the other can; if either be invalid, both must be held to be so,—the same considerations of public policy operating in each case. With great deference for those who may differ with us, we think it entirely illogical and unreasonable to say that the carrier may not absolve itself from liability for the whole value of property lost or destroyed through its negligence, but that it may absolve itself from responsibility for one-half, three-fourths, seven-eighths, nine-tenths, or ninety-hundredths of the loss so occasioned. With great unanimity the authorities say it cannot do the former. If allowed to do the latter, it may thereby substantially evade and nullify the law, which says it shall not do the former, and in that way do indirectly what it is forbidden to do directly. We hold that it can do neither. The requirement of the law has ever been, and is now, that the common carrier shall be diligent and careful in the transportation of its freight, and public policy forbids that it shall throw off that obligation by stipulation for exemption in whole or in part from the consequences of its negligent acts." In the case of Express Co. v. Selde, supra, the supreme court of Mississippi decided as follows: "A stipulation in a receipt given by an express company that, if the value of the goods shipped is not stated by the shipper and specified in the receipt, the holder will not demand more than $50, for loss or damage, exempts the carrier from greater liability only when the loss did not result from negligence on its part. This is true, although a greater charge is made for carrying packages over $50 in value, and the shipper fails to state the value, and pays the minimum charge." Part of syllabus. In the case of Kirby v. Express Co., supra, the court of appeals of St. Louis, Mo., decided as follows: "A clause in a contract between an express company and a shipper stated that goods shipped are of the value of $50, unless their value should be inserted in the contract, and that the company, in case of loss, would not be liable for more than $50, unless the value was so inserted, and the value of the goods was not inserted. Held, that this did not relieve the company from liability for the full value of the goods if lost through its fault, and that a presumption of negligence arose from the mere fact of loss." Part of syllabus. In the case of McFadden v. Railway Co., 92 Mo. 343, 4 S. W. Rep. 689, the supreme court of Missouri decided as follows: "While a shipper may release a common carrier from its obligation as an insurer of his property, yet the carrier cannot, by any kind of stipulation, exempt itself from liability for its own negligence." Part of syllabus. See, also, the other cases above cited, and especially the Pennsylvania cases. I think the judgment of the court below should be affirmed.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. May 9, 1891.)

CONTEMPT OF COURT.

Criticism or contemptuous language in regard to the acts and declarations of the judge of the trial court, embodied in a brief filed in the appellate court, are not in contempt of the trial court.

Habeas corpus.

Jetmore & Jetmore, for petitioners. C. J. Peckham, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The applicants were charged with contempt by the district court of Cowley county. Said supposed contempt consisted of a criticism of the acts and declarations of the judge and court at a trial of a cause, and were embodied in a brief filed in this court in a cause that was tried in the Cowley county district court, and determined in September, 1890. The case was brought to this court by proceedings in error, filed herein on the 20th day of February, 1891, and the brief containing the contemptuous language was filed in this court on the 12th day of March, 1891. This court has said that, after a case is disposed of in the court in which it originated or is pending, "a court or judge has no power to compel the public, or any individual thereof, attorney or otherwise, to consider his rulings correct, his conduct proper, or even his integrity free from stain, or to punish for contempt any mere criticism or an animadversion thereon, no matter how severe or unjust." In re Pryor, 18 Kan. 72. It is ordered that the petitioners be discharged.

In re THOMPSON et al.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. May 9, 1891.)

Habeas corpus.

S. N. Wood and A. M. Mackey, for petitioners.
L. B. Bradford and J. H. Pitzer, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. On the authority of In re Dalton, ante, 673, (just decided,) and for the same reason, to-wit, that before the criticisms were made the cause had been terminated, and was not pending, the petitioners are discharged.

CITY OF ELLSWORTH v. ROSSITER.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. May 9, 1891.)

LIABILITIES OF CITIES—COMPENSATION FOR SERVICES—MISJOINDER OF CAUSES.

1. Where R., a civil engineer, and two others, are appointed by a city as a committee to superintend the construction of water-works in and for the city, and R. is appointed because of his knowledge and experience as a civil engineer, and any two of the committee have the authority to act, and they all enter upon the discharge of their duties under the appointment, but they do not all do the same amount of work, and afterwards the work for which they were appointed is all performed and completed, and the city accepts and receives the same, held, that R. may then maintain an action against the city for compensation for his own individual services, without joining with him the other two members of the committee as plaintiffs.

2. Further, held, that several causes of action were not improperly joined in the action, and that the question whether several causes of action were stated in the petition, and not separately stated and numbered, cannot be raised or presented by a demurrer.

3. In a case such as is mentioned in No. 1 of this syllabus, the members of the committee are not such public officers as are required to perform their services without compensation, where no compensation has previously been provided for; but they are agents and employees of the city, who may recover reasonable compensation for their services after the services have all been performed and accepted by the city.

4. Where services have been fully and completely performed for and at the request of a city, and have been accepted and received by the city, the city is then under legal and moral obligation to pay for the same whatever they are reasonably worth, and whatever irregularities may have intervened in the original employment.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from district court, Ellsworth county; S. O. HINDS, Judge.

Theodore Sternberg, for plaintiff in error.
Garver & Bond and Ira E. Lloyd, for defendant in error.

VALENTINE, J. This was an action brought in the district court of Ellsworth county by F. N. Rossiter against the city of Ellsworth to recover compensation for services performed by him at the request of the city in and about the construction of city water-works. A trial was had before the court and a jury, and judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant for $681; and the defendant, as plaintiff in error, brings the case to this court for review.

The only question now presented is with reference to the sufficiency or insufficiency of the plaintiff's petition. This question was first raised by a demurrer, the grounds of which are as follows: First, a defect of parties plaintiff; second, several causes of action are improperly joined; third, the petition does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. These grounds of demurrer are the only matters now presented to this court for review, and while we think they are all untenable, yet we shall consider them separately and in their order.

1. The employment of the plaintiff was under a resolution of the mayor and council of the city, which reads, so far as is necessary to quote it, as follows: "First. That John L. Bell, F. N. Rossiter, and Charles J. Evans are hereby appointed and constituted a committee of three, for the superintending in every respect the construction and establishing of water-works in said city of Ellsworth, Kan.; and said committee, or a majority thereof, shall have full power to do or perform all such acts and things as may be necessary and proper in and about the erection, operation, alteration, and equipment of any water-works that may be commenced within this city during the year 1885, until the completion of said works, and the acceptance thereof by the council of this city, and to make all necessary and proper contracts in and about the premises for the construction and erection of the same: provided, that committee shall not have power to bind the said city for the payment of any greater sum than the amount of bonds which may be authorized by a vote of the citizens of said city for said purposes." No express contract was made with reference to the amount of the compensation which any one or any two or all the members of the foregoing committee should receive. Indeed, compensation is not mentioned at all, either as joint or several; but, as any two of the committee had full power to do and perform any or all the things for which they were employed, it would seem that the compensation which one might be entitled to receive might be different from or greater or less than that which either of the others might be entitled to receive. In other words, a joint compensation to all or an equal amount to each might not be just. It would therefore seem that any compensation which might be allowed should be a several compensation, and not a joint one. They were not partners, and it does not appear that they had any interest in each other's affairs. The portions of the statutes relating specifically to this question of the joinder of parties plaintiff are sections 35 and 37 of the Civil Code, which read as follows: "Sec. 35. All persons having an interest in the subject of the action, and in obtaining the relief demanded, may be joined as plaintiffs, except as otherwise provided in this article." "Sec. 37. Of the parties to the action, those who are united in interest must be joined as plaintiffs or defendants; but, if the consent of one who should have been joined as plaintiff cannot be obtained, he may be made defendant, the reason being stated in the petition." Under these statutes, it is necessary that all the plaintiffs should have not only an interest in the subject-matter of the action, but also in obtaining the relief demanded. Jeffers v. Forbes, 28 Kan. 174; McGrath v. City of Newton, 29 Kan. 364, 370, 371, and cases there cited. Now, under the allegations of the present petition, and more clearly under the evidence as it was introduced on the trial of the case, the three members of the aforesaid committee were not entitled to a joint compensation. They were not partners, nor jointly interested "in obtaining the relief demanded," nor were they entitled to an equal amount of the compensation to be paid, or an equal amount of "the relief demanded." The plaintiff, Rossiter, did more of the work that was to be done, and was done, than was done by either of the other two, and he is therefore entitled to a greater amount of the compensation to be paid therefor than either of the other two. And he is not interested in the compensation to be paid to either of the other two, nor is either of them interested in the compensation to be paid to him.

2. The next complaint is that there were several causes of action improperly joined, though in the argument it would seem that the real complaint is that there were several causes of action stated in the petition which were not separately stated and numbered. There were certainly not several causes of action improperly joined. We are inclined to think that only one cause of action was stated in the petition; but, even if there were more, still they were all such as might very properly be joined in one petition under the statutes, (Civil Code, § 83;) and the objection that there were several causes of action stated in the petition, which were not separately stated and numbered, cannot be raised or presented by a mere demurrer to the petition, (Civil Code, § 89; Tootle v. Wells, 39 Kan. 454, 18 Pac. Rep. 692.) This objection was not raised or presented in any other manner than by demurrer.

3. The next ground of complaint is that the petition does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; but the principal ground upon which this complaint is founded is that Rossiter by his employment became a public officer, and, as no compensation for his services was agreed upon or provided for at any time, he cannot now recover anything for his services. We think, however, that Rossiter was not a public officer, within the rule that gives no compensation to a public officer, except such as has previously been provided for by some lawful authority for the office which he fills. We think he might more properly be styled an agent or employe of the city for a specific work, and he was both an agent and an employe of the city. He was a civil engineer of large experience, and it was because of his knowledge and experience as a civil engineer that he was employed by the city to do the work required. In the case of David v. Water Committee, 14 Or. 98, 12 Pac. Rep. 174, it was held by the supreme court of Oregon that a body of men consisting of 15, who were authorized to purchase or construct and maintain water-works in and for the city of Portland, and who were styled "the water committee," were not officers, but were only agents of the city. See, also, the following cases: Bunn v. People, 45 Ill. 397; Butler v. Regents of the University, 32 Wis. 124, 131; U. S. v. Maurice, 2 Brock. 103; State v. Wilson, 29 Ohio St. 349. But even if the committee in the present case might be called "officers," in any sense, still we do not think that they were such officers as are required to perform services without compensation, simply because no compensation for their services had previously been specifically provided for.

4. It is also claimed that there were some irregularities in the appointment or employment of the plaintiff, Rossiter. In the case of Fister v. La Rue, 15 Barb. 323, 324, the following language is used by the court: "It is well settled, at least in this country, that where a person is employed for a corporation, by one assuming to act in its behalf, and goes on and renders the services according to the agreement, with the knowledge of its officers, and without notice that the contract is not recognized as valid and binding, such corporation will be held to have sanctioned and ratified the contract, and be compelled to pay for the services, according to the agreement. Having availed itself of the services and received the benefits, it is bound in conscience to pay, and will not be heard to say that the original agreement was not made by a person legally authorized to contract." See, also, Butler v. Commissioners, 15 Kan. 178; Brown v. City of Atchison, 89 Kan. 87, 17 Pac. Rep. 465; Salomon v. U. S., 19 Wall. 17; City of Cincinnati v. Cameron, 33 Ohio St. 336. As all the services expected or desired of Rossiter and his associates have been fully and completely performed, and have been accepted and received by the city, we think the city is now under legal and moral obligation to pay for the same whatever they are reasonably worth, and whatever irregularities may have intervened in the original employment. See, also, the following cases: Commissioners v. Brewer, 9 Kan. 307; Huffman v. Commissioners, 23 Kan. 281. The judgment of the court below will be affirmed. All the justices concurring.

RYAN et al. v. CITY OF COLDWATER.

CITIES — ACTION FOR SERVICES RENDERED — LIABILITIES.

Where a plaintiff in an action against a city alleges in his petition that he made a filling in one of the public streets of such city to the extent of 2,200 yards, of the value of $220, with the knowledge, consent, and direction of the city, and asks for a judgment against the city for $220, he states a cause of action against the city for that amount.

Error from district court, Comanche county; C. W. ELLIS, Judge.

W. A. Taylor, for plaintiffs in error. T. E. Chambers, for defendant in error.

VALENTINE, J. This was an action brought before a justice of the peace of Comanche county by Drew Ryan and George Schwisberger against the city of Coldwater, to recover $220 for work done upon a certain street in that city. The case was afterwards taken to the district court, and in that court the plaintiffs amended their bill of particulars so as to make it read, omitting caption and signature, as follows: "Plaintiffs for cause of action allege that defendant is a municipal corporation created by the laws of the state of Kansas; that as such corporation defendant did by ordinance approved on the 16th day of August, 1886, provide a tax of ten mills on the dollar, on all the taxable real estate within the corporate limits of said city of Coldwater, the defendant in this case, for the purpose of grading, opening, widening, improving, etc., all streets, avenues, etc., in said city; that, as such corporation, defendant did, by resolution approved by the mayor and council of said city, defendant, on the 27th day of July, 1887, provide for surveying and grading all streets within the limits of said city, defendant; that in pursuance of said resolution, on Main street in said city, was established a grade, which said grade was by resolution of the mayor and council of said city adopted and approved on the 20th day of December, 1887; that plaintiffs herein, with the knowledge, consent, and direction of defendant herein, did between the day of —, 1887, and the 8th day of November, 1887, do certain filling and work on West Main street, between Central and Brooklyn avenues, in said city, in compliance with the grade as established aforesaid, an account of said filling and work being herewith attached, marked 'Exhibit A,' and made a part hereof; that plaintiffs did on the 3d day of December, 1887, present to the city council of the city of Coldwater, the defendant, a full account of the items of their said claim, the same being duly verified by the oath of George Schwisberger, one of the plaintiffs herein; that said account was reasonable, correct, and just, which said claim, so presented, defendant refused to allow; that said filling and work is worth the sum of two hundred and twenty ($220) dollars; that said amount of two hundred and twenty ($220) dollars is due, and wholly unpaid. Wherefore plaintiffs ask judgment in the sum of two hundred and twenty ($220) dollars, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from the 8th day of November, 1887, and costs of this suit." Exhibit A reads as follows: "November 8th, 1887. City of Coldwater, Dr., to Drew Ryan and George Schwisberger, Cr.: To 2,200 yards of filling on West Main street, between Central and Brooklyn avenues, in said city, at 10 cents per yard. $220.00. Due, $220.00." The defendant demurred to this amended bill of particulars, upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and the court sustained the demurrer; and, to reverse this ruling of the district court, the plaintiffs, as plaintiffs in error, bring the case to this court.

We think the court below erred. In Kansas, all improvements of the public streets of a city, and all changes to be made therein, are wholly and entirely within the control of the city itself. No individual person has any right to disturb the surface of any street of a city in the slightest manner whatever, except with the consent of the city, or except as he might do so in some proper mode of travel or transportation. In the present case the plaintiffs made a certain filling on West Main street, of the city of Coldwater, to the extent of 2,200 yards. While it might be presumed, in the absence of anything to the contrary, that they did this with the knowledge and consent and by the direction of the city, yet they have not relied upon presumptions merely, but have so alleged the same in direct terms in their petition; and as the work has already been done, completed, finished, we think the city is presumptively liable therefor, (City of Ellsworth v. Rossiter, ante, 674, just decided;) and, if the city has any defense, it devolves upon the city to so state it. We think the plaintiffs' petition states a cause of action, and therefore the order and judgment of the district court sustaining the demurrer thereto will be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

All the justices concurring.

STATE V. HODGES.

CONTINUANCE IN CRIMINAL CASE—DILIGENCE—INDICTMENT—JOINDER OF OFFENSES—EMBEZZLEMENT—EVIDENCE—SEPARATION OF JURY—SENTENCE.

1. The defendant, in a criminal prosecution for embezzlement, made an application for a continuance, upon the ground that it was necessary for him, in order to prepare for his defense, to make an inspection of certain books, records, and papers in the custody of the receiver of the State Bank of Irving, and the court overruled the application. Held, under the circumstances of the case, that the defendant did not exercise sufficient diligence to obtain an inspection of such books, records, and papers, and that no error was committed in refusing the application.

2. Several separate and distinct felonies may be charged in separate counts of one and the same information, where all the offenses charged are of the same general character, requiring the same mode of trial, the same kind of evidence, and the same kind of punishment; and the defendant may be tried upon all the several counts at one and the same time,—all resting in the sound judicial discretion of the trial court.

3. Where a criminal information charges in one count an actual embezzlement, and also charges that the same property was made away with and secreted by the defendant with the intent to embezzle and convert the same to his own use, held, that the information is not bad for duplicity.

4. The evidence examined, and held that, although evidence relevant and competent to prove one charge, but not relevant or competent as to the other charges, was introduced, and although other evidence not competent to prove any charge was also introduced, yet no material error in this respect was committed by the trial court.

5. At the close of the trial, and near night, the jury retired to consider as to their verdict, and under the direction of the trial court, given before they retired, in the presence of the defendant and counsel on both sides, and without objection, the jury, after agreeing upon their verdict during the night, reduced the verdict to writing, and inclosed it in a sealed envelope, and then separated until the meeting of the court the next morning, when they returned the verdict into court, and the envelope was there opened, and the verdict read to the jury, and they were asked if that was their verdict, and they answered in the affirmative, and the verdict was held valid. Held, that no material error, if any error at all, was committed in this respect by the trial court.

6. The defendant was found guilty, and the court sentenced him, upon each of four separate counts of the information, to imprisonment in the penitentiary, prescribing that the imprisonment under one count should commence at the expiration of the imprisonment under another count, and the time of the imprisonment in the aggregate exceeded by one year the time for which the defendant could have been sentenced upon one count alone. Held not error.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, Marshall county; R. B. SPILLMAN, Judge.

Cal. T. Mann, John V. Coon, and W. J. Gregg, for appellant. L. B. Kellogg, Atty. Gen., E. A. Berry, W. A. Calderhead, and J. A. Broughten, for the State.

VALENTINE, J. This was a criminal prosecution upon information, in which the defendant, Ira M. Hodges, was charged in eight separate counts with the commission of eight separate and distinct embezzlements of property belonging to the State Bank of Irving, a banking corporation, as officer, cashier, and secretary of such corporation. A trial was had before the court and a jury, and at the close of the evidence on the part of the state the prosecution elected to dismiss the prosecution as to the eighth count, and to proceed with the trial upon only the other seven counts, as follows: Upon the first six counts upon the charges therein contained of actual embezzlement; and upon the seventh count upon the charge of taking, making way with, and secreting a certain diamond pin, with the intent to convert the same to the defendant's own use. And the prosecution also elected to rely for a conviction upon a separate and single transaction, as shown by the evidence, for each separate count of the information. At the close of the trial the jury found the defendant guilty upon the first six counts, and not guilty as to the seventh; and the court sentenced the defendant to imprisonment in the penitentiary for terms aggregating six years upon first, third, fourth, and fifth counts only, as follows: Upon the first count for three years, and upon each of the other three counts for one year; and the defendant was not sentenced at all upon the second or sixth count, nor upon any other count except the first, third, fourth, and fifth. The defendant now brings the case to this court for review.

1. The first alleged ground of error is that the court below erred in refusing to grant the defendant a continuance. The ground for the continuance was that the defendant, in order to prepare for his defense, needed to make an inspection of certain books, records, and papers belonging to the State Bank of Irving, which books, records, and papers were and had been for a long time in the custody of W. W. Armstrong, who was the receiver of said bank; that the defendant had not been able to procure such books, records, and papers. The offenses with which the defendant was charged and found guilty were charged to have been committed, and were in fact committed, during the month of November, 1889. When this prosecution was commenced is not shown, but it was probably commenced soon after the time of the alleged commission of the offenses. The information, however, was not filed until May 3, 1890, and this application for a continuance was made on May 8, 1890. Now, if these books, records, and papers should be considered as being in the custody of the prosecution, which they were not, then the defendant's remedy to obtain an inspection or copies of them was under section 209 of the Criminal Code, and sections 368 and 369 of the Civil Code. But if they should be considered as being in the custody of W. W. Armstrong, the receiver, as in fact they were, then the defendant could have procured an inspection or copies of them by merely applying to the court or judge for an order to that effect upon the receiver. And of course the defendant had the power to obtain them as evidence at the trial by merely causing a subpœna duces tecum to be issued for them. Civil Code, § 325. But he took no legal steps to compel the production of the books, records, and papers for his inspection, or to procure copies of them prior to his application for a continuance, and therefore we would think that he did not exercise sufficient diligence. The whole matter, however, was largely within the discretion of the trial court, and we cannot say that such discretion was abused. Many of the books, records, and papers of the bank, and possibly all, were present at the trial, and there is no pretense that any of them needed by the defendant were absent.

2. The next ground of alleged error has reference to a supposed error in the information in charging in one and the same instrument, though in separate counts, several separate and distinct felonies, and in the court's requiring the defendant to be tried for all of such felonies in one and the same trial. Now, there can certainly be no such substantial error in this as will require a reversal of the judgment of the court below, provided, of course, that only one offense is charged in each of the several counts of the information. Several separate and distinct felonies may be charged in separate counts of one and the same information, where all of the offenses charged are of the same general character, requiring the same mode of trial, the same kind of evidence, and the same kind of punishment. Whart. Crim. Pl. & Pr. § 285 et seq., and cases there cited; 1 Bish. Crim. Proc. (3d Ed.) §§ 424, 450, 451; 4 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 754-756; State v. Bancroft, 22 Kan. 170; State v. Chandler, 31 Kan. 201, 1 Pac. Rep. 787; State v. Goodwin, 33 Kan. 538, 6 Pac. Rep. 899; State v. Fisher, 37 Kan. 404, 15 Pac. Rep. 606. The defendant may be tried upon all the several counts of the information at one and the same time and in one trial, but all this rests in the sound judicial discretion of the trial court. In some cases the trial court might, without committing material error, quash such an information; or it might require the state to elect upon which one or more of the several counts it would proceed to trial or rely for a verdict; but we cannot say that in this case the court abused its discretion or committed any material error.

3. The next alleged ground of error is that each count of the information charged two separate and distinct offenses. The first count of the information charges as follows: That the defendant, as officer, cashier, and secretary of the State Bank of Irving, a corporation, doing a general banking business at Irving, was intrusted by the corporation with the safe-keeping, custody, control, and disbursement of the moneys belonging to the bank; and that he, as such officer, cashier, and secretary, on the 8th day of November, 1889, certain moneys belonging to the bank in his hands, of the value of $1,500, "did then and there fraudulently and feloniously convert to his own use and embezzle, with intent to feloniously embezzle the same, and then and there did feloniously make way with and secrete, with intent the said money and property fraudulently and feloniously to embezzle and convert to his own use, without the assent of the said corporation, his employer." All the other counts are substantially in the same form. Now, as a general rule, the charging of two or more distinct offenses in the same count of an information, which in criminal pleading is denominated "duplicity," is not to be tolerated; but we do not think that the present information is subject to any such objection. It is often the case that one felony of considerable magnitude may include within itself other offenses of less magnitude, and then all may be charged in one count; as, for instance, the offense of murder in the first degree, the greater offense, may be charged in one count of an information, although by so doing several smaller offenses are also charged in the same count of the information. And in all cases an offense may be set forth in a single count of an information, although such offense may include the smaller offense, an attempt to commit the principal offense. Sections 121 and 122 of the Criminal Code read as follows: "Sec. 121. Upon an indictment for an offense consisting of different degrees, the jury may find the defendant not guilty of the degree charged in the indictment, and guilty of any degree inferior thereto, or an attempt to commit the offense. Sec. 122. Upon the trial of an indictment for a felony, the defendant may be found guilty of any other felony or misdemeanor necessarily included in that with which he is charged in the indictment or information." Section 283 of the act relating to crimes and punishments makes an attempt to commit an offense an offense of itself, and, so far as it is necessary to quote such section, it reads as follows: "Sec. 283. Every person who shall attempt to commit an offense prohibited by law, and in such attempt shall do any act towards the commission of such offense, but shall fail in the perpetration thereof, or shall be prevented or intercepted in executing the same, upon conviction thereof, shall, in cases where no provision is made by law for the punishment of such attempt, be punished as follows," etc. And Mr. Wharton, in his Precedents of Indictments, gives the form of an indictment for embezzlement, which includes, among others, the following words: A. B., the defendant, "fraudulently and feloniously did take, make way with, and secrete, and did embezzle and convert, to his own use, without the assent of the said C. D., his master and employer, the said" embezzled property, etc. See, also, 1 Bish. Crim. Proc. (3d Ed.) §§ 436, 443; 4 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 736; State v. Lillie, 21 Kan. 728; State v. Blakesley, 43 Kan. 250, 23 Pac. Rep. 570.

As we understand, it is claimed that the present information is not good, for the reason that each count first charges the crime of actual embezzlement, and then charges a second offense, by charging that the defendant made way with the same property, and secreted it with the intent to embezzle and convert the same to his own use. This certainly does not render the information bad, for all these charges could have been shown under the single charge of actual embezzlement; for, if a person commits the offense of actual embezzlement, he must commit all the rest above specified. He cannot commit the offense of actual embezzlement without also attempting and intending to commit such offense, and he cannot commit the offense without also converting the property of his employer in his hands, and which he embezzles, to his own use, and without also attempting and intending to so convert it. All that was material in the aforesaid charge was included in the one charge of actual embezzlement. Besides, in the present case, before the defendant was called upon to introduce any evidence, the state elected to rely for a conviction upon the single charge of actual embezzlement and of the embezzlement of a particular thing; and this election was as to each count, and the defendant was convicted upon this election, and upon this election only. What we have said with reference to the first count may also be said with reference to all the other counts upon which the defendant was convicted.

4. The next question presented is with regard to the introduction of evidence. It is claimed that the court below erred in permitting the prosecution to introduce incompetent and irrelevant evidence, to the prejudice of the substantial rights of the defendant; and again, the question is presented whether two or more criminal charges can be included in one and the same information, though in separate counts, and tried upon a single trial. It is claimed that they cannot, for the reason that evidence competent to prove one charge would necessarily be irrelevant and incompetent as to the other charges, and that the introduction of such evidence would be prejudicial to the substantial rights of the defendant. Of course, the first part of this claim is generally true, and the last part of the same is sometimes true; but where the last part is true, the court, in its discretion, will require that a separate trial shall be had upon each separate charge. We do not think that the rights of the defendant were improperly prejudiced in the present case. Undoubtedly the court and the jury understood perfectly well for what purpose each item of the evidence was introduced; and the jury did not use the evidence introduced to prove one charge for the purpose of sustaining some other charge. This question, however, was sufficiently considered in the consideration of the question whether charges for separate and distinct felonies could be united in separate counts of one information. There was some other evidence introduced which was irrelevant and incompetent to prove any of the charges, the most of which, however, after being introduced, was expressly withdrawn by the court from the jury; and we cannot think that the defendant's substantial rights were prejudicially affected by any of such evidence. All the evidence was intended to show the defendant's transactions in connection with the bank. And nothing was introduced to show that he had acted, in any respect, in any worse manner as to the affairs of the bank than he had acted in doing the very things of which the jury found him to be guilty, and of which he was unquestionably guilty.

5. The next complaint of the defendant is that the jury were permitted to separate after the trial, and before they had rendered their verdict. The facts were these: The trial was closed just before the adjournment for the day, on May 14, 1890, at 8 o'clock in the evening. Before the adjournment the court instructed the jury that, if they should agree upon a verdict before the meeting of the court on the next morning, they might reduce their verdict to writing, inclose it in a sealed envelope, and then separate until the meeting of the court the next morning, and then return the verdict into court; and the court also properly admonished the jury with regard to their conduct during the separation. The jury in fact agreed upon a verdict during the night, reduced it to writing, inclosed it in a sealed envelope, then separated, and on the next morning returned it into court, where the envelope was opened and the verdict read to the jury, and they were asked if that was their verdict, and they answered in the affirmative. No objection to the above was interposed by the defendant or his counsel, although they, as well as the counsel for the state, were present in the court when it all occurred. Certainly no material error, if any error at all, was committed in this. See Crim. Code, § 235; State v. Muir, 32 Kan. 481, 4 Pac. Rep. 812; Bishop v. Mugler, 33 Kan. 145, 5 Pac. Rep. 755.

6. Complaint is also made that the court below erred in rendering a cumulative sentence. The court below sentenced the defendant upon four different charges, set forth in four separate counts of the information, to imprisonment in the penitentiary for six years in the aggregate, which was one year more than the defendant could have been sentenced for upon any one of such charges. We think there was no error in this. Criminal Code, § 250; State v. Carlyle, 33 Kan. 716, 7 Pac. Rep. 623; State v. Chandler, 31 Kan. 201, 1 Pac. Rep. 787. If a defendant in a criminal prosecution can be tried upon an information charging in separate counts several separate and distinct felonies, he may certainly be convicted and sentenced upon each of such counts upon which he is convicted; and, where the sentence upon each count is for imprisonment in the penitentiary, the imprisonment may, under section 250 of the Criminal Code, be cumulative, and the imprisonment under one count may commence at the expiration of the imprisonment under another count. We think no material error has been committed in this case, and the judgment of the court below will be affirmed.

STATE V. EMMONS.

Appeal from district court, Marshall county; R. B. SPILLMAN, Judge.

Cal. T. Mann, J. H. Gillpatrick, John V. Coon, and W. J. Gregg, for appellant. L. B. Kellogg, Atty. Gen., W. A. Calderhead, E. A. Berry, and J. A. Broughten, for the State.

PER CURIAM. The facts of this case, and the questions of law involved therein, are substantially the same as those in the case of the State v. Hodges, ante, 676, (just decided,) and this case will be decided upon the authority of that case.

RYAN V. MADDEN et al.

RECORD ON APPEAL—PLEADINGS—CERTIFICATE OF JUDGE.

1. Where there is attached to a petition in error a case made, in which are found what purport to be copies of the pleadings and proceedings in the cause, but which are not specifically referred to and identified by marks or numbers, and there is attached to the case made a certificate of the judge and the attesting signature and seal of the clerk, the presumption will be that the copies of the pleadings and proceedings therein are what they purport to be, and that all were included in the case made when it was served upon the defendants and settled and signed by the judge.

2. The sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict cannot be examined unless the record properly shows that all the evidence is preserved.

3. A general exception to a charge embracing various propositions of law is insufficient to bring before the court anything except the general scope and effect of the charge. If a party objects to any particular proposition which it contains he should point out the same, and take an exception thereto.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from district court, Chase county; FRANK DOSTER, Judge.

Thomas H. Grisham, S. N. Wood, and A. M. Mackey, for plaintiff in error. F. P. Cochran and C. N. Sterry, for defendant in error.

JOHNSTON, J. This was an action of ejectment to recover possession of a tract of land in Chase county. The verdict and judgment were given in favor of the defendants, and the plaintiff alleges error. The defendants challenge the sufficiency of the record, and claim that there is nothing here for review, for the reason that the pleadings and proceedings now found within the case are not specifically marked and identified. There is attached to the petition in error what is termed a "case made," in which there is, first, a brief recital of the different proceedings in the trial, which are referred to as being "here-to attached," without special designation. Then follows what purport to be copies of pleadings, evidence, instructions, verdict, motion for a new trial, and judgment; and at the end of all these is a stipulation of both parties as to the time of settling the case, which is followed by the certificate of the judge. In this state of the record there can be no question but that the pleadings and proceedings are what they purport to be, and a fair presumption is that all were included in the case made when it was served upon the defendants and settled and signed by the judge. While the case is here for review, we are unable to examine the points contended for by plaintiff in error. One of these is that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict and judgment; and the other, that the jury were improperly instructed in a certain particular. The sufficiency of the evidence cannot be examined unless it properly appears that all the testimony is included in the record. There is a recital at the beginning of the case made that "the plaintiff, to maintain the issues on his part, offered his evidence and rested; and the defendants, in order to maintain the issues on their part, offered all their evidence and rested; all of which evidence is hereto attached." An inspection of the record, however, shows that after the defendants had rested testimony was offered by each in rebuttal, and still more on surrebuttal. There is no statement at the end of the testimony showing that the case made contains all that was offered. There is in the record a certificate by the official stenographer that what precedes it is a full and correct transcript of the testimony in the case; but it is not within the province of the stenographer to determine whether a case made contains all the evidence or not, or to settle the truthfulness of the statements included therein. Railroad Co. v. Grimes, 38 Kan., 241, 16 Pac. Rep. 472. We also find that there is considerable testimony in the record which follows the certificate of the stenographer. A statement is included in the certificate of the judge who settled the case to the effect that the case contains all the evidence that was introduced on the trial, but such a statement was improperly included in the certificate, and is ineffectual to accomplish the purposes intended. Eddy v. Weaver, 37 Kan. 540, 15 Pac. Rep. 492; Hill v. Bank, 42 Kan. 364, 22 Pac. Rep. 324. The first recital in the case made is to the effect that the case includes the evidence offered by each party before they rested,—necessarily excludes that which was afterwards introduced. This was evidently deemed to be insufficient by the plaintiff in error, as he attempted to supplement it by the certificate of the official stenographer, and later by another certificate of the judge. We conclude that the record fails to properly show that all the evidence is preserved, and hence, under the authorities cited, we cannot say that the verdict is without support.

The other objection is that the court did not fully and correctly state the law in respect to transactions between attorney and client. It may be first remarked that no other or additional instructions were requested by the plaintiff. If the plaintiff desired fuller instructions given upon any question in the case, he should have asked the court for such instructions; and, failing in this, he has no cause to complain. State v. Pfefferle, 36 Kan. 90, 12 Pac. Rep. 406; Phinney v. Bronson, 43 Kan. 451, 23 Pac. Rep. 624. The plaintiff objects to a single proposition in the charge that was given, but his objection is unavailing because no sufficient exception was taken. The only exception taken is found in one of the preliminary recitals in the case made, and is as follows: "After both sides had rested their case the court of his own motion proceeded to instruct the jury; a copy of said instruction is hereto attached; to which the plaintiff at the time excepted." The charge contains several propositions of law, only one of which is challenged; but instead of pointing out to the district court the objectionable proposition, and excepting to the giving of the same, the plaintiff was content to take a general exception to the entire charge. This is insufficient, and brings up for review only the general scope and meaning of the charge. It is ineffectual to present the objection made by the plaintiff. Wheeler v. Joy, 15 Kan. 890; Hentig v. Loan, etc., Co., 28 Kan. 617 State v. Willig, 32 Kan. 126, 4 Pac. Rep. 218. We find nothing in the record which warrants a reversal of the judgment. It may be proper to remark that the question who has the title to the property at present has not received any consideration. The judgment of the district court will be affirmed. All the justices concurring.

FARMERS' & MERCHANTS' BANK OF CAW-KER CITY V. BANK OF GLEN ELDER.

CHATTEL MORTGAGES—VALIDITY AFTER ONE YEAR—RENEWAL.

1. Every chattel mortgage filed as required by the provisions of the statute relating to mortgages of personal property is void as against the creditors of the person making the same, or against subsequent purchasers or mortgagees in good faith after the expiration of one year after the filing thereof, unless within 90 days next preceding the expiration of the term of one year from such filing, and each year thereafter, the mortgagee, his agent or attorney, shall make an affidavit exhibiting the interest of the mortgagee in the property at the time last aforesaid, claimed by virtue of such mortgage, and, if said mortgage is to secure the payment of money, the amount yet due and unpaid. Such affidavit shall be attached to and filed with the instrument or copy on file to which it relates. Paragraph 3905, Gen. St. 1889.

2. Howard v. Bank, 44 Kan. —, 24 Pac. Rep. 988, followed.

3. A subsequent mortgagee, who becomes such before the expiration of the year from the first filing of a prior chattel mortgage, cannot take advantage of an omission to renew the chattel mortgage within the year.

Error from district court, Mitchell county; CLARK A. SMITH, Judge.

Kelley & Thorp, for plaintiff in error. A. H. Ellis, for defendant in error.

HORTON, C. J. Replevin for a horse and a cow of the value of $70, brought originally before a justice of the peace by the Bank of Glen Elder against the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank of Cawker City. An appeal was taken to the district court. In that court the plaintiff below was permitted to amend his bill of particulars twice. To the last amended bill of particulars or petition the defendant below filed a general denial. Upon the trial, at the close of the plaintiff's evidence, the defendant filed a demurrer, for the reason that it failed to prove a cause of action. The court sustained the demurrer, but allowed the plaintiff to reopen the case, and introduce further evidence. When the plaintiff finally rested, the defendant for a second time demurred to the evidence, but the demurrer was overruled. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff. Subsequently the court entered a judgment that the plaintiff recover $75.70 as his interest in the property in controversy, and also its costs. The defendant below excepted, and complains of the judgment rendered.

It is urged that the trial court erred in permitting the plaintiff below to finally amend its bill of particulars so as to charge the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank of Cawker City as a copartnership composed of U. G. Paris and F. M. Owen, instead of a corporation, as originally alleged. "Discretion is largely vested in a trial court to allow amendments to pleadings, and such amendments will not be grounds for error unless it is shown that there was a flagrant abuse of discretion." Stith v. Fullinwider, 40 Kan. 73, 19 Pac. Rep. 314; Carr v. Catlin, 13 Kan. 393; Board v. Campbell, 17 Kan. 537. The district court also has power, in the furtherance of justice, to permit the amendment of a petition by striking out one name and inserting another, when it is shown that the first name was used by mistake. Bank v. Tappan, 6 Kan. 456; City of Atchison v. Twine, 9 Kan. 350; Haulin v. Baxter, 20 Kan. 134; Weaver v. Young, 37 Kan. 70, 14 Pac. Rep. 458. The trial court, in its discretion, had the power, after sustaining the first demurrer to the evidence, to reopen the case, and permit further evidence to be introduced. Section 139, Civil Code; Cook v. Ottawa University, 14 Kan. 548; Railroad Co. v. Dryden, 17 Kan. 278. It is further urged that the trial court erred in overruling the objection to the introduction of any evidence under the second amended bill of particulars or petition. It is said that there was no allegation of any demand for the property prior to the commencement of the action. The defendant upon the trial attempted to show title in itself, and the right of possession incident thereto, under a chattel mortgage dated the 8th of March, 1886, and which was attempted to be renewed the 31st of March, 1887; therefore no proof of demand and refusal was required. Raper v. Harrison, 37 Kan. 243, 15 Pac. Rep. 219; Bogle v. Gordon, 39 Kan. 31, 17 Pac. Rep. 857; Machine Co. v. Mann, 42 Kan. 372, 22 Pac. Rep. 417. The bill of particulars or petition, however, as amended, stated that the plaintiff below claimed special ownership of the property under a mortgage executed by R. H. Mattern to the plaintiff through J. C. McNer-ney, the cashier of the plaintiff. The amended pleading also alleged that R. H. Mattern, at the time that he executed the chattel mortgage, was the absolute owner of the property described therein, and had the lawful authority to mortgage and incur the same; that the debt secured by the mortgage had become due and payable, and the mortgagor was in default; that the plaintiff was entitled to the immediate possession of the property; that the defendant wrongfully, unlawfully, and unjustly detained the same from the plaintiff, and wholly deprived the plaintiff from all use and benefit thereof. These allegations were sufficient, as against the general objection to the introduction of any evidence, to show that the detention of the property by the defendant was wrongful, and a demand and refusal might have been properly offered in evidence, if it were necessary, under Raper v. Harrison, supra, to establish a demand and refusal. If the amended pleadings were not sufficiently specific they could have been amended on motion of the defendant below.

It is finally urged that the trial court erroneously instructed the jury as follows: "That in no event can the defendant prevail in this action on account or by virtue of any rights claimed to have accrued to it under and by virtue of the chattel mortgage offered in evidence. Such chattel mortgage of defendant, not having been shown by the evidence to have been renewed, as is required by law, is of no force as to the plaintiff's mortgage, if any mortgage plaintiff had upon the property in controversy." Upon the same ground the trial court withdrew from the consideration of the jury the renewal affidavit of the chattel mortgage of the 8th of March, 1886, but filed March 10, 1886. This renewal is referred to in the record as "Exhibit H," and was filed March 31, 1887, more than a year after the filing of the mortgage of March 10, 1886. One mortgage of the plaintiff below was filed April 17, 1886, and the other mortgage, called "Exhibit A," was filed May 12, 1886. Both of these mortgages were subsequent to the mortgage of defendant below of March 10, 1886. The instruction was erroneous under the authority of Howard v. Bank, 44 Kan. —, 24 Pac. Rep. 988. It was said in that case that "a subsequent mortgagee with notice of prior mortgage is not a subsequent mortgagee in good faith under paragraph 3905 of the General Statutes of 1889. The words 'subsequent purchasers' and 'subsequent mortgagees in good faith,' in paragraph 3905, mean only purchasers and mortgagees who purchased or took their mortgages after the expiration of the year from the filing of the mortgage." Jones, Mortg. (3d Ed.) § 293, states the rule in the same way: "Purchasers or mortgagees who become such before the expiration of the year from the first filing cannot take advantage of an omission to refile the mortgage. Such purchasers or mortgagees have notice of the existing mortgage, and take title subject to it. The statute was intended to prevent imposition upon them, and not to relieve them from incumbrances valid against them when they acquired their own title. They stand in the same position the mortgagor was in when they took their title from him." See the authorities there cited. The decisions in Michigan and Ohio are contrary to this rule, but the great weight of authority is as stated in the prior decision of this court. Again, paragraph 3906, Gen. St. 1889, reads: "If such affidavit be made and filed before any purchase of such mortgaged property shall be made, or other mortgage deposited, or lien obtained thereon, in good faith, it shall be as valid to continue in effect such mortgage as if the same had been made and filed within the period above provided." It was also said in the Howard Case, supra, that paragraph 3905, Gen. St. 1889, "does not include intermediate purchasers or mortgagees. This construction is based upon reason. He who purchases after the year has expired during which a mortgage remains in force has a right, in the absence of the renewal affidavit, to suppose the mortgage has been paid, even though not released on the record; but he who purchases before the year expires takes with notice of the mortgage and the rights of the mortgagee under the same." Therefore the plaintiff below, having taken a second chattel mortgage soon after the filing of the first mortgage, was not a subsequent mortgagee in good faith, so as to have a prior lien to the first mortgage, although the first mortgage was not properly renewed within the year.

Upon the oral argument the sufficiency of the record was challenged, and the claim was made that there is nothing here for review. We must decide in favor of the sufficiency of the record. In Ryan v. Madden, ante, 679, (recently decided,) it was ruled that "where there is attached to a petition in error a case made, in which are found what purports to be copies of the pleadings and proceedings in the cause, but which are not specifically referred to and identified by marks or numbers, and there is attached to the case made a certificate of the judge and the attesting signature and seal of the clerk, the presumption will be that the copies of the pleadings and proceedings therein are what they purport to be, and that all were included in the case made when it was served upon the defendants, settled and signed by the judge." The judgment of the district court will be reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial. All the justices concurring.

NEW TRIAL—VERDICT—SPECIAL FINDINGS.

When a jury returns answers to special questions which are essential to a recovery, but in fact unsupported by any evidence, the trial court should sustain a motion for a new trial.

(Syllabus by Green, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Butler county; T. O. SHINN, Judge.

George R. Peck, A. A. Hurd, and Robert

Dunlap, for plaintiff in error. Redden & Schumacher, for defendant in error.

GREEN, C. On the morning of March 4, 1888, the plaintiff below purchased a ticket at Topeka of the agent of the defendant below, as he claims, to Emporia, for which he paid $1.85; the distance being a fraction over 61 miles. He entered one of the cars in defendant's passenger train, which left Topeka some time after midnight. The car in which he took his seat as a passenger contained 15 or 20 persons. After the train left Topeka, the collector passed through the car, and took up plaintiff's ticket, but did not give him a check. As the train approached the station of Reading, the collector came along the aisle, and touched the plaintiff on the knee. The train stopped at Reading, and one passenger got off. After the train had started, the collector came to the plaintiff, and asked where he was going. He answered, "Emporia." The collector then asked him for a ticket, or his fare to Emporia. The plaintiff replied that he had given him his ticket, and paid his fare. The collector told him that his ticket read to Reading, and that he had not received a ticket to Emporia from him. The plaintiff insisted that he had. The collector then informed the plaintiff that he would have to pay his fare to Emporia, or get off. The plaintiff said that he would not do either, unless compelled to. Thereupon the collector left him, and was gone some time, when he returned with the conductor, who asked him if he was going to pay his fare. The plaintiff said: "I have paid once, and I do not propose to pay again." The conductor then informed the plaintiff that he would have to get off. The plaintiff answered him: "I will not get off, unless I am made to get off." The conductor pulled the bell-cord, and stopped the train. He then took hold of the plaintiff by the shoulder, and the plaintiff walked ahead of the conductor, collector, and brakeman to the front door of the car and until he reached the steps to the platform, when he observed that the weather was quite cold, and that it was snowing pretty hard. He then concluded to pay his fare. He stated that he would not get off, and walked back to the door, when the conductor said: "Damn you," or "God damn you, why did you not do that before I stopped the train?" This remark was made on the platform of the car. To this interrogation the plaintiff answered "that was his business." The plaintiff then paid the conductor 60 cents—the fare from Reading to Emporia—under protest, as he claimed, and which he characterized at the time as "highway robbery," and continued his journey to the latter place. The plaintiff brought his action in the district court of Butler county against the defendant for expelling him from its cars in the night, and refusing him permission to ride upon its train without paying additional and illegal charges, and placing him in the ignominious position of being put off the train of the defendant, which was filled with passengers; all to his damage in the sum of $1,000. For a second cause of action, he demanded judgment for the 60 cents extorted from him to permit him to continue his journey, and the further sum of $50 damages. A trial was had on the 18th day of October, 1888, and the jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $500.60. The following are the special findings returned with the general verdict: "(1) How much was the plaintiff damaged by the acts of the defendant or its employees? Answer. $500.60. (2) Do you allow anything for injury to plaintiff's feelings, and, if so, how much? A. Yes; $100. (3) Did the conductor or collector or brakeman use any violence towards the plaintiff at the time referred to? A. Yes. (4) How much do you allow plaintiff by reason of the violence used by the conductor, collector, or brakeman? A. $50. (5) How much do you allow plaintiff for pecuniary loss? A. $0.60. (6) How much do you allow plaintiff for loss of time? A. Nothing. (7) How much do you allow plaintiff for exemplary damages? A. $150. (8) How much do you allow plaintiff for expenses and attorney fees in prosecuting this case? A. $200. (9) How much do you allow plaintiff for inconvenience in going from his seat to the platform of the car and back again? A. Nothing. (10) Was it not the custom of the collector, Smith, to give a check to passengers for the large towns upon taking a ticket, and not to check passengers for the small towns like Reading? A. Yes. (11) Did plaintiff receive a check from the collector for the town of Emporia? A. No. (12) Did not the collector and conductor act in good faith, and with an honest belief that the plaintiff had not paid his fare from Reading to Emporia? A. No. (13) Did the conductor and collector, or either of them, act in wanton manner towards the plaintiff? and, if yes, state how. A. Yes; the collector, by not showing him the ticket, if it was for Reading and not Emporia, and convincing him of that fact; and the conductor, by forcibly putting him out of the car without investigating the case."

It is contended by the plaintiff in error that the third special finding of the jury is wholly unsupported by the evidence, and is untrue. The evidence of the plaintiff himself shows very clearly that no violence was used. Regarding this matter, he testified as follows: "Question. Who took hold of you? Answer. The conductor. Q. What did he say when he took hold of you? A. He said, 'You will have to get off.' Q. You say he spoke in an ordinary tone? A. He did not speak very loud. Q. And you went along to the door? A. Yes, sir. Q. You did not resist? A. No, sir. Q. You did not struggle any? A. No, sir; I did not. Q. Made no struggle? A. No, sir. Q. He did not use any violence in getting you to the door? A. No, sir; no great violence. Q. When you were out on the platform, he did not use any violence? A. No, sir. Q. You stepped down on the steps? A. Yes, sir. Q. They did not push you off, nor attempt to push you off? A. No, sir. * * * Q. Was you angry? A. I was a little angry, but I kept my temper. Q. You kept cool? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did the collector say anything to you other than you have told the jury? A. No, sir; he didn't. He was very mild, sir, the collector was. Q. Was the brakeman there? A. Yes, sir. Q. What did he say, if anything? A. I don't think he opened his mouth. * * * Q. They did not strike you? A. No, sir. Q. Nor push you? A. No, sir; only just pushed me a little ahead. I can tell you there was no violence used at all by the conductor. I don't claim any violence. I did not give them a chance. I knew, if I did resist, there would be violence. Q. You did not resist, and hence there was not any? A. No, sir; I did not resist."

We think, too, special findings 12 and 13 are unsupported by the evidence in this case. The collector seemed to have acted in good faith, and upon the honest belief that the ticket he received was to Reading. He stated that it read to Reading. The passenger, it seems, had not examined it, and did not know whether it read to Emporia or not. Each party, we think, acted upon his honest belief and conviction, —the passenger, that he had purchased a ticket to Emporia, because he had called for, and paid the price demanded by the agent of the railroad company for, a ticket to the latter place; the collector acted upon his judgment that the ticket he received from the passenger was to Reading, for the reason that it "read to Reading." What, then, was the duty of the collector, under the circumstances? Should he have relied upon the statement of the passenger, or been governed by the ticket? The latter rule has been adopted by the greater weight of authorities, and has been recognized by this court in the case of Railroad Co. v. Ganta, 38 Kan. 608, 17 Pac. Rep. 54. In Frederick v. Railroad Co., 37 Mich. 346, MARSTON, J., said: "There is but one rule which can safely be tolerated with any decent regard to the rights of railroad companies and passengers generally. As between the conductor and passenger, and the right of the latter to travel, the ticket produced must be conclusive evidence, and he must produce it when called upon, as the evidence of his right to these he claims." The collector acted upon this rule, and from the evidence of the plaintiff himself it does not appear that any violence was used by the trainmen.

The special findings of the jury numbered 8, 12, and 13 being unsupported by any evidence, it is recommended that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded to the district court with instructions to grant a new trial.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

STEWART v. HOVEY et al.

IMPROVEMENT OF COUNTY ROAD—PETITION—ESTOPPEL—COLLECTION OF ASSESSMENT—INJUNCTION.

1. Under chapter 214, Laws 1887, "An act providing for the improvement of county roads," the petition required by section 1 must be signed by a majority of the resident landholders within one-half mile on either side of a regularly laid out road within the terminal points mentioned, or the board of county commissioners acquire no jurisdiction to order the improvement prayed for.

2. A landholder who signed a petition for the improvement of a county road under chapter 214, Laws 1887, is not estopped from asserting a jurisdictional defect in the assessment proceedings by the act of signing.

(Syllabus by Simpson, C.)

ON REHEARING.

1. Although section 253 of the Civil Code gives an enlarged or additional remedy to the taxpayer, yet, if the tax or assessment is illegal, and it is shown that the principles of estoppel apply against the tax-payer, the jurisdiction of the court under the statute is to be exercised upon equitable principles, and the tax-payer, to succeed, must exhibit a case in which, upon the merits, he is entitled to the equitable relief demanded.

2. A land-owner who voluntarily invokes for his benefit the provisions of chapter 214, Sess. Laws 1887, for the purpose of improving a county road contiguous to his land; signed, circulated, and presented a petition under the provisions of that statute to the board of county commissioners, and asked for the improvement subsequently made; lives in the immediate vicinity of the improvement during its entire progress; is present upon the work at different times; knows that the petition is insufficient under the statute, and the improvement greatly enhances the value of his property, much in excess of any tax or assessment attempted to be imposed,—is not entitled to an injunction to restrain the collection of such tax or special assessment, although the improvement is made without any authority whatever. A party cannot invite and encourage a wrong, and then ask a court of equity to protect him by an injunction from the consequences of that wrong.

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Wyandotte county; O. L. MILLER, Judge.

Hutchings & Keplinger, for plaintiff in error. Winfield Freeman, A. L. Berger, and Scroggs & Gibson, for defendants in error.

SIMPSON, C. This is an action brought under section 253 of the Code by the plaintiff, Martin Stewart, to enjoin the collection of certain special taxes levied on his land by pretended authority of chapter 214 of the Laws of 1887, to pay the costs of grading and paving a county road known as "Quindaro Boulevard." The facts in this case are identical with those in the case of Barker v. Hovey, 44 Kan. —, ante, 585, 591, except that Martin Stewart, the plaintiff in this case, signed the petition for the improvement, while Thomas J. Barker, the plaintiff in the other case, did not sign such petition. This case was tried at the same time with the Barker Case, and the trial court made the following special findings of fact and separate conclusions of law in addition to those made in the Barker Case, but all the special findings of fact in the Barker Case, so far as they affect the interests of this plaintiff in error, are applicable to this case. Findings of fact: "(15) The plaintiff, Martin Stewart, lived in the immediate vicinity of the work during its entire progress, and was present upon the work at different times. He signed the petition presented to the county board, and himself circulated it and filed it with the board. He knew the contents of the petition, and that a majority of the resident landholders within the half-mile limit had not signed the petition, but acted under the advice of Mr. Cree, the then county attorney, 'that it was not necessary to have resident property holders as signers;' he presented and filed the petition, and asked that the improvements be made, and he knew that his property would be taxed for said improvement. The plaintiff knew at the time they were doing the work that one-inch cypress plank was being used, and complained to the commissioners about using one-inch instead of two-inch plank, and at the time the apportionment was made he filed a protest against the cost being taxed to him. (16) The property of the plaintiff lies contiguous to the improved road, and was greatly enhanced in value by reason of the improvement, much in excess of the tax imposed upon him for the improvement." Conclusions of law: "(1) The petition for the improvement of Quindaro boulevard was void. (2) The plaintiff is estopped from setting up the invalidity of the acts of the county commissioners or the assessment. (3) The temporary injunction is dissolved." It will be seen that the only difference in the two cases is this: Stewart, this plaintiff in error, signed the petition for the improvement of the boulevard, while Barker did not. The trial court was probably solely controlled by this additional fact in reaching the conclusion that Stewart was estopped from asserting the invalidity of the assessment.

1. It may be conceded, for the purposes of this case, that by signing the petition for the improvement of the road Stewart is estopped from pleading any mere irregularities or omissions in the assessment proceedings. Indeed, he could be estopped in various ways from asserting these. We have held in the Barker Case that, in order to give the board of county commissioners power to order the improvement, the petition therefor must be signed by a majority of the resident landholders within the termini mentioned. If this is not done, the whole proceeding is void and without authority. Can a resident landholder, by signing a petition that does not contain the signatures of the requisite majority, by that act give the board power to assess his property? Can the individual act of the resident landholder confer a power that the law withholds? The rule that want of jurisdiction over the subject-matter cannot be waived we believe to be of universal application to all kinds of legal proceedings, whether such proceedings are conducted in strictly judicial, or in quasi-judicial tribunals. Hawes, Jur. §§ 9, 10, 11, 12, and decisions cited in foot-notes. In ordinary actions prosecuted under our Code, an objection to the jurisdiction of the court either over the person or subject-matter of the action is not waived by failure to plead it. Section 91, Civil Code. The general principle that a tax-payer is not estopped by silence, failure to bring suit, or knowledge of jurisdictional defects, from contesting the validity of a special assessment on the ground of lack of power or jurisdiction in the tribunal attempting to make such assessment over the subject-matter, has often been decided, but we find only a few reported cases wherein the precise question in this case has been discussed and decided. A very recent case is that of McLauren v. City of Grand Forks, (Dak.) 43 N. W. Rep. 710, in which owners of lots situate on a street had signed a petition to have the street graded, and then sought to enjoin the collection of the special assessment made in payment of the grade. The court say: "Nor are the plaintiffs estopped from taking advantage of the invalidity of the tax certificates or the illegality of the proceedings. They did not, by merely petitioning the council to grade the street, waive the rights which they had under the statute; they did not assume to do so in their petition; they asked simply that the street be graded. It is not to be presumed that by such request they intended that such improvement should be made without reference to the provisions of the law under which it could only be made legally. On the contrary, the presumption, if any could be indulged in or was necessary, would be that the defendants should take such proceedings as were necessary under the law to be done for the grading of the street: not that the law be disregarded." This opinion then cites the following cases in support of that view: In re Sharp, 15 Amer. Rep. 415; Tone v. Columbus, 8 Amer. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 644; Steckert v. City of Saginaw, 22 Mich. 104; Martin v. Zellerbach, 38 Cal. 300. The case of Ruhland v. Town of Hazel Green, 55 Wis. 664, 13 N. W. Rep. 877, holds that "the board of supervisors of a town can acquire and retain jurisdiction of the proceeding to lay out, vacate, or alter a highway only by a strict compliance with the statutory requirements; and no consent or waiver by any person can confer such jurisdiction, or estop such person from questioning the validity of the proceeding, where there has been a failure to comply with the statute in any particular in which the public generally is interested." To like effect are the following Wisconsin cases: Williams v. Holmes, 2 Wis. 129; Austin v. Allen, 6 Wis. 134; Damp v. Town of Dane, 29 Wis. 419; State v. Castle, 44 Wis. 670. To hold otherwise would be to say that, in every instance in which a landholder signs a petition to locate a public highway or grade a street, or improve a county road, his assent thereby is expressly given to the exercise of power by the tribunal ordering the improvement that is not conferred by the statute, and that all usurpations of authority, or omissions and refusals of the tribunal to do those necessary and essential things required by the statute, are expressly waived as to him by his signature. We prefer to follow the rule indicated by the cases cited, and hold that Stewart was not estopped by the act of signing the petition for the improvement of the boulevard to now assert and show that the board of county commissioners, by reason of the defective petition, never acquired jurisdiction over the subject-matter. It is recommended that the judgment of the district court of Wyandotte county be reversed, and a new trial granted.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

ON REHEARING.

HORTON, C. J. In the former opinion handed down in this case, prepared by SIMPSON, C., it was asserted that Martin Stewart, the resident land-owner, who signed the petition for the improvement of the county road complained of, was not estopped by his acts or conduct from successfully prosecuting his action of injunction to restrain the collection of the special taxes levied on his land to pay the cost of grading and paving the county road known as the "Quindaro Boulevard." We have re-examined that opinion and various decisions affecting the question involved, and we are now of the opinion, without passing upon the constitutionality of the statute, that facts are disclosed in the record which amount to an estoppel against Stewart. The special facts found by the trial court show that Stewart lived in the immediate vicinity of the work during its entire progress; that he was present upon the work at different times; that he signed the petition presented to the county board, and circulated and filed it with the board; that he knew the contents of the petition; that he knew a majority of the resident landholders within the half-mile limit had not signed the petition; that he presented the petition to the board, and asked that the improvement be made; that he knew of the fatal defect in the petition; that he knew that his property would be taxed for the improvement; that he knew at the time the work was being done that one-inch cypress plank was being used therefor; that he complained to the commissioners about using one-inch instead of two-inch plank; that at the time the apportionment was made he filed a protest against the cost being taxed to him; that his property lies contiguous to the improved road, and was greatly enhanced in value by reason of the improvement, much in excess of the tax imposed upon him for the improvement. In Sleeper v. Bullen, 6 Kan. 300, it was decided that "a contract made by the city council under chapter 70, Laws 1867, for grading a street in Leavenworth city, without a sufficient petition having first been presented to the council, is, and all the proceedings under such contract are, void as against the lot-owners. A lot-owner who has notice of all the proceedings and makes no objection, but, on the contrary, encourages the contractors to do the grading, and tells them that they shall be paid therefor, is not entitled to an order of injunction to restrain the collection of a special tax levied on his lots to pay for said grading." In Lee v. Tillotson, 24 Wend. 337, it was held in New York that "a party may waive a constitutional as well as a statute provision made for his own benefit. The contrary argument would deprive a criminal of the power to plead guilty, on the ground that the constitution had secured him a trial by jury." In Ferguson v. Landram, 5 Bush. 230, it was said: "Upon what principle of exalted equity shall a man be permitted to receive a valuable consideration through a statute, procured by his own consent, or subsequently sanctioned by him, or from which he derives an interest and consideration, and then keep the consideration and repudiate the statute as unconstitutional?" In Daniels v. Tearney, 102 U. S. 415, it was also said that "it is well settled as a general proposition, subject to certain exceptions not necessary to be here noted, that, where a party has availed himself for his benefit of an unconstitutional law, he cannot, in a subsequent litigation with others not in that position, aver its unconstitutionality as a defense, although such unconstitutionality may have been pronounced by a competent judicial tribunal in another suit. In such cases the principle of estoppel applies with full force and conclusive effect. * * * The principle of estoppel thus applied has its foundation in a wise and salutary policy. It is a means of repose. It promotes fair dealing. It cannot be made an instrument of wrong or oppression, and it often gives triumph to right and justice where nothing else known to our jurisprudence can, by its operation, secure those ends. Like the statute of limitations, it is a conservator, and without it society could not well go on." "A party is, as a general rule, not estopped to deny the constitutionality of the statute which assumes to confer authority to order improvements and direct assessments by a mere failure to actively oppose improvements which he knows are being made. This is obviously the correct rule, for without a valid statute there can be no jurisdiction, and parties are incapable of conferring jurisdiction of the subject, although they may confer jurisdiction of the person. But when the doctrine is pressed further there is much difficulty, for the rule as now established by the weight of authority is that a party who procures, or actively aids in procuring, the enactment of an unconstitutional statute and accepts benefit under it cannot question its validity. It would require a very clear and strong case to warrant the application of this rule to street assessments, and yet such a case is conceivable. The fact that such a rule exists proves that the courts will carry the principle of estoppel to great lengths in the interests of justice, and proves, also, that the courts which confine the operation of the principle of estoppel in assessment cases to mere irregularities have gone astray." Elliott, Roads & S. 422; State v. Mitchell, 81 Ohio St. 529; Burlington v. Gilbert, 31 Iowa, 356; Mots v. Detroit, 18 Mich. 526. That "the principles of estoppel apply where the proceedings are questioned on the ground of the unconstitutionality of the statute under which they are had, as well as where they are sought to be impeached upon other grounds," is not an open question. See Counterman v. Dublin Tp., 38 Ohio St. 515; Tone v. Columbus, 89 Ohio St. 281, 308; State v. Mitchell, supra. Under the decision in Sleeper v. Bullen, supra, the special taxes levied for grading were held illegal, and it was further held that the city had no legal right to sell the lots of Sleeper, yet Sleeper was denied an injunction in that case because he had encouraged the contractors to do the grading. See, also, Ritchie v. City of South Topeka, 88 Kan. 368, 16 Pac. Rep. 332. This case is unlike Barker v. Hovey, ante, 585, (recently decided,) because in that case Barker refused to sign the petition for the improvement when it was presented to him, and is also unlike the case of Hovey v. Barker, ante, 591, because in that case it was sought to estop Barker by mere silence and inaction. Here Stewart instituted the proceedings which led to the improvement and the assessment complained of. He was a willing and active consenting party in the whole matter. Whether, therefore, the tax be legally valid or not, there is no good ground upon his part for claiming the interposition of a court of equity by its extraordinary process of injunction to stay the collection of the tax against his property. Tone v. Columbus, 89 Ohio St. 281, and cases there cited; Cooley, Tax'n, p. 578.

It is claimed, however, that this is a statutory action, having been brought under section 253 of the Civil Code, and therefore that it is not a suit in equity. Ohio has a statute somewhat similar. It was said in Steeze v. Oviatt, 24 Ohio St. 248, that "the act of May 1, 1856, (Swan & C. St. 1151;) gives to the courts jurisdiction to restrain the collection of taxes illegally assessed; but the jurisdiction thus conferred is an equitable jurisdiction, and is to be exercised upon equitable principles. Proceeding under the statute, the party complaining is not required to show a case of threatened irreparable injury, or the absence of a remedy by ordinary legal proceedings; but he must exhibit a case in which, upon the merits, he is entitled to the equitable relief demanded." This case was followed in Stephen v. Daniels, 27 Ohio St. 527. It is there stated: "That this is a statute creating new statutory rights of action, not theretofore existing, is, in the opinion of a majority of the court, quite clear. * * * The taxpayer, stripped of any valuable or practical remedy for the injuries inflicted under color of law and by authority of the state, was almost powerless. To provide a proper remedy was the object of this law. It was a legislative recognition of a fundamental duty enjoined by the constitution of the state, that, while the power to tax was essential to government, the duty of protecting the citizen from illegal exactions under the name of taxes, and under the forms of law, was not to be forgotten or neglected. It being, therefore, remedial in its character, it should receive that construction, if the words will reasonably admit, that will effect the manifest intention of the legislature, and remedy the evil. It gives a remedy by injunction, on the application of a single person taxed, when none existed before. In his application he need not aver and show, as under ordinary rules in equity, that great or irreparable injury is about to be done for which he has no adequate remedy at law, but only that the tax is illegal which is about to be assessed or collected. Steeze

v. Oviatt, 24 Ohio St. 253. It thus becomes apparent that a new equitable remedy was given by this statute." In Tone v. Columbus, supra, it was said: "Under section 24 of the act the city council had no right to authorize the improvement until such two-thirds of the owners had petitioned the council for the privileges of the act. We have no doubt that this requirement of the law may be waived by the owners, or that they may by their acts, and under circumstances by their inaction, estop themselves from alleging its failure." See, also, City of Ottawa v. Barney, 10 Kan. 270. In that case, Mr. Justice BREWER said: "It alleges that the assessment actually made upon one lot was $184.80, while a legal assessment would not have exceeded $50, and that a similar proposition existed as to the other lots. It nowhere alleges payment or tender of the amount due under such legal assessment. He who seeks equity must do equity. The plaintiffs below admit they owe something, but deny that they owe all that has been assessed. Before injunction will lie under these circumstances, they must pay or tender what they owe." (City of Lawrence v. Killam, 11 Kan. 499. Both of these cases were decided by this court after section 253 of the Civil Code had been adopted. We must therefore conclude that, although section 253 of the Civil Code gives an enlarged or additional remedy to the tax-payer, yet, if the tax or assessment is illegal, and it is shown that the principles of estoppel apply against the tax-payer, the jurisdiction of the court under the statute is to be exercised upon equitable principles, and the tax-payer, to succeed, must exhibit a case, in which, upon the merits, he is entitled to the equitable relief demanded. Steele v. Oviatt, supra. We now decide, upon the facts found, that the motion for a rehearing be granted, that the judgment of reversal heretofore entered be set aside, and that the judgment of the district court must be affirmed. All the justices concurring.

CHICAGO, K. & W. R. CO. v. BLEVINS.

INJURY TO RAILROAD EMPLOYE—DEFECTIVE TOOLS.

1. As between a railway company and its employes, the railway company is required to exercise reasonable and ordinary diligence in furnishing to its employes reasonably safe tools with which to perform the work committed to them.

2. As between the railway company and its employes, the company is negligent in furnishing to its employes defective and dangerous tools to work with, where it has notice of the defects, or could by the exercise of ordinary diligence have discovered such defects.

3. Evidence examined, and held sufficient to sustain the findings and verdict.

(Syllabus by Strang, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Wilson county; L. STILLWELL, Judge.

George R. Peck, A. A. Hurd, and Robert Dunlap, for plaintiff in error. S. S. Kirkpatrick, for defendant in error.

STRANG, C. Action for damages. On the last day of November, 1886, the defendant, Blevins, a bridge carpenter, was working for the plaintiff on a bridge on its right of way over Fall river, in Wilson county, Kan. It became necessary for some one to go upon the top of the structure to put certain timbers, called "corbels," in place. The defendant went up to assist in doing this work. It was necessary to drive the timbers to place; and one Murray, having charge of that immediate work for the plaintiff, handed Blevins a wooden maul with which to drive the corbels into position. Blevins received the maul, and, striking the outside corbel on its side, drove it to its side position, and then turned to drive it endways to place. He struck the timber once on the end all right, but when he delivered the second blow he lost his balance, and fell some 30 feet, seriously and dangerously injuring his spine and hip, from the effects of which he is still badly crippled, with no prospect of recovery. The defendant claims that he was thrown off his balance by the rebound of the maul he was using, and that the rebound was caused by the unsafe and dangerous condition of the maul furnished him by the company for the work he was at the time doing. He says the maul had a cracked and crooked handle in it, and had become so badly worn and battered that it was uneven on the surface, which, when the blow was struck with it, caused it to glance and rebound in such a way as to jerk him over and off his balance, causing him to fall. This cause was three times tried in the district court. The first trial resulted in a verdict for $10,000 in favor of the plaintiff below, which was set aside by the trial court as excessive; at the second trial the jury disagreed; and the last trial resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff for $5,000. The jury also returned a special verdict, consisting of answers to a large number of questions submitted to them by the court on behalf of the defendant. Defendant moved for judgment for costs on the special verdict, notwithstanding the general verdict. Motion overruled. Motion for a new trial heard and overruled.

The first and most important question raised by the plaintiff in error is whether the verdict is sustained by the evidence. That this is one of those cases into which the element of doubt largely enters, so far as the merits of the case are concerned, is evidenced by the fact that it was three times tried in the court below. The court in which the case was tried presided over by a learned and careful judge; and the history of the trial in the court below shows that he did not hesitate, in the exercise of his authority, to protect the rights of the plaintiff in error when he thought they had been trampled upon by the jury trying the case. These things should count for something in favor of the judgment when this court is reviewing a close case like the present. The jury trying the case returned a general verdict, and also found specially the existence of certain facts, among which are the following: "Was the man Murray also a foreman, under Carter, who had general supervision of the work? Answer. Yes. Did the plaintiff, pursuant to the directions of Carter and Murray, go upon the pier of defendant's bridge for the purpose of assisting in the adjustment of the corble block? A. Yes. Did Murray, one of the defendant's foremen, while the plaintiff was standing upon the pier, procure and hand to him the maul referred to in the evidence for the purpose of adjusting this timber? A. Yes. Did the plaintiff, in obedience to the directions of Murray, proceed to strike the corble blocks with the maul handed to him by Murray? A. Yes. Did the uneven face of this maul, when it came in contact with the end of the timber, bound to one side, and cause Blevins to lose his balance and fall from the bridge? A. Yes. Was the defendant in great haste for the completion of this bridge? A. Yes. Was the maul which caused the plaintiff to fall a defective and dangerous tool to work with? A. Yes. Did Blevins know of the uneven face of this maul and dangerous condition at the time that he used it? A. No. Did Carter, the foreman of the defendant, have notice of the defective and dangerous condition of this maul, or could the defendant by the exercise of ordinary care have discovered its dangerous condition? A. Yes. Was the work on the bridge where the plaintiff was employed being done about as usual on the day of the plaintiff's alleged injuries? A. No; they were hurried. Did the plaintiff use great care when he was using the maul just before he fell? A. Yes. What acts of negligence, if any, was the defendant guilty of, causing plaintiff to fall? A. Neglecting to furnish suitable maul. What caused the plaintiff to fall? A. By defendant furnishing him with a defective tool. Could the plaintiff by ordinary care have discovered the condition of the maul and handle at the time he used it? A. No. If you answer the above in the negative, state fully what prevented him from so discovering the condition of the maul. A. Lack of time to consider." The liability of the railroad company depends—First, upon the negligence of its agents; and, secondly, upon the absence of contributory negligence on the part of Blevins. The negligence of the railroad company, if any, consists solely in furnishing Blevins with an unsafe tool with which to perform the work he was directed to do by the agent of the company, and in the performance of which he was engaged when he suffered the injury complained of. Upon this question the findings of the jury are very strong against the company. The twelfth question submitted to the jury by the plaintiff below, and the answer thereto, are as follows: "Did the uneven face of this maul, when it came in contact with the end of the timber, bound to one side, and cause Blevins to lose his balance and fall from the bridge? A. Yes." While question 15 and answer read as follows: "Was the maul which caused the plaintiff to fall a defective and dangerous tool to work with? A. Yes." The answers to other questions show that Murray procured the maul, and gave it to Blevins to use in driving the corbles to place. They also show that Murray knew, or could have known, by the exercise of ordinary care, of the dangerous condition of the maul. It necessarily follows, then, that if these findings are supported by evidence the railroad company was guilty of negligence.

The plaintiff testified as follows, in relation to his fall: "Question. After you got it adjusted, you struck it upon the end? Answer. Where, I don't recollect. It seems to me there was one or two licks—I wouldn't be positive as to that—that I struck upon the end. I don't know whether it was one or two. I can't call to mind now. It was not over two licks, I am satisfied. Q. What was the result of the strike? A. Well, the maul rebounded when I struck, and jerked me. I was standing with my face in this direction, and the maul rolled with me to the right, and jerked me off. I fell down in there somewhere upon the breakwater." Dick Yaney, a witness for the plaintiff below, testified as follows: "He stepped round, and turned as though he was going to hit it, and upon that he made a second lick. The maul bounced and rolled,—bounced in his hands,—and threw him off his balance head foremost down. Question. Which way did the maul spring when it rolled? Answer. To the right. Q. He struck it, and, the second lick he struck, the maul swung to the right? A. Yes, sir. Q. And threw him off? A. Yes, sir." It would seem as though this and other evidence like it in the record was sufficient to support the finding that the maul, in the condition it was in at the time it was given Blevins for use by him in driving the corbles to place, was an unsafe tool to use, especially in the dangerous position in which he was required to use it, and that the company was guilty of negligence in handing it to Blevins to be used by him in the position occupied by him at the time.

Was the plaintiff below guilty of contributory negligence? Upon this branch of the case the findings of the jury, or a part of them, are as follows: "Did Blevins know of the uneven face of this maul and dangerous condition at the time he used it? Answer. No. Was the defendant not in great haste for the completion of this bridge? A. Yes. Was the work on the bridge being done about as usual on the day of the plaintiff's alleged injuries? A. No; they were hurried. Did the plaintiff use great care when he was using the maul just before he fell? A. Yes. Could the plaintiff by ordinary care have discovered the condition of the maul and handle at the time he used it? A. No. If you answer the above in the negative, state fully what prevented him from so discovering the condition of the maul. A. Lack of time to consider." These findings clearly exonerate Blevins from any contributory negligence. Are they justified under the evidence? There is no evidence showing that Blevins was, in fact, careless or negligent. He himself testified as follows upon this question: "Question. In using that maul and driving the timbers, what degree of care did you use? Answer. I used all the care that I could. I did not want to be crippled." Blevins also testifies that he had never seen the maul before it was handed to him to use at the time he fell, except as it lay on the dump, 15 to 20 feet away; that he did not inspect it when handed to him; noticed the edges of the maul were battered some, but did not see the face of the maul, and did not know it was uneven. He says the work that morning was under more of a rush than usual, because Mr. Carter, the bridge boss, wanted to get to raise the timbers that he was hurried, and did not stop to inspect the face of the maul. The law requires employes to use ordinary care to discover whether or not the tools furnished them by the master are such as can be used with safety, especially when the defects are obvious. But whether an employe has used ordinary care or not in a given case must be determined after an examination of the surrounding circumstances and conditions at the time its exercise is required. What will be held sufficient care under some circumstances will not under others. So, in this case, while there does not seem to have been a great degree of care exercised by Blevins, yet, when we consider that the maul was handed him by the representative of the railroad company, which gave him a right to suppose it was safe; that he was in a high and dangerous position, which limited his opportunities for the inspection of the maul; and that the work at the time was being rushed so that he was hurried, and his opportunity for inspection of the maul thus interfered with,—we do not care to say he did not exercise ordinary care under the circumstances.

The plaintiff in error complains of the latter part of the third general instruction given to the jury. We have examined this instruction, and, taken as a whole, we do not think it is erroneous. It is therefore recommended that the judgment of the district court be affirmed.

EJECTMENT—RES ADJUDICATA.

Where, upon the trial of an action of ejectment to recover a quarter section of land, it appeared that in a foreclosure suit in another county the defendant had answered and set up his title to the same land under a tax-deed executed since the date of the mortgage, and in the trial of such foreclosure suit the court found that the defendant had a valid tax-deed, and was the owner and in the actual possession of such land, and that no other party to the suit had any lien thereon, and then rendered a judgment against the mortgagor, and decreed that certain lands be ordered sold to satisfy said mortgage, but did not include the land claimed by the defendant under his tax-deed, held, that such special finding of fact in favor of the defendant became a part of and was included in the judgment and decree in the foreclosure suit, and the same became res adjudicata as to the parties to the action and all persons claiming under them.

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Shawnee county; JOHN GUTHRIE, Judge.

A. L. Redden and H. H. Harris, for plaintiff in error. Johnson, Martin & Keeler and G. A. Huron, for defendants in error.

v.26p.no.10—44

GREEN, C. This was an action of ejectment, brought by the plaintiff in error against the defendants in error, in the district court of Shawnee county, to recover the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 11, in township 10, of range 16. The defendants set up a claim of title under a certain tax-deed, and also alleged that the question of the defendant's title had been finally adjudicated in a suit commenced in the district court of Leavenworth county, and set up such decree and judgment as being res adjudicata. The case was tried by the court without a jury, and judgment rendered in favor of the defendants. It seems that George R. Hines was the owner of the undivided half of this land on the 1st day of July, 1873. In October of the same year he conveyed his interest to W. H. Carson, who deeded to Harrison C. Hines, and he sold the same to the plaintiff in error on the 18th day of August, 1884. The defendants' claim to the land is based upon the possession of Eli W. Metzger on March 1, 1883, under a certain tax-deed, and a foreclosure suit commenced by W. J. Buchan, as trustee, in the district court of Leavenworth county, on the 7th day of March, 1883, against George C. Hines, Harrison C. Hines, Eli W. Metzger, et al., to foreclose a mortgage executed by George R. Hines and wife on the property in controversy, and several other tracts in Leavenworth, Shawnee, and other counties. In this foreclosure case, summons was served upon Harrison C. Hines and George R. Hines in Jefferson county on the 13th day of March, 1883, by the under-sheriff of the county, but in making his return he signed it, "Sheriff of Leavenworth County, Kansas, by W. S. Van Cleave, Under-Sheriff." The summons being from the latter county, the officer had doubtless neglected to erase the printed matter on the summons. On the 24th day of December, 1886, and upon proper notice to the plaintiff, but without the knowledge of the original defendants named, the sheriff's return, by leave of the court, was amended so as to conform to the facts, and was signed by George Davis, sheriff of Jefferson county, by W. S. Van Cleave, under-sheriff. The defendants Hines made default. Metzger, by his answer, alleged that he was the owner of this quarter section of land in controversy by virtue of a tax-deed made subsequent to the mortgage, and that therefore the land was not subject to the mortgage. In the trial of this case in the district court of Leavenworth county, on the 5th day of July, 1884, the following finding of fact, with others, was made: "That the defendant Eli W. Metzger has a valid tax-deed of the south-east quarter of 11, township 10, range 16, in Shawnee county, Kansas, and is the owner and is in the actual possession thereof, and that no other party to this suit has any lien thereon." The contention of the plaintiff in error is that the district court of Leavenworth county rendered no judgment whatever upon this finding, and therefore nothing was settled in that case so far as the rights of the parties to this suit are concerned; that no person is bound by any litigation until there is a final judgment; that until a court renders a judgment upon a verdict of the jury, or its own findings, it is always susceptible of further investigation and of further litigation. It is conceded by the defendants in error that plaintiff in error has shown such a title to the undivided half of this land sued for as would prevail, but for the fact that it has been extinguished by the foreclosure proceedings in the district court of Leavenworth county, and that the tax-deed through which the defendants in error obtained title is voidable, upon the evidence offered by the plaintiff in error, provided he is not estopped by a former adjudication from attacking the validity of this tax-deed. This concession materially simplifies the case, so that the question of a former adjudication becomes the controlling one here.

A final judgment and decree were rendered in the foreclosure proceedings in the district court of Leavenworth county. A personal judgment was rendered against George K. Hines, and in favor of W. J. Buchan, as trustee, and certain lands were ordered sold to satisfy that judgment, but the land in controversy was not included in this decree. The question, then, which this case presents, is this: Did the special finding in favor of Eli Metzger, concerning this land, become a part of, and was it included in, the judgment and decree finally rendered by the district court of Leavenworth county? If it did, the question must be answered in favor of the defendants; if it did not enter into the final determination of the case, nothing was settled by this finding. It is true, as counsel for plaintiff in error contends, that no man should be bound by any litigation until there is a final judgment; but in this case there was a final decree, and our judgment is that the finding was considered in rendering this decree, for the reason that the land claimed by Metzger was not included with the other tracts of land to be sold. This land was described in the mortgage. The plaintiff in the foreclosure suit asked that it be sold, with the other lands, to satisfy the mortgage. The defendant Metzger answered that he was the owner by virtue of a tax-deed. The ownership of this land thus became one of the issuable questions to be settled, and, as the holder of such title, he had the right to make full defense. Bradley v. Parkhurst, 20 Kan. 462; Pattle v. Wilson, 25 Kan. 326. The record shows a trial and finding in favor of Metzger, and this finding was confirmed by the judgment of foreclosure of the mortgage as to the other tracts of land described in the plaintiff's petition, which excepted this land so found to belong to him. This decree, we think, necessarily affirmed the finding that Metzger had a valid tax-deed, that he was the owner and in the actual possession of the land in controversy, and that no other parties to the foreclosure suit had any liens upon the same. The rule of res adjudicata applies as well to facts settled and adjudicated as to causes of action. Whitaker v. Hawley, 30 Kan. 326, 1 Pac. Rep. 508. The judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction is conclusive on the parties as to all points directly involved in it, and necessarily determined. Shirland v. Bank, (Iowa,) 21 N. W. Rep. 200; Freem. Judgm. § 249. "When a fact has been once determined in the course of a judicial proceeding, and a final judgment has been rendered in accordance therewith, it cannot be again litigated between the same parties without virtually impeaching the correctness of the former decision, which, from motives of public policy, the law does not permit to be done. The estoppel is not confined to the judgment, but extends to all facts involved in it as necessary steps, or the ground-work upon which it must have been founded. It is allowable to reason back from a judgment to the basis on which it stands, upon the obvious principle that where a conclusion is indisputable, and could have been drawn only from certain premises, the premises are equally indisputable with the conclusion." Burien v. Shannon, 99 Mass. 200; Board v. Railroad Co., 24 Wis. 124; Freem. Judgm. § 257; Wells, Res. Adj. § 226; 1 Herm. Estop. § 111. Counsel for plaintiff in error relies upon the case of Auld v. Smith, 28 Kan. 65, where this court said: "A thing contained in the findings or verdict, but not included in or confirmed by the judgment, cannot be considered as an adjudication, or used as evidence, unless some other ground can be found for its use than merely that it is contained in such findings or verdict." Our view of this case does not conflict with the principle there decided. We think the judgment rendered in the foreclosure suit in Leavenworth county was in accordance with the special finding in favor of Metzger; and the fact that the record affirmatively shows that the land that he set up a title to in his answer was not included in the decree of foreclosure is evidence that the special finding must have entered into and become a part of such decree. We recommend an affirmance of the judgment.

SOLLENBERGER et al. v. STEPHENS.

ACTION ON NOTE—WANT OF CONSIDERATION—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In an action brought by the payee, as the plaintiff, to recover the amount of a promissory note, which is admitted to have been executed and delivered by the defendant to the plaintiff, the burden of proof to defeat the note, or any part of the same, is upon the defendant to establish that the note was without consideration, or that there was a failure of a part of the consideration thereof.

Error from district court, Rooks county; LOUIS K. PRATT, Judge.

W. B. Ham, for plaintiffs in error. M. C. Reville, for defendant in error.

HORTON, C. J. This was an action in the court below upon a promissory note executed by James H. and John L. Sollenberger to Robert L. Stephens, on August 19, 1886, for $700, with 10 per cent. interest, payable January 1, 1887. There was a credit upon the note of $77. The defendants answered that James H. Sollenberger was of unsound mind, and incapable of managing his own business; that Robert L. Stephens, during a part of 1885 and 1886, acted as his attorney in fact in selling town lots in Woodston, Rooks county, and also in transacting his business; that a settlement was made between the parties on the 19th of August, 1886; that the note in controversy was then executed, but that such settlement was unfair and unjust, because Stephens made a fraudulent statement concerning his receipts and expenditures while transacting the business for James H. Sollenberger. Trial had before the court with a jury. The jury returned a verdict in favor of Stephens, and against James H. and John L. Sollenberger, for $500. Judgment was entered accordingly, and the defendants excepted, and bring the case here. It appears from the evidence that James H. Sollenberger was a person of weak mind; that no account of his business transaction between Stephens and James H. Sollenberger had been kept by Sollenberger; and that at the time of the settlement, and the execution of the note sued on, James H. Sollenberger, and the parties who assisted him at the settlement, were compelled to rely upon the statements and accounts of Stephens. It is claimed that the court erred in instructing the jury that the burden was upon the defendants to prove that Stephens had failed to render a full account of his trust. At the time the settlement was made between Stephens and James H. Sollenberger, James H. was represented by C. W. Smith as his attorney, and by his brother, John L. Sollenberger, who was then acting as his attorney in fact. Robert L. Stephens was a farmer, but assisted in locating the depot of the Missouri Pacific Railroad upon James H. Sollenberger's land at Woodston, and after such location carried on the business of a real-estate agent. After the settlement between the parties was agreed to, C. W. Smith, as the attorney of James H. Sollenberger, drew up a written settlement, which was signed. The $700 embraced in the promissory note were allowed Stephens in the settlement for his services as attorney in fact and agent for James H. Sollenberger. He claimed that he had rendered service for nearly 14 months. Upon the pleadings, the burden of proof was upon the defendants below to establish the truth of the allegations of their answer. The settlement and compromise of the 19th of August, 1886, was in writing, signed by R. L. Stephens and James H. Sollenberger. This was witnessed by M. C. Reville, the attorney of R. L. Stephens, and C. W. Smith, the attorney of James H. Sollenberger. The note was executed and delivered to Stephens by James H. Sollenberger and his brother, John L. Sollenberger, in accordance with the terms of the written settlement and compromise. The execution of the note was admitted, and to defeat the same, or any part thereof, it was necessary to prove the allegations of the answer. Therefore the court committed no error in instructing the jury that the burden of proof in this regard was upon the defendants. There are various other alleged errors complained of, but an examination of the record does not convince us that the trial court committed any error material or prejudicial to the rights of the defendants. No material evidence was rejected. The consideration mentioned in the deeds taken by Stephens was fully explained, and to all appearances the trial was fair. The court below expressly instructed the jury that if Stephens acted fraudulently in the settlement, or misrepresented things to James H. and John L. Sollenberger, or C. W. Smith, the attorney, the notes should be defeated, or the amount thereof reduced, according to the facts in the case. If Stephens had made a settlement alone with James H. Sollenberger, we could readily understand, in view of his weak-minded condition, that such a settlement would be worthless. But at the time the settlement was made James H. Sollenberger was well represented by his brother, John L. Sollenberger, and by C. W. Smith, his attorney. Under all the circumstances of the case, we do not perceive any good reason for granting a new trial. The judgment of the district court will be affirmed. All the justices concurring

ACTION ON CONTRACT — PLEADING — EVIDENCE — LIMITATION.

1. The petition in this case examined, and held that it states a cause of action, and that the demurrer thereto was properly overruled.

2. The evidence examined, and held sufficient to support the verdict and findings of the jury.

3. Record examined, and held that, under the contract sued on, the action accrued in favor of Rombauer when he sold his stock in the Pittsburg Coal Company, and that the statute of limitations commenced to run at that time, and would run in three years, and had not, therefore, run at the commencement of this action.

(Syllabus by Strang, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Crawford county; GEORGE CHANDLER, Judge.

John T. Voss, Ed Van Gundy, and W. C. Webb, for plaintiff in error. W. C. Perry, for defendant in error.

STRANG, C. In May, 1883, the Pittsburg Coal Company was a corporation doing business in Crawford county, Kan. At that time it was heavily in debt, and very greatly embarrassed, so much so that it was likely to go into the hands of a receiver. The stock of the company consisted of 2,000 shares of $100 each, and was owned principally by C. Wood Davis, R. G. Rombauer, and James Patmor and wife. The holdings of Davis, Rombauer, and Patmor, including that of his wife, was about equal. These parties were all anxious to sell out, as it had become manifest to them that they could not carry the business of the company along, and to sell out was the only means whereby they could save anything to themselves, and also get rid of a very heavy debt, amounting to nearly $60,000. Rombauer was the secretary and treasurer of the company, and the negotiation of a sale seems to have been left principally to him. He finally arranged to sell two-thirds of the stock to Col. E. H. Brown. Upon the basis of the liabilities of the company being $53,000, Brown was to pay $24,000 for two-thirds of the stock. If the liabilities exceeded $53,000, such excess to be deducted from the $24,000 to be paid by Brown. The liabilities were found to amount to about $59,000, and the sum paid by Brown was something over $20,000. Rombauer, plaintiff below, claims that Brown would not purchase the Davis and Patmor stock, unless he (Rombauer) would retain his stock, and remain a member of the company, and in charge of its business. He also claims that he reported the sale, with its condition, to Davis and Patmor, and told them he could not consent to the arrangement to hold his stock and remain in, unless he was protected, because he was afraid he would be frozen out and get nothing for his stock; and that Davis and Patmor then agreed that, if he would go ahead and close the sale on the terms and conditions reported, and let them have the proceeds of the present sale, that whenever he could sell his stock, if it did not bring as much as they were getting for theirs, they would make up to him the deficiency, so that he should receive one-third of what the whole stock sold for. Rombauer says he assented to that, and closed the trade; that Davis and Patmor received something over $10,000 each for their stock; that he sold his stock as soon as he could, and for the best price he could get for it, $7,000; that thereupon Davis and Patmor each owed him $1,035 on said agreement. Patmor did not pay, and this suit was brought to recover that amount and accrued interest. The defendant below demurred to the petition in the case, which was overruled. He then answered by general denial, and also pleaded the statute of limitations. A reply was filed containing a general denial. The case was tried to the court and a jury January 12, 1888. The defendant below demurred to the evidence of the plaintiff, which was overruled. The jury returned a general verdict for the plaintiff below for $1,173.68, and also made the following special findings: "The defendant asks the court to require the jury to answer the following questions in case their general verdict is in favor of the plaintiff: (1) Did the plaintiff and the defendant enter into an agreement of the kind and character set out in the plaintiff's petition? Answer. Yes. (2) Was said agreement reduced to writing, or did it rest in parol? A. In parol. (3) When and where was said agreement entered into? A. In May, 1883, at Pittsburgh, Kan. (4) Who was present when said agreement was entered into? A. C. W. Davis. (5) Was the Pittsburgh Coal Company in great difficulties financially? A. Yes. (6) Was its stock of little practicable value? A. Yes. (7) What was the value of the Pittsburgh Coal Company's property on May 7, 1883? A. From $75,000 to $85,000. (8) What was the total amount of the said Pittsburgh Coal Company's indebtedness on May 7, 1883? A. Between fifty-five and sixty thousand dollars. (9) In what sum do you find the assets to exceed the liabilities of said coal company on May 7, 1883? A. From $25,000 to $35,000. (10) What moved the plaintiff to remain in said coal company after May 7, 1883? What was the cause of his doing so? A. To protect his interest. (11) Was the contract between the plaintiff and defendant (if any was made) entered into prior to or after May 7, 1883? A. Prior. (12) On what day did the plaintiff sell to E. H. Brown the holding of stock of Patmor and Davis? A. On or about May 7, 1883. (13) When was Patmor and Davis to pay any sum of money on said contract? A. No time set. (14) Was there any particular time when they or either of them was to pay said money, or any part thereof? A. Yes; when plaintiff sold his interest. (15) Was it or any part thereof to be paid within one year from the day on which the Patmor and Davis stock was sold to E. H. Brown? (Refused, and excepted to by the defendant.) (16) Was it to be paid at some remote and indefinite time? A. Yes. (17) At and after the time the Davis and Patmor stock was sold to Brown did plaintiff hold the same position in the Pittsburgh Coal Company that he had theretofore held? A. Yes." Motion for new trial was made and overruled. Motion to set aside the special findings of the jury overruled.

The plaintiff in error contends here that the demurrer to the petition in the court below should have been sustained. He says the petition is defective in not stating that the stock was not at any time prior to February 27, 1886, of any greater value than $7,000. Under the contract alleged, and proved to the satisfaction of the jury, we do not think it was necessary to allege that the stock of Rombauer was not, at any time prior to his sale of the same to Brown, of a greater value than $7,000. As we understand the contract, and as the jury evidently understood it, Rombauer was to get out as soon as he could, and for the best price he could, exercising his own judgment in so doing. He was not bound to wait for a raise in the value of the stock, nor was he compelled to accept the first offer made him therefor, if he thought he could do better. He was simply bound to act in good faith with Davis and Patmor in selling out, and there is no allegation of any fraud or want of good faith on his part. The evidence shows, however, that in point of fact he sold at the first and only opportunity he had to sell. That opportunity did not occur for 18 months after the sale of the Davis and Patmor stock, and then he sold to Brown, the only person likely to want to buy. It is argued that, at the time Rombauer sold his stock to Brown, the stock was worth more than it was when the Davis and Patmor stock was sold, and that he accepted a less price for his than he got for theirs. It must be remembered, however, that in the mean time, during the interval between the sales of stock, the Pittsburgh Coal Company had been reorganized and became the Pittsburgh & Midway Coal Company, and there-is nothing in the evidence to show how Rombauer was protected, so far as his interest in the old company was concerned, when the reorganization took place. His stock may have been affected adversely by such reorganization, and been worth less than before. His interest may have been so affected that he thought the best thing he could do was to sell for what he could get.

It is said that the petition failed to state that Rombauer had complied with the terms of the contract himself. While the petition does not in so many words contain such an allegation, it yet shows that he had done what was required of him. He was to sell the stock of Davis & Patmor, retain his, and remain in the company for the time, and sell out as soon as he could, and the best he could. The petition alleges these things. We think the demurrer was properly overruled. The demurrer to the evidence was also properly overruled. The plaintiff had sustained his allegation in relation to the agreement by his own and Davis' evidence; had proved the sale of the Davis and Patmor stock, and the amount realized therefor; and thus shown that under the agreement Patmor was indebted to him in the sum claimed. Was the plaintiff below entitled to recover, under the evidence? For the purpose of arguing that he was not, counsel for plaintiff in error say the contract that Patmor is alleged to have made is nothing short of marvelous. We do not think there is anything marvelous or wonderful about the contract. It was not very definite in some of its provisions, and depended somewhat more than contracts usually do upon the honor of the contracting parties, to be carried out in good faith. But the contracting parties were friends, and partners in business, and evidently had a business confidence in each other; and when this is taken into consideration, together with the nature and character of the transaction, and the situation of the parties at the time with respect to their business, the contract appears natural enough. But, if there was anything marvelous about it, it did not entirely grow out of Mr. Patmor's credulity. It is no more marvelous that he should have made such a contract with Rombauer than that Rombauer should have made such a contract with him. According to the evidence, Patmor got over $10,000 for what he expressed an emphatic willingness to sell for $4,000, if he could get out of the business. It follows, then, that if Rombauer had got nothing for his stock, and Davis and Patmor still performed the contract Rombauer says they made with him, they would each realize some $2,000 more than the amount they were willing to sell for; so it was a winning deal for them, in any event. But, then, the question is not whether the contract was a marvelous one or not, but was there a contract of the kind Rombauer avers was made between them? The jury have settled this question for all parties. They return a general verdict for the plaintiff, and support it with a special finding directly in point. The first question asked and answered by the jury reads as follows: "Did the plaintiff and defendant enter into an agreement of the kind and character set out in the plaintiff's petition?" To which question the jury say, "Yes." The jury also settled another question that is discussed by counsel for plaintiff in error. They say, in answer to the eleventh question, that the agreement entered into between plaintiff and defendant, set out in the petition in the lower court, was made prior to May 7, 1883, and therefore prior to the sale by Rombauer of the stock of Davis and Patmor to Brown: for in answer to the twelfth finding they say the sale to Brown was on the 7th of May, 1883. We think, under the whole evidence, the sale to Brown and the agreement between plaintiff and defendant were practically contemporaneous. We think the court below was right in its instructions touching the question of the statute of limitations. The statute commenced to run from the time when the cause of action accrued in favor of Rombauer, which was upon the sale of his stock to Brown, and would run in three years. It had not run at the commencement of this suit. We have read the instructions through, and, taken as a whole, we think they are fair and good law. It is true there is a good deal of them, but then it is better to have some law to spare than to have too little, if the surplus is innocent of harm, as we think it was in this case. It is recommended that the judgment of the district court be affirmed.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. May 9, 1891.)

ATTACHMENT—PREFERENCE OF CREDITORS.

If a debtor, in good faith, prefers some creditors to others, either by making payments, or transferring his property, or giving chattel mortgages, this is not, of itself, ground for the issuing of an attachment against the debtor. Tootle v. Coldwell, 30 Kan. 125, 1 Pac. Rep. 829.

Error from district court, Osage county; R. B. SPILLMAN, Judge.

W. A. Madaris and Ellis Lewis, for plaintiff in error. L. T. Wilson, for defendant in error.

HORTON, C. J. The error alleged in this case is that the trial court erred in discharging the attachment. The question is one of fact, and the testimony wholly by affidavits. It is apparent that on the 12th day of December, 1887, E. M. Armstrong gave a statement, signed by himself, to the Abernathy Furniture Company, that he had property, goods, and merchandise of the value of $8,147, and that his debts were only $142. It is also clearly apparent that this statement was untrue, and at that time he owed his father $4,000 on account of a farm which he had purchased from him. The statement of the value of his property was also greatly above its true value. This attachment, however, was obtained upon the ground that E. M. Armstrong had sold, assigned, and disposed of his property, and was about to sell, assign, and dispose of his property, with the fraudulent intent to hinder, cheat, and delay his creditors. It was not obtained upon the ground that he had fraudulently contracted the debt, or fraudulently incurred any liability or obligation. Therefore the written statement given to the furniture company does not figure very much in this case. It is also apparent that, before the attachment was levied, E. M. Armstrong had sold, transferred, and mortgaged all of his property for the purpose of paying bona fide debts. This he had the right to do. It was said in Tootle v. Coldwell, 30 Kan. 125, 134, 1 Pac. Rep. 329, "that a debtor, even in failing circumstances, may prefer creditors, if the same is done in good faith; and this, not only in the form of actual payment of money to the particular creditors preferred, but also in the form of the sale or appropriation of property, or the giving of chattel mortgages, to such creditors." There is a great conflict in the affidavits, but it is clearly shown by the affidavits upon the part of the defense that the indebtedness of James G. Armstrong, E. M. Jamison, and the other creditors who were secured, was all bona fide indebtedness. E. M. Armstrong had the right under the law to prefer the creditors which he did prefer, if the same was done in good faith. The evidence shows this to be the case. All of the creditors were paid, excepting the plaintiffs and others having claims amounting to about $900. The order and judgment of the district court must be affirmed. All the justices concurring.

MILLER V. WEEKS.

EXEMPTION—TOOLS AND STOCK IN TRADE.

Tinners' tools and stock in trade necessary to carry on the trade of a tinner, and used for that purpose, and being the only means of support for the owner and his family, are exempt from seizure and forced sale under the eighth subdivision of section 3 of the exemption laws.

(Syllabus by Simpson, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Dickinson county; M. B. NICHOLSON, Judge.

Garver & Bond, for plaintiff in error. J. H. Mahan, for defendant in error.

SIMPSON, C. In an action brought by the Richards & Conover Hardware Company against Joseph Weeks, an attachment was issued out of the district court of Dickinson county, and Miller, the sheriff, levied the order of attachment upon a certain stock of hardware, together with tinners' tools and materials, as the property of Weeks. This action in replevin was commenced by Weeks against the sheriff to recover possession of the tinners' tools and materials, they being claimed as exempt to him by virtue of the eighth subdivision of section 3 of the exemption law. The cause was tried by a jury, who returned a general verdict for Weeks, fixing the value of the tools and materials at $500. They also answered special interrogatories as follows: "(1) At the time plaintiff made the assignment to S. G. Cooke, was his principal business that of a hardware and agricultural implement dealer? Answer. It was the principal branch of his business. (2) Did Weeks, prior to the making of his assignment, and up to that time, depend principally upon his hardware and agricultural implement business for the support of himself and family? A. He relied upon all as one business. (3) Was Weeks at the time of said assignment a practical tinner? A. No. (4) Were the tools in question used in the hardware and implement business of plaintiff? A. Yes, in connection with his business. (5) Did the hardware and implement business of plaintiff consist principally in the buying and selling of goods already manufactured, and did the tinware and so forth made in plaintiff's shop constitute only a small percentage of the goods sold in the entire business of plaintiff? A. The tinware was the smaller part of his business. (6) Was the tinning business of plaintiff carried on independently of his hardware business? A. No. Q. Was the sheet iron business of plaintiff carried on independently of his hardware business? A. No. Q. Was the business of making tinware and sheet-iron ware run in connection with the hardware business at the time the assignment was made, or was it at that time a separate business? A. All parts of his business was run in connection. Q. After making the assignment, did the plaintiff have any other means of support except his tin-work and sheet-iron work? A. No." A motion for a new trial was overruled, and the cause brought here for review. The only question discussed or urged by counsel for plaintiff in error is whether the tools and stock in trade are exempt under the facts presented. It is shown by the record that, after Weeks had made an assignment of his hardware stock for the benefit of his creditors, he immediately went to work at the tinning business, and was actually engaged at tin-work when the levy was made. He had no other means of support for himself and family than that derived from his tin-work. While he was not a good, practical tinner, skilled in all branches of such work, yet he had before the assignment worked some at the business, and had personally used the tools, and at the time the levy was made was engaged in putting a tin roof upon a building. The jury find specially that after he made an assignment of his hardware stock his tin-shop was his only means of support. With this state of facts we have been unable to distinguish this case from that of Bliss v. Vedder, 34 Kan. 57, 7 Pac. Rep. 599. Indeed, we think the case is a stronger one for the claimant than the one cited, because of the fact that after the assignment his tools and stock in trade were the only means of livelihood for himself and family. In the case in 34 Kan. and 7 Pac. Rep., Bliss, the claimant of the exemption, was engaged in editing and publishing a weekly newspaper, was engaged in job printing in partnership with one Crosby, and was engaged in the loan, land, and insurance business with one Mudgett. The business he was engaged in with Mudgett was entirely disconnected with and dissimilar to his printing business. Bliss was not a practical printer, but to some extent used the printing-press and type through the agency of employees. In this case the sole work of the claimant of the exemption at the time of the levy was in his tin-shop, and there is no conflict in the evidence but that the proceeds of such work performed by himself was his sole means of support. It was agreed by the parties in open court that the value of the property involved in this action is as follows: The value of the tools, $300, and the value of the stock in trade, $200. For the reason that at the time of the levy he was actually engaged in the tin-work business, and it was the only means of support he had for himself and family, we hold that the tools and stock in trade were exempt. It is recommended that the judgment be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. May 9, 1891.)

AMENDMENT OF PLEADINGS—RAILROAD RIGHT OF WAY—DAMAGES.

1. The allowing of amendments to pleadings by the trial court is very largely within its discretion, and so much so that it is very seldom that a reviewing court can say that error has been committed in such cases. The reviewing court cannot do so, unless it can say that the trial court has abused its discretion.

2. Where a railroad company authorizes its contractors employed by it to construct its railroad to procure the right of way for it, which they are to do at their own expense, and the contractors, through their agent, in the name of the railroad company, procure a right of way through the plaintiff's premises by contract, and afterwards, by reason of such contract, procure only nominal damages to be assessed by the condemnation commissioners for such right of way, and this assessment of damages is all done without the knowledge or consent of the owner, and the railroad is constructed by the contractors, and afterwards operated by the railroad company, but it fails to fulfill the contract, held, that the owner may recover substantial damages from the railroad company, if it elects to retain the right of way.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from district court, Wilson county; L. STILLWELL, Judge.

J. H. Richards and C. S. Reed, for plaintiff in error. S. S. Kirkpatrick, for defendant in error.

VALENTINE, J. This was an action brought in the district court of Wilson county by O. V. Small against the Leroy & Caney Valley Air-Line Railroad Company and the Missouri Pacific Railway Company, in which the plaintiff alleged, among other things, that the defendants had constructed their railroad across his land under a contract; that they had not fulfilled their contract, but had committed a breach thereof; that they had procured condemnation proceedings to be instituted and carried on to consummation without his knowledge, in which he was allowed only nominal damages; that he had received no compensation for his losses; and asked that the condemnation proceedings be set aside, and for general relief. The case was tried before the court without a jury, and judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, and against the defendants, that they should pay him the sum of $1,200 within 60 days, or relinquish their right of way; or, if they should do neither, then that the plaintiff should recover of and from the defendants the sum of $1,200; and the defendants, as plaintiffs in error, bring the case to this court for review. It appears from the pleadings and the evidence, among other things, that the Leroy & Caney Valley Air-Line Railroad Company was organized in 1885 for the purpose of constructing a line of railroad from a certain point in Wilson county to Elgin, in Chautauqua county. The company was composed entirely of persons living along the line of the proposed railroad. Some time afterwards a committee was sent by the company to New York city, which, in pursuance of their authority, succeeded in procuring the Missouri Pacific Railway Company and one Warren H. Loss to enter into a written contract with this new company for the purpose of constructing this new line of railroad. By the terms of the contract, Loss was the contractor to construct the railroad, and was also to procure the right of way for the railroad companies, at his own expense. Afterwards he assigned all his rights and interests under the contract to Simmons & Sidell, a partnership firm composed of James A. Simmons and Cornelius V. Sidell, who afterwards constructed the railroad under the contract. Prior, however, to their construction of the railroad, they employed Isaac Hudson to procure the right of way through Wilson county. Commissioners were also appointed to procure the right of way through that county by virtue of condemnation proceedings. Hudson afterwards, for the contractors and the railroad companies, entered into the contract sued on, which was and is a contract with the plaintiff, Small, and his wife for a right of way through Small's premises. Upon the face of this contract, Small and wife were the parties of the first part, and the Leroy & Caney Valley Air-Line Railroad Company was the party of the second part, and the right of way was procured for such railroad company. The contract, however, was not signed by either of the railroad companies, nor by Hudson, nor by the contractors, but only by Small and wife. The commissioners appointed to procure the right of way were instructed by Hudson, on account of said contract with Small and wife, to assess only nominal damages for the right of way through Small's land, and through other lands where similar contracts had been entered into between Hudson and the owners of the lands; and the commissioners in fact assessed only nominal damages for the right of way through Small's land, to-wit, $1 for one quarter section of land, $1 for a half quarter section of land and $80 for another half quarter section of land, and nothing for the remainder. Small had no knowledge of this assessment until after it was too late to take an appeal, and therefore never took an appeal. The railroad was afterwards constructed by the contractors, and is now operated by the railroad companies. The Leroy & Caney Valley Air-Line Railroad Company was and is the nominal owner thereof, but the Missouri Pacific Railway Company was and is the real owner thereof.

The first alleged error is the ruling of the court below, refusing to strike from the files the plaintiff's amended petition. This amended petition had been filed upon leave of the court previously given, but it is claimed that it is a departure from the original petition. It is not such a departure, however, from the original petition as to make it objectionable; besides, the allowing of amendments to pleadings by the trial court is very largely within its discretion, and so much so that it is very seldom that a reviewing court can say that error has been committed in such cases. The reviewing court cannot do so unless it can say that the trial court has abused its discretion. We cannot say so in this case.

There are various other complaints made concerning the various rulings of the court below, but they do not require any separate or special consideration. Grouping the most of them together, we think they amount substantially to this: It is claimed that, as the contract with Small and wife for the right of way through his premises was not signed by either of the railroad companies, nor filed for record in the office of the register of deeds, nor made by any direct agent of either of the railroad companies, but only by an agent of the contractors, it cannot affect any of their rights or interests in the least. It was alleged, however, in the plaintiff's petition that the contract was executed between the plaintiff, Small, and the Leroy & Caney Valley Air-Line Railroad Company, and this allegation was not denied by any one under oath, and therefore it must be taken as true. Civil Code, § 108. Besides, the argument proves too much; for if Hudson and the contractors had no authority to procure the right of way for the railroad companies by any direct contract with the owner of the land through which the railroad was constructed, then Hudson and the contractors would have no authority to procure the right of way in any other manner for the railroad companies; and as the whole of the right of way through Small's land, and through all the other lands in Wilson county, was procured only through the intervention of Hudson and the contractors, the railroad companies would not have and have not any right of way through the plaintiff's (Small's) lands, or through any other person's lands. The evidence shows that Hudson and the contractors did everything in procuring the right of way, that procured by virtue of condemnation proceedings as well as that procured by contract. The contractors and Hudson were really the agents of the railroad companies to procure the right of way, and the railroad companies are bound by their agents' acts. And, if they are so bound,—that is, if they are bound by the acts of the contractors and Hudson in procuring their right of way,—then the judgment of the court below is correct. But, if they are not so bound, still the judgment is correct; for, if they are not bound, then they can take no benefits from the acts of Hudson and the contractors in procuring the right of way for the railroad companies, and in that event they have obtained no right of way through the plaintiff's (Small's) premises, neither by contract nor by condemnation proceedings; and as they have actually constructed their railroad through such premises, and are now operating the same, they are still liable for the resulting damages, and this makes the judgment of the court below correct. We think it is correct upon the view that the railroad companies are bound by the acts of Hudson and the contractors. It cannot be possible that a railroad company, with its contractors and their agent, can, by the methods resorted to in the present case, procure a right of way through a man's land for nothing. Such is not the constitutional or statutory mode of procuring a right of way, and we do not think that it can be upheld. We do not think that there is anything further in this case that requires consideration or comment. The judgment of the court below will be affirmed. All the justices concurring.

CUNNINGHAM v. MARTIN.

EXCHANGE—RIGHT TO POSSESSION.

Where M., the owner of a tract of land, and C., the owner of a horse, exchange the one for the other, M. executing to C. a warranty deed for the land, and C. executing to M. an absolute bill of sale for the horse, giving to M. in terms the right to the immediate possession of the horse, held, that M. at once becomes the owner of the horse, and entitled to the immediate possession thereof; and where M. afterwards obtains the possession of the horse, and C. then commences an action of replevin therefor, held, that in such action C. cannot show by parol testimony that the contract was that C. was to retain the possession of the horse until M. should furnish to C. an abstract of title for the land.

Error from district court, Allen county; L. STILLWELL, Judge.

Knight & Foust, for plaintiff in error.
Benton & Scott, for defendant in error.

VALENTINE, J. This was an action of replevin, brought in the district court of Allen county by G. D. Cunningham against Lyman C. Martin for the recovery of a certain stallion known by the name of "Hercules." A trial was commenced before the court and a jury, and at the close of the plaintiff's evidence the defendant demurred thereto upon the ground that it did not prove any cause of action, and the court sustained the demurrer, and rendered judgment in favor of the defendant and against the plaintiff; and, to reverse this judgment, the plaintiff, as plaintiff in error, brings the case to this court. It appears from the evidence that on June 20, 1887, the plaintiff, Cunningham, owned the horse in controversy, and the defendant, Martin, owned a certain tract of land consisting of 80 acres in Chautauqua county, subject, however, to a certain $300 mortgage and the taxes for that year. They entered into a contract for the exchange of the horse and the land, the one for the other, and for this purpose Martin executed a general warranty deed to Cunningham for the land, except as to said mortgage and taxes, and Cunningham executed to Martin a bill of sale for the horse; and each of these instruments was duly delivered. Afterwards Martin sent a written order by a young Mr. Conner, requesting Cunningham to deliver the horse to Conner, the bearer of the order, which Cunningham refused to do; and Martin then went to Cunningham's premises, and took the horse, Cunningham being absent at the time, but some of his family being present. Cunningham then commenced this action of replevin against Martin to recover the horse. The aforesaid bill of sale and written order read as follows: Bill of sale: "Humboldt, Kansas, June 20, 1887. For value received I have this day sold my bay stallion 'Hercules' to L. C. Martin, and received payment in full, and agree to keep said horse free of cost for the said Martin until September first, or deliver him at any time he or any one may call for him with an order from the said Martin. G. D. CUNNINGHAM." Order: "Cherryvale, Kan., July 20, '87. Mr. Cunningham: You will please let bearer have the horse 'Hercules' on this order, and oblige L. C. MARTIN." On the trial Cunningham testified, in substance, that, under the contract entered into between himself and Martin, he (Cunningham) was to retain the possession of the horse until Martin should furnish to him a certain abstract of title, which Martin had never done. Martin claimed otherwise, however, and that he never agreed to let Cunningham retain the possession of the horse, except as stated in the bill of sale; and he relied for his proof as to this upon the facts of the case, as developed by the plaintiff's evidence and the written instruments; and the court below, upon the demurrer to the plaintiff's evidence, decided in favor of Martin, and against Cunningham. It would seem to us that the decision of the court below is correct. The deed for the land was a general warranty deed, except as above stated, and was executed and delivered, thereby transferring immediately and absolutely all Martin's interest in the land to Cunningham; and the bill of sale was also of such a character as to transfer at once and absolutely all of Cunningham's title and right of possession in and to the horse to Martin, and to authorize Martin to take the possession of the horse at any time when he might choose to do so, and this bill of sale was delivered at once to Martin. We think the facts of the case, including the bill of sale, prove conclusively that the title to the horse in question and the right to the possession thereof had been transferred absolutely to Martin, and that Martin was entitled to his possession when this action was commenced, and therefore we think the decision of the court below was and is correct. The judgment of the court below will be affirmed. All the justices concurring.

CITY OF FT. SCOTT v. CANFIELD.

DEFECTIVE SIDEWALKS—EVIDENCE.

Certain alleged errors with regard to offers to introduce evidence, and the court's refusal to permit such evidence to be introduced, examined, and held, that no material error was committed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from district court, Bourbon county; C. O. FRENCH, Judge.

E. F. Ware and Ira D. Bronson, for plaintiff in error. Bawden & Coon, for defendant in error.

VALENTINE, J. This was an action brought in the district court of Bourbon county by David C. Canfield against the city of Ft. Scott to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by him by reason of a defective sidewalk. A trial was had before the court and a jury, which resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant for $1,000 damages; and the defendant, as plaintiff in error, brings the case to this court for review. Two questions only are presented by the plaintiff in error for consideration by this court, and they are as follows: (1) During the trial, and while G. R. Leslie, the street commissioner, was testifying as a witness on behalf of the defendant, it was shown that the plaintiff did some work for the city in putting down some cross-walks; that he did his work well, but that he was a "little slow." As to what kind of cross-walks these were the record is silent. The record then shows as follows: "Defendant here offered to prove by this witness that where the material is furnished that hit-and-miss sidewalks are put down at a customary price here in the city, at a cent a foot, and that a good workman would put down over 150 feet, except in some instances where one may be able to put down 200 feet, and earn $2.00. Plaintiff's objection to this offer was sustained. To which defendant duly excepted and excepts." (2) The record also shows that during the trial, and while Canfield was testifying as a witness on his own behalf, the following occurred: "Plaintiff hereupon offered to show that the street commissioner, in a conversation with Mr. Canfield, stated to him that he had knowledge of the dilapidated condition of the sidewalk, and had been wanting to repair it some time before that, but couldn't get the order to do so. The offer was overruled and denied." This is complained of by the city, defendant below, as "misconduct of plaintiff during the trial." With reference to the first claim of error, it is not shown what "hit-and-miss sidewalks" are, or that the witness ever saw a sidewalk of that kind, or that he knew what the cost of such a sidewalk was or would be, or that he knew how much of such a sidewalk a good workman could put down; and, although he was a street commissioner, still we should not assume without proof that he knew everything. We cannot say that any material error was committed by the court below in its refusal to grant the defendant's offer to introduce this evidence. The second claim of error does not require any comment. The judgment of the court below will be affirmed. All the justices concurring.

KANSAS CITY & T. RY. CO. v. VICKROY.

EMINENT DOMAIN—COMPENSATION—OPINION EVIDENCE.

1. The case of Railway Co. v. Splitlog, 45 Kan. —, 25 Pac. Rep. 202, referred to and followed.

2. In appeals from the awards of commissioners in condemnation proceedings, opinions as to the value of property should be confined to the property in question, unless on cross-examination, for the purpose of testing the knowledge and competency of the witness, the value of adjoining property is inquired of.

Error from district court, Wyandotte county; O. L. MILLER, Judge.

M. A. Low and W. F. Evans, for plaintiff in error. Thos. P. Fenlon, T. S. Brown, and John A. Hale, for defendant in error.

PER CURIAM. Thomas Vickroy appealed from an award made by commissioners to lay off and condemn a right of way through his premises in Wyandotte county for the Kansas City & Topeka Railway Company. The award made by the commissioners was as follows:

Amount of land taken, 8 96-100 acres.
Value of land taken.....	$39,850
Amount of damages to land not taken.....	2,500
House.....	450
Total.....	$32,800

The jury returned a verdict for Vickroy, and assessed his damages at $49,525.50. They valued the land actually taken for a right of way at $10,000 per acre, and upon this they allowed interest amounting to $2,425.50. They allowed $7,500 as damages to the land not taken. The trial court rendered judgment upon the verdict of the jury, of which the railway company complains. The tract of land out of which the right of way was appropriated is acre property, amounting to about 15 acres. It is in the town of Armourdale. No part of the tract has ever been platted as a part of or as an addition to the town. The tract is 990 feet long by 666 feet wide. The right of way was condemned out of the northern portion of the tract, leaving a strip of land about 136 feet wide on the north and a strip about 850 feet wide on the south side of the right of way. It was claimed by the plaintiff below that the market value of the strip of land north of the right of way was depreciated by the appropriation, and the jury so found. No claim was made for damages to the land south of the right of way, the plaintiff having testified that that part of the land sustained no damage or injury. The north side of the property is bounded by a large tract of unsettled and unimproved land, belonging to the Union Pacific Railroad Company. The south side is bounded by acre property, subdivided into blocks, and on the east and west are alleys 15 feet wide. On the east and west of the alleys the land has been platted into lots. The land was called by the owner "a farm on a small scale." On the north strip, above the right of way, is a frame house, the main building of which is 36x20 feet, with an L addition 15x20 feet,—a two-story building. The house cost about $1,900. Upon the trial the plaintiff below, over the objections and exceptions of the railway company, introduced evidence showing the market value of the lots adjoining and also adjacent to the tract of land upon the east and west sides thereof. These lots were on different streets of Armourdale. Some of the lots were upon business streets, with business houses upon them; others were residence lots, improved. Some of the lots were near the tract of land through which the right of way was taken, and others were several hundred feet away. Some of the lots were on Kansas avenue, the principal business street of Armourdale, and about 300 feet south of the tract of land. The plaintiff also offered evidence of the number of lots that his tract of land could be divided into, the size of the lots, and the value of the lots, if the tract were platted and subdivided. Among other evidence of this kind was the following: Thomas Vickroy: "Question. How many lots of the size of the lots that you have estimated to be worth from $1,250 to $1,800 could be made out of your property, per acre? By Mr. Hutchings. We object to that as incompetent, irrelevant, immaterial, and cross-examination of the witness. By the Court. Has not been shown to know anything about it, or that he has had any experience in platting. Q. By Mr. Fenlon. You know the size of these lots, do you? Answer. Yes. Q. Taking the size of these lots, how many would constitute an acre? (Objected to by defendant's counsel on grounds last before stated. Objection overruled by the court. Defendant duly excepted.) A. Ten; it will make ten lots out of an acre."

In Railway Co. v. Splitlog, 45 Kan. —, 25 Pac. Rep. 202, it was said, in a case very much like this, that, "while there is a want of harmony in the authorities, we think the weight of authority holds that where expert witnesses are called to testify as to value in damage cases, or where, under the exception to the general rule that none but experts may give opinions, non-expert witnesses, familiar with the subject of the controversy, are permitted to give opinions as to values, such evidence—that is, such opinions as to values—should be confined to the market value of the property in controversy in all cases where witnesses can be obtained who are familiar therewith. * * * Witnesses testifying as to the value of such land may consider any use to which the ground may be presently put in forming their opinions as to its value, and its surroundings may be shown to the jury, its nearness to or distance from a town, village, or city, or other improvements that tend to affect its value; but the jury are to value the land as a whole in the condition in which it was when taken. They have nothing to do with its subdivision into lots or blocks. They may consider its location, and the effect its location has upon its value as a whole; but the evidence as to how many lots it would make, and what they would sell for after the subdivision, is wholly improper." The principle announced in that decision controls this. As already decided by this court, opinions as to the value of property in such cases as this should be confined to the property in question, unless on cross-examination, for the purpose of testing the knowledge and competency of the witness, the value of adjoining property is inquired of. Lewis, Em. Dom. § 435; Wyman v. Railroad Co., 13 Metc. (Mass.) 316.

Among other of the cogent reasons why the foregoing evidence referred to should have been rejected, is that such evidence introduced into the case collateral issues as to the value of lots, improved or unimproved, near by and also distant from the tract of land in controversy. Further, in this case, Thomas Vickroy, R. B. Armstrong, George W. Betts, and others testified that they knew the market value of the tract of land from which the right of way was taken, and also testified as to its market value; hence there was no difficulty in finding witnesses who could testify as to the value of the property. Exceptional evidence was not needed. The trial court attempted to correct by its instructions the error into which it fell, but it did not expressly withdraw from the consideration of the jury the erroneous evidence commented upon; hence the errors were not cured. Counsel for plaintiff below refer to Railroad Co. v. Chapman, 38 Kan. 307, 16 Pac. Rep. 695; Railroad Co. v. Ehret, 41 Kan. 22, 20 Pac. Rep. 533; Railroad Co. v. Cosper, 42 Kan. 561, 22 Pac. Rep. 634; and several other similar decisions of this court. These decisions do not conflict with the recent opinion handed down in Railway Co. v. Splitlog, supra. In all of these decisions the witnesses testified as to the value of the land in controversy. They did not testify as to the specific value of adjoining farms or adjacent farms, or adjoining lots or adjacent lots, or other farms or lots in the vicinity. In the Chapman case, unlike this case, the property had no market value. But even in that case it was said: "Where property has a market value the rule is strict, and requires only that value to be shown; but where it is shown that the property is without a market value, then the law allows the next best evidence to be given to ascertain its value. The property, then, may be compared with other property; its value may be determined by persons who are shown to be judges, or who have knowledge of the values of real estate in that vicinity; and their opinions may be given of the value of the property [in question,] which in this case was the best evidence it was possible to secure." We approve all that was said in the Chapman case, and all of the other decisions of this court referred to, concerning opinion evidence as to the value of the property taken or injured; but those cases do not reach the Splitlog or this case. We expressly affirm all that was said by Mr. Justice BREWER in Railway Co. v. Paul, 28 Kan. 816: "The values of real estate, especially in localities where there are few changes in property, are not so absolutely certain, and cannot be determined with absolute exactness, and in respect to them the testimony of witnesses partakes largely of the nature of opinions, and yet, from the necessities of the case, it has come to be recognized that such testimony is competent. It is the best that, in the nature of things can be obtained; for a description by a witness of the locality of any given tract, its improvements and surroundings, would ordinarily throw little light upon the question of its value. So many things enter into and affect such value that a witness would be unable to describe them all, or even to comprehend them all fully. Hence it has become pretty generally established that a witness who testifies that he is acquainted with the values of real estate in the locality may give his opinion as to the value of any particular tract" in question. If the rule thus stated had been followed in the introduction of the evidence in this case, and the witnesses who resided in the vicinity of the tract of land appropriated or injured, and who were familiarly acquainted with the tract, its location, advantages, character, etc., had merely testified to the value of the land taken, and the value of the land not taken before and since the injury of which complaint is made, there would not have been any ground for reversal upon the matters commented upon. The judgment of the district court will be reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

REVIEW ON APPEAL—FAILURE TO MOVE FOR NEW TRIAL—ASSIGNMENT OF ERRORS.

Errors occurring during the trial cannot be considered by the supreme court unless a motion for a new trial, founded upon and including such errors, has been made by the complaining party, and acted upon by the trial court, and its ruling excepted to, and afterwards assigned for error in the supreme court.

Error from district court, Marshall county; E. HUTCHINSON, Judge.

W. A. Calderhead, for plaintiff in error.
J. A. Broughton, for defendant in error.

VALENTINE, J. All the matters and things complained of as errors in this case are such as occurred during the trial in the court below. At the close of the trial in that court the jury found in favor of the defendant and against the plaintiff. The plaintiff then moved for a new trial, setting forth in his motion various grounds, including the rulings now complained of. This motion was heard by the court and overruled, and no exception was taken to the ruling. Judgment was then rendered in favor of the defendant and against the plaintiff for costs, and the plaintiff, as plaintiff in error, brings the case to this court for review; but he does not assign the ruling of the court below upon his motion for a new trial as error, and therefore it is claimed by the defendant in error that there is nothing presented by the petition in error for review in this court. Under the decisions of this court this claim of the defendant in error is correct. Carson v. Funk, 27 Kan. 524; Clark v. Schnur, 40 Kan. 72, 19 Pac. Rep. 327; Landauer v. Hoagland, 41 Kan. 520, 21 Pac. Rep. 645; Bank v. Jaffray, 41 Kan. 691, 19 Pac. Rep. 626; City of McPherson v. Manning, 43 Kan. 129, 23 Pac. Rep. 109. Errors occurring during the trial cannot be considered by the supreme court unless a motion for a new trial, founded upon and including such errors, has been made by the complaining party, and acted upon by the trial court, and its ruling excepted to, and afterwards assigned for error in the supreme court. In connection with the cases above cited, see, also, Buettinger v. Hurley, 34 Kan. 585, 9 Pac. Rep. 197. The judgment of the court below will be affirmed. All the justices concurring.

STUDEBAKER et al. v. RYAN.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. May 9, 1891.)

INDORSEMENT OF NOTE—NOTICE OF NON-PAYMENT.

W. and R. entered into a written contract whereby W. was to furnish to R. wagons for R., to sell upon commission, with the privilege of taking promissory notes for the wagons, but upon blanks furnished by W. and indorsed by R., "waiving protest, notice of protest, and non-payment." In their final settlement R. delivered to W. two promissory notes executed by B. to R., not taken upon blanks furnished by W., nor for wagons, nor for any property in which W. had any interest, nor were they indorsed, "waiving protest, notice of protest, and non-payment," but were indorsed merely with the name of R. Afterwards the notes became due, and were not paid by the makers thereof, and no notice of non-payment was given to R. Held, that R., after the failure to give notice of non-payment, was not liable upon the notes.

Error from district court, Norton county; LOUIS K. PRATT, Judge.

F. M. Jeffrey, for plaintiff in error. E. W. Norlin, for defendant in error.

VALENTINE, J. This was an action brought in the district court of Norton county by John S. Welch under the firm name of Studebaker & Welch, against O. J. Burwell, James E. Burwell, and C. M. Ryan, on two promissory notes, each executed on March 17, 1886, by O. J. Burwell and James E. Burwell, payable to the order of C. M. Ryan,—one for $119, due in six months, and the other for $112, due in three months, and each indorsed on the back with the name of C. M. Ryan. Ryan made the defense that he was only an indorser, and that he was relieved from all liability on the notes for the reason that no proper demand for payment or protest was ever made, and no notice of non-payment was ever given to him. The plaintiff admitted the facts of this defense, but claimed, and now claims, that they were not and are not material and not applicable to this case for the reason that a special agreement in writing had previously been entered into between him and Ryan, whereby he was relieved from making any demand or protest, or from giving any notice of non-payment. The aforesaid written agreement between the plaintiff and Ryan provided, among other things, that the plaintiff should furnish to Ryan a lot of wagons, to be sold by Ryan on commission at Lenora, Kan., and that Ryan might take promissory notes therefor, payable not to exceed six months after the date of sale, with interest at 10 per cent.; and that all the notes should be taken upon blanks furnished by the plaintiff, with the following stipulation by Ryan that he "will indorse them waiving protest, notice of protest, and non-payment, and should any of said notes not be paid at maturity, I agree to pay them within thirty days thereafter." The case was tried before the court without a jury, and on the trial it was shown that the notes in controversy were not taken upon blanks furnished by the plaintiff, nor for wagons, nor for any property in which the plaintiff had any interest; nor were they indorsed, "Waiving protest, notice of protest, and non-payment;" but they were taken for a span of horses belonging to Ryan, and sold by him to the Burwells, and they were indorsed merely with Ryan's name, and they were then transferred by such indorsement and by delivery by Ryan to the plaintiff in final settlement of their affairs. The court below held upon these facts that Ryan was not liable upon the notes, because they were not given in pursuance of the aforesaid contract, and because no proper notice of non-payment was ever given to Ryan, and rendered judgment in favor of Ryan and against the plaintiff for costs; and to reverse this judgment the plaintiff, as plaintiff in error, brings the case to this court for review. No special findings of fact were made by the court below, and upon the evidence we cannot reverse its judgment. The judgment of the court below will therefore be affirmed. All the justices concurring.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. May 9, 1891.)

REVIEW ON APPEAL—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

Where the trial court has sanctioned and approved the special findings and verdict of the jury, and rendered judgment thereon, the supreme court will not set the same aside, if there is evidence to support such special findings and verdict.

(Syllabus by Green, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Ellsworth county; S. O. HINDS, Judge.

Ira E. Lloyd, for plaintiffs in error. Lafferty & McMillen, for defendant in error.

GREEN, C. Arthur Larkin sued the plaintiffs in error upon a promissory note of $100, due October 1, 1885, and an account for $9.85. The defendants alleged that they constituted the firm of Perry Hodgden & Co., and that the plaintiff was indebted to them in the sum of $198.85, upon an account for merchandise purchased of them. The plaintiff insisted that most of the items of this account had been settled by crediting the same to the account of C. F. Clark, who, it was claimed, was a member of the firm of Perry Hodgden & Co., and that these credits had been ratified by the defendants. The plaintiff obtained a judgment in justice's court, and the case was appealed to the district court of Ellsworth county, where it was again tried, and the jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $26.44. It is claimed that this verdict is contrary to the evidence and the instructions of the court; that the special findings settled every fact in favor of the defendants, and, according to these special findings and the instructions of the court, they should have had judgment for the amount claimed of $198. Obviously the jury found for the plaintiff upon the theory that there had been a ratification by the defendants of these credits to Clark, by the plaintiff, upon his account. The court below instructed the jury that, if they should find from the evidence that the plaintiff had entered into a contract with C. F. Clark, in good faith, believing Clark to be a member of the firm of Perry Hodgden & Co., or authorized to act for the firm, and that the goods for which the defendants claimed an offset were purchased of the firm by the plaintiff in accordance with that contract, and the contract was in any way ratified by Perry Hodgden, he would be bound by such ratification. With others, the jury returned the following special questions and answers: "Question. Was the arrangement by which the plaintiff applied the goods purchased from Perry Hodgden & Co. to the payment of the indebtedness of C. F. Clark to him, made and entered into between C. F. Clark and Arthur Larkin? Answer. Yes. Q. Did Perry Hodgden and Phoebe Hodgden know of the arrangement, if any was made, between C. F. Clark and A. Larkin, and did they consent to such arrangement? A. Yes; to a certain extent."

Ratification is the controlling question in this case. The business of the defendants seemed to have been conducted by Perry Hodgden and Clark. Mrs. Hodgden was not consulted. It was agreed that two lists were to be credited on Clark's account with the plaintiff, amounting to $70. It seemed to have been conceded, upon the trial, that the plaintiff owed the defendants $32 for a feed-cutter; that when the plaintiff purchased a Studebaker wagon of the defendants, on the 15th day of October, 1886, for $60, the defendants owed the plaintiff $44.60 for merchandise, which would leave a balance due them on the wagon of $15.40. Other items were claimed by the defendants, which, with those mentioned, amounted to over $100, which the jury evidently allowed them. The plaintiff, in his bill of particulars, asked judgment for $127.10. We cannot tell, from an examination of the evidence, just how the jury arrived at the verdict in this case, but there seemed to have been some evidence to support the special findings and verdict. Perry Hodgden knew, on the 9th of April, 1886, that C. F. Clark had an account with the plaintiff, and consented that the two lists might be credited on that account. He also knew that the plaintiff purchased goods through Clark, from the firm of Perry Hodgden & Co., after that. The plaintiff testified that, when he purchased the Studebaker wagon, Hodgden told him to credit his account with the wagon, and assigned as a reason that Clark had been credited with some goods, and he wanted his account credited with this wagon, and that he did so. Perry Hodgden testified that he talked to Clark about his selling the wagon to the plaintiff, and asked him if he took a note, and he stated that he did not; that he just charged it on the book; that Larkin said that Hodgden owed him, and that he would turn it on the account. The next morning after this conversation he went to Larkin's store, and asked about Clark's indebtedness to Larkin, and said that he then objected to Clark having credit for the wagon; and also admitted that he made inquiry as to where a road-cart, which had been previously purchased, had been credited; but there was no evidence to indicate that he made any objection to its being credited to Clark. This road-cart was bought in May, and the Studebaker wagon was charged to Larkin on the 14th of October; so Hodgden must have known of this transaction when he went to Larkin's store to see about the wagon. It is true that the evidence is quite conflicting in this case, but we cannot say that there is no evidence to support the findings and verdict; and we do not feel justified in setting aside the judgment, after it has received the sanction and approval of the trial court. We recommend that the judgment be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

HENTIG v. REDDEN.

RES ADJUDICATA — EJECTMENT — PLEADING — AFTER-ACQUIRED TITLE.

1. A judgment or decree of a court of competent jurisdiction is not only final as to the subject-matter, but also as to every other matter which the parties might have litigated in the case, and which they might have had decided.

2. Where a judgment is rendered in this state for the plaintiff in an action in the nature of ejectment, the title which he recovers is thereby established as against the defendant.

3. Where an action in the nature of ejectment is pending between parties, and the defendant, during the pendency of the action, obtains a new or another title, this title, to be of any benefit, must be asserted in that action before judgment is rendered against the defendant.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from district court, Jackson county; ROBERT CROZIER, Judge.

F. G. Hentig and Lloyd D. Simpson, for plaintiff in error. Redden & Schumacher, for defendant in error.

HORTON, C. J. This was an action in the court below, brought on the 18th day of July, 1887, by Mrs. A. J. Hentig against J. W. Redden, asking that her title to four certain lots on Clay street in the city of Topeka be quieted, and that the defendant be forever barred from asserting any claim or interest to said lots or any part thereof. The defendant filed an answer, containing a general denial, and also the plea of res adjudicata. The place of trial of the action was transferred from the district court of Shawnee county to the district court of Jackson county. Trial was there had before the court without ajury. No special findings were requested or made by the trial court, but the court, after hearing the evidence and the arguments, made a general finding in favor of the defendant and against the plaintiff. Of this judgment, plaintiff complains.

We need refer only to the plea of res adjudicata, and the evidence offered in support thereof. Prior to March 1, 1878, J. J. Puterbaugh, of Logansport Ind., was the owner of the lots in controversy. On March 1, 1878, Puterbaugh, then residing in Logansport, Ind., made an assignment of certain real and personal property to Thomas H. Bringham, in trust for the benefit of his creditors. The lots in dispute were not mentioned in the deed of assignment. On the 22d of August, 1883, J. J. Puterbaugh and wife sold and conveyed by quitclaim deed to J. W. Redden, for the consideration of $120, the lots described in the petition. On the 2d day of August, 1878, Thomas H. Bringham sold and conveyed by quitclaim deed to Charles S. Puterbaugh, of Cass county, Ind., the lots for the consideration of $9. On the 25th day of September, 1883, Thomas H. Bringham sold and conveyed the same lots to Mrs. A. J. Hentig by quitclaim deed for the consideration of $1. On the 18th day of May, 1887, Charles S. Puterbaugh sold and conveyed to Mrs. A. J. Hentig the same lots by quitclaim deed for the consideration of $10. There is also evidence that he executed to Mrs. Hentig a prior deed, intending to convey these lots, in 1883. On October 1, 1883, J. W. Redden brought his action against Mrs. A. J. Hentig in the district court of Shawnee county in the nature of ejectment to recover the possession of the same lots. Mrs. A. J. Hentig, in her answer in that case, alleged that J. J. Puterbaugh, prior to the execution of his deed of August 22, 1883, to J. W. Redden, had sold and assigned all of his real and personal property to James H. Bringham, in trust for the benefit of his creditors. She further answered that she was the owner and in the possession of the lots by virtue of a tax-deed. Hentig v. Redden, 35 Kan. 471, 11 Pac. Rep. 398.

Upon the trial Charles S. Puterbaugh testified as follows: "Question. Was it at public or private sale that you bought these lots? Answer. Public sale. Q. Was your father, Jacob J. Puterbaugh, present at that sale? A. If all his real estate was sold at one sale, he was present; if not, I am not sure. Q. What was the price at which the lots were sold to you by the assignee? A. One dollar each, I think. Q. Did you pay for them? A. Yes, sir. * * * Q. When did you make the first deed to Mrs. A. J. Hentig? A. I think it was in 1883 I made the first deed to Mrs. A. J. Hentig. Q. Did she pay you for those lots? A. Yes, sir; she gave me two hundred dollars, I believe. Q. Did you make her a deed for it? A. Yes, sir. Q. What became of that deed? A. Sent it to her. I have never seen it since, to the best of my knowledge. Q. Did you sell those lots and convey them in that deed by the same description as that used by the assignee in his conveyance to you? A. I believe I did, not knowing there was an error in the deed of assignment. Q. What became of that assignment? A. I sent it to her. * * * Q. Did you get any money for the second deed you made? A. Yes, sir; I did. Q. How much money did you get that time? A. Ten dollars. Q. How did you come to make this second deed? A. Some time in 1886 Hentig wrote me, claiming there was some error in the deed, and asked for a quitclaim later, in 1887. He sent to Judge Nelson a quitclaim deed for me to execute, which I did."

J. W. Redden testified on the trial, among other things, as follows: "Were you present in the court-room in Topeka, Shawnee county, Kansas, when the case of J. W. Redden vs. Hentig was on trial, which involved the title to this same property? Answer. I was. Question. An action of ejectment of this same property? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did you see F. G. Hentig there? A. I did. Q. What statement did he make then in your presence or hearing relative to his wife then having a deed from Bringham or Charles Puterbaugh for the property in controversy? A. Mr. Hentig had in his hand a paper that he said, I think, (he addressed the conversation to Mr. Harris,) was a deed from Charles S. Puterbaugh to A. J. Hentig for these lots in controversy; but he did not propose to offer it in evidence at that time. He had thought of doing it, but he would not. Q. What was the first name of the Puterbaugh that he said the deed was from? A. Charles S. Puterbaugh.—I think it was S. Q. When was this conversation? A. My recollection now is that it was in the trial of the case in the spring of 1885. Q. At the time the case was being tried, and before the trial was over with, and before judgment was rendered? A. Yes, sir; during the progress of the case."

H. H. Harris testified: "Were you present at the trial of the case of J. W. Redden vs. A. J. Hentig in Shawnee county when the title of this property was in dispute? Answer. Yes, sir. Question. When was that? A. February, 1885. Q. Did you see F. G. Hentig at that time? A. Yes; he appeared for himself and his wife. Q. He was also a witness? A. Yes, sir. Q. What statement did he make about his wife having a deed from Charles S. Puterbaugh? A. After we had submitted the evidence upon each side, and submitted to the court, (Judge MARTIN, who was trying it pro tem.) Mr. Hentig got up and pulled a paper out of his pocket that looked like a deed, and says to me: 'There is a deed to my wife for those lots, but I do not propose to try that title now; I am trying the tax-title.' I wondered why he did not offer it, and immediately turned around to Dr. Redden, and told him it was a surprise to me that he had such a deed. I did not know why he did not offer it. Q. If Mr. Hentig made any statement as to whom that deed was from, state what it was. A. He said it was a deed from Charles S. Puterbaugh to his wife, Mrs. A. J. Hentig, the plaintiff in this suit. Q. For what lots? A. For lots number 408, 410, 412, and 414 Clay street, Topeka, Kansas."

Upon rebuttal F. G. Hentig testified that the statements of J. W. Redden and H. H. Harris were incorrect, and that he never had any deed from Charles S. Puterbaugh to his wife in his possession until long after the trial of Redden v. Hentig, referred to; that the only deed his wife ever had from Charles S. Puterbaugh was dated July 9, 1887.

The judgment of February 18, 1885, rendered in the case of J. W. Redden v. Mrs. A. J. Hentig, recites, among other things, as follows: "The court finds that at the commencement of this suit the plaintiff, J. W. Redden, was the owner in fee-simple of lots 408, 410, 412, and 414 on Clay street in the city of Topeka, Kansas, and is such owner now, and that all the material allegations in the petition are true. (2) The court further finds that Mrs. A. J. Hentig is in possession under two tax-deeds,—one recorded May 9, 1877, and the other September 30, 1882,—both issued on the tax-sale of 1874 for the taxes of 1873. (3) That said tax-sale was void, first, because there was an unlawful combination of bidders at the sale, which prevented competition, and because the sale was made for illegal costs charged against the lots."

Under the general finding of the trial court we must assume that Mrs. A. J. Hentig had in her possession a deed from Charles S. Puterbaugh during the trial of the former case of J. W. Redden v. Mrs. A. J. Hentig in the month of February, 1885. It is possible that Dr. Redden and Mr. Harris were mistaken as to what deed Mr. Hentig exhibited, and, therefore, that the trial court was led into error; but upon the evidence presented we cannot now interfere or disturb the finding. There was sufficient evidence to support it, and the trial court's finding is conclusive. Therefore, under the evidence and the general finding of the trial court, we think its judgment must be affirmed, as the plea of res adjudicata was fully sustained. It has been said several times by this court, and also by many other courts, that "a judgment or decree of a court of competent jurisdiction is not only final as to the subject-matter, but also as to every other matter which the parties might have litigated in the case, and which they might have had decided." Under the provisions of the Civil Code an action in the nature of ejectment, like the former case of J. W. Redden v. Mrs. A. J. Hentig, settles the title between the parties in favor of the one recovering the judgment. Hurd v. Commissioners, 40 Kan. 92, 19 Pac. Rep. 325; Barrows v. Kindred, 4 Wall. 403; Mahoney v. Middleton, 41 Cal. 41; Marvin v. Dennison, 1 Blatchf. 159; Edwards v. Roys, 18 Vt. 473; Reed v. Douglas, (Iowa,) 37 N. W. Rep. 131. This court, in Commissioners v. Welsh, 40 Kan. 770, 20 Pac. Rep. 443, said "that a general finding of title in the plaintiff—consequently, of no title in the defendant—is a conclusive and binding decision against the defendant on the question of title, from whatever source it may be derived, and forever estops him from asserting a claim of title which existed at the time of the decree." If Mrs. Hentig had in her possession the deed from Charles S. Puterbaugh for the lots during the pendency of the former action of Redden against herself, (as we are bound to assume she did have from the finding of the trial court, (she could have offered that deed in evidence for what it was worth to sustain her title and her right of possession. If necessary, she could have filed a supplemental answer. The law does not favor a multiplicity of suits, and, where all matters in controversy between parties as to the title or possession of real estate might be finally ended in one action, the law requires that this should be done. Parties cannot try title to real estate by piecemeal in separate and independent actions upon separate deeds or chains of title, when they have in their possession during the trial separate and different deeds. If the deed from Charles S. Puterbaugh to Mrs. Hentig, executed in 1883, did not, on account of a mistake of the parties, contain a proper description of the lots, yet, if Charles S. Puterbaugh had any title or interest therein, that title or interest was transferred to Mrs. Hentig in equity, if not in law, and therefore she ought to have asserted in the former action the deed which she first obtained from Puterbaugh. If Mrs. Hentig had obtained a new and distinct title to the lots after the final judgment in the former action, then that judgment would not have been res adjudicata against her. But that is not this case. Under the finding of the trial court she obtained her new and distinct title to the lots pending the former action. It was not used in that action. It was too late to use this title after the final judgment in the former action. The judgment of the district court will be affirmed. All the justices concurring.

GALE SULKY HARROW MANUF'G CO. v.
MOORE.

RESCISSION OF SALE—BREACH OF WARRANTY—DAMAGES.

1. To rescind a contract for the purchase of a chattel the property purchased should be returned or offered to be returned within a reasonable time, unless it is of no value to either party; and it is held that the testimony in the present case is insufficient to sustain a finding of rescission.

2. Where a seeder is purchased on a warranty and damage is claimed by reason of a breach of the conditions of the warranty, in that it fails to cover the seed that is sown, which results in a loss not only of the seed, but also of the use of the land on which it is sown, the purchaser will be entitled to recover for the loss that occurs while he makes a reasonable test of the fitness of the seeder to perform the work for which he purchased it; but after he ascertains that it will not do the work, and is wasting the seed, he should desist from its further use, and cannot enhance his damages by sowing crop after crop with the seeder, when he knows that the seed sown is wasted, and the use of the land on which it is sown will be lost.

8. The testimony examined, and found to be insufficient to sustain the findings of the jury.

Error from district court, Harper county; J. T. HERRICK, Judge.

Shepard, Grove & Shepard, for plaintiff in error. Sam S. Sisson, for defendant in error.

JOHNSTON, J. This action was brought upon a promissory note given by the defendant to the plaintiff for the purchase price of a Gale sulky harrow and seeder. The note was executed June 8, 1885, for $65, and was payable September 1, 1886. The execution of the note was admitted, but the defendant claimed that the implement was sold with a warranty that it was well adapted to the work of seeding ground; that the material and workmanship of the same was first-class in every particular; and that it would do the work in a satisfactory and farmer-like manner. He alleged that the representations were untrue; that the implement was inferior in quality, unfit for the purposes for which it was purchased, and wholly worthless. He alleges that he gave plaintiff due notice of the failure of the machine, and that it is now on his farm subject solely and exclusively to the order of the plaintiff. There is a further allegation that by reason of the breach of the warranty the defendant suffered damages to the extent of $405. The trial of the case resulted in a verdict in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff complains here that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict or the special findings that were made; that the findings are indefinite and inconsistent, and that the instructions were erroneous. The record shows that Moore purchased the implement in June, 1885; that he seeded 40 acres in wheat with it in the fall of 1885, 16 acres of oats in the spring of 1886, and about 65 acres of wheat in the fall of 1886. Plaintiff claims that the evidence of defendant was wholly insufficient to sustain the claim of rescission, and, therefore, that its demurrer to the evidence should have been sustained. The jury found that Moore rescinded his contract, but not until after the note became due, and the payment of the same was demanded. If the defendant had relied solely on the single defense of rescission we would be inclined to agree with the contention of plaintiff that the defense was insufficient, and that the findings warranted a judgment in its favor. If Moore desired to rescind it was his duty to place plaintiff in statu quo as nearly as possible, and therefore he should have returned or offered to return the implement, unless it was wholly worthless to both parties. From the testimony it cannot be said that it was valueless; and neither can it be said that there was a rescission. "In order, however, that the purchaser be entitled to rescind the contract, he must return the property, or offer to return it, within a reasonable time. He cannot retain and use the property, and at the same time say he repudiates and rescinds the contract of the purchase." Cookingham v. Dusa, 41 Kan. 229, 21 Pac. Rep. 95. See, also, Aultman v. Mickey, 41 Kan. 348,

21 Pac. Rep. 254; Weybrick v. Harris, 31 Kan. 92, 1 Pac. Rep. 271. The defendant used the implement for seeding through three seasons, without giving notice to plaintiff that it was defective or insufficient, and without returning or offering to return it. Indeed, he continued to use it up to and after the maturity of the note; and the jury find that the offer to return was not made until payment was demanded. He first seeded 40 acres in wheat in 1885, which was all the wheat sown on his farm for that year, then in the spring of 1886 he used the same implement for sowing his oats, and used no other; and afterwards, in the fall of 1886, he used it for seeding 65 acres of wheat, although he says it had been shown to be defective and worthless. He claimed that it did not properly cover the seed, but left the greater part of it exposed upon the surface of the ground. This defect, if it existed, was a patent one, which the defendant, who used the implement, must have seen and known from the beginning. Within the authorities cited, it must be held that the continued use of the implement after learning of the alleged defects should be regarded as a waiver of defendant's right to rescind, and that the offer to return was not made within a reasonable time. If this was the sole defense, it might be said that judgment should go for the plaintiff; but as damages are claimed for a breach of the conditions of the warranty, we must look further. It may be said, however, that the testimony is insufficient to sustain a finding of rescission. To sustain his claim of damages testimony was offered as to the quantity and value of the seed used, each seeding for three seasons; that most of the same was wasted by the defective seeder; that but little of the seed was covered or grew, and that he lost the use of the land on which the seed was sown. It was further shown that the defendant operated the implement the greater part of the time, and he testified that he noticed its defective operation, and that it covered scarcely any of the seed, but left it exposed on top of the ground. Notwithstanding this fact the jury specially find that the defect in the seeder "was not easily seen." This finding is in conflict with the testimony of the defendant. According to his statements the defect was an obvious one, and he describes the appearance of the ground after the seeder passed over it, leaving the greater part of the seed on the surface. He testified that three-fourths of the wheat was uncovered, and he thought that 99-100 of the oats were left on the top of the ground. This would be so manifest a defect that it could not be overlooked by any one; and besides, he says that the defect in the seeder became worse, and its operation less satisfactory, from the beginning. Much of the testimony that was offered in regard to damages suffered by him throughout the three seasons was given over objection, and should have been excluded. He could not enhance his damages by sowing crop after crop with the seeder, when he knew that the seed sown and the land on which it was sown would be wasted. If the defects are such as are claimed by the defendant, they were so apparent that he must have become aware of them within a day or two after beginning its use. If it was defective he would be entitled to recover for the loss that occurred while he made a reasonable test of the fitness of the implement to perform the work for which he purchased it; but after he ascertained that it would not do the work, and was wasting the seed, he should have ceased its use, and cannot recover for the loss of seed, labor, or land which was used or employed after that time. There is a singular inconsistency between the claims of defects made by defendant and his conduct in continuing to use the seeder season after season, not discarding it until a payment of the purchase price was demanded. When he saw three-fourths of the seed wheat uncovered and wasted in 1885, it is strange that he continued the use of the seeder until 40 acres were sown; and after he saw that only a little of the seed thus sown germinated, and that the crop was a failure, it is strange that he should sow his oats crop with it in the spring of 1886, and stranger still that, after seeing that 90-100 of the oats were left on top of the ground, and that both the oats crop and the preceding wheat crop were failures from the defects in the seeder, he should use it again in the fall of 1886 for seeding about 65 acres in wheat, when no change or repair had been made of the implement. The testimony of losses occurring from seeding after the defendant had a reasonable time to ascertain the unfitness of the implement, and learned that it was worthless, should have been rejected. Although errors are assigned on the instructions given by the court, we think the plaintiff in error has no cause to complain. The charge of the court fairly presented the case to the jury, but for the errors pointed out there should be a reversal of the judgment, and a new trial. That will be the judgment of this court. All the justices concurring.

TOWN-SITE LOTS—RECOVERY OF POSSESSION.

A party who has actually occupied and improved a lot on a town-site, entered under sections 2387-2389, Rev. St. U. S., need not necessarily be an actual resident of such town site, to entitle him to recover possession of such lot. If he is a bona fide occupant of a portion of the town-site, he has a right to have his possession protected.

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Seward county; A. J. ABOTT, Judge.

P. P. Hillerman and Painter & Ross, for plaintiff in error. S. N. Wood, for defendant in error.

GREEN, C. This action was brought by the plaintiff in error, in the district court of Seward county, to recover the possession of lot 1, in block 44, in the city of Springfield. The plaintiff in error claimed to be the equitable owner of the premises, which were a part of the Springfield town-site, which was located and laid out, on the public lands of the United States,

some time before the 9th day of November, 1885. The lot in question had been previously occupied by John Kauble, who had made some improvements thereon. On the day named Kauble sold the improvements, and his right to the possession of the premises, to the plaintiff, who entered into possession of the same, and erected a dug-out, which was habitable, and continued to hold possession, through a tenant, until ousted by the defendant below, about the 6th day of April, 1886. It seems that there were no other improvements upon this lot at the time the plaintiff purchased the same, except those of Kauble; neither was there any one claiming the premises adversely to him. In June, 1886, the probate judge made application to the United States land-office for a patent to the town-site, in trust for the occupants, according to their respective interest, and the final entry was made and recorded in the office of the register of deeds of Seward county in 1887. The court below found "that the plaintiff never was and never became, prior to the application and final entry of the town-site for a United States patent, an actual resident on the town-site of Springfield, Seward county, Kan., or any part thereof; and that the plaintiff did not contribute to the making of final proof on the town-site;" and sustained the demurrer of the defendant to the evidence, and rendered judgment against the plaintiff for costs. The plaintiff in error brings the case here. The contest, in this case, arises out of rival claims to a lot in a town-site, upon government land, and the trial court seemed to have sustained the demurrer to the evidence, upon the ground that occupancy and residence were both prerequisite conditions to obtain title under the provisions of sections 2387, 2388, and 2389 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and chapter 109 of the Compiled Laws of 1885. The language of section 2387 of the Revised Statutes is: "Whenever any portion of the public lands have been or may be settled upon and occupied as a town-site, not subject to entry under the agricultural pre-emption laws, it is lawful, in case such town be incorporated, for the corporate authorities thereof, and, if not incorporated, for the judge for the county court for the county in which such town is situated, to enter at the proper land-office, and at the minimum price, the land so settled and occupied, in trust for the several use and benefit of the occupants thereof, according to their respective interests." The supreme court of Minnesota has construed this section of the Revised Statutes: "The language of the pre-emption act of 1841 is essentially different from that of the municipal pre-emption act of 1844. The former is limited as to the age of the person entitled to its benefits; as to his nativity; requires the party to make settlement 'in person,' and to 'inhabit and improve the same,' and 'erect a dwelling thereon;' prohibits him from leaving his own land to make settlement on the government land; and also from owning 320 acres at the time of making his pre-emption. On all of these points the act of 1844 is silent, and where the pre-emption right has been so carefully guarded in the one case, and in another and subsequent act all these restrictions are omitted. It would certainly be a strange construction to hold that they must be supplied by implication. It is true, both acts speak of a settlement; but the act of 1844 defines what settlement is intended, viz., 'Settled upon and occupied as a town-site;' while the previous act, both in terms and in the construction which the department has placed upon it, limits the settlement to agricultural purposes. Nor, going outside the letter of the statute, do we find any authority, in the reason of the case, for placing such construction upon the act as was given by the court below. The object and idea of settling and building a town is not for the purpose of agriculture, but for that of trade. And, being used for purposes of trade, it cannot (at least only to a limited extent) be used for cultivation of the soil. And this idea was evidently entertained by congress in framing the law of 1844, in the use of the language, "and therefore not subject to entry under the existing pre-emption laws." The intent was to provide for cases to which no law then in existence applied. As the object of the settlement and occupancy of a town-site is totally different from that of a settlement under the act of 1841, no legitimate inference can be drawn that the particular manner or requisites of settlement and occupancy in each case must be the same. And the requisites of the act of 1844, as to settlement and occupancy, are complied with, when these are such as to attain the object in view, namely, the use of the land as a town-site, for purposes of trade, commerce, or manufactures. It is obvious that such a settlement need not necessarily be in person, nor require any cultivation of the soil." Leech v. Rauch, 3 Minn. 448, (Gil. 332.) In a very recent case, involving the question of a town-site trust, and the duty of the probate judge, under the same act of congress, this court has said: "The occupants of the town-site, whoever they may have been, were the equitable owners of the land settled upon and occupied, and they were entitled to a conveyance from the probate judge. Their rights were fixed by the act of congress, and the legislature was powerless to prescribe a rule which would give the land and lots to others than the occupants thereof. The provisions of the legislative act mainly conform to the act of congress, but, so far as they may conflict with that act, they must be held to be void. If the town company was an occupant of any portion of the town-site it was entitled to a conveyance of its respective interest." Investment Co. v. Munson, 44 Kan. —, 24 Pac. Rep. 977. This decision clearly recognizes the right of an occupant to a title. It could hardly be claimed that a town company could become a resident, yet it said it would be entitled to a conveyance. See, also, Winfield Town Co. v. Maris, 11 Kan. 128; Independence Town Co. v. De Long, Id. 153; Sherry v. Sampson, Id. 611; Carson v. Smith, 12 Minn. 546, (Gil. 458); Cook v. Rice, 2 Colo. 131; Clayton v. Spencer, Id. 378; Adams v. Binkley, 4 Colo. 247; Mayor of Aspen v. Aspen Town & Land Co., 10 Colo. 191, 15 Pac. Rep. 794, and 16 Pac. Rep. 160. There was some evidence, upon the part of the plaintiff, to indicate that he had, in good faith, occupied the premises in question, and that the defendant had ousted him of that possession. The court should not have sustained the demurrer to the evidence. We recommend a reversal of the judgment.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE — CHATTEL MORTGAGE TO SECURE DEBT.

1. If a bona fide creditor, by his vigilance, obtains the first lien and prior right to all the property of his debtor, owned at the time a chattel mortgage is executed to secure him, it is the exercise of an undoubted right which he has, and the law will protect him in the advantage thereby secured. *Randall v. Error from district court, Harper county; J. T. HERRICK, Judge.

Samuel Dalton, for plaintiffs in error. Shepard, Grove & Shepard, for defendant in error.

HORTON, C. J. This was an action in the court below brought by C. A. Bliss, E. S. Bliss, and B. F. Wood, partners doing business under the firm name of Bliss & Wood, against I. P. Couch, as sheriff of Harper county, in replevin, to recover the possession of certain merchandise, goods, and chattels, of the value of $3,000. Trial by the court without a jury, and finding in favor of I. P. Couch, as sheriff, and judgment for the amount of an execution in his possession, as such sheriff, of $396.20. The facts in this case are substantially as follows: On the 15th day of March, 1886, U. E. Millspaugh, Robert Highman, and J. F. Millspaugh, comprising the firm of Millspaugh, Highman & Co., made, executed, and delivered to C. A. Bliss, E. S. Bliss, and B. F. Wood, comprising the firm of Bliss & Wood, a chattel mortgage on all the goods and merchandise owned by them in Attica. The mortgage was given to secure the payment of $3,518.59. The indebtedness was evidenced by four promissory notes,—one for $1,000, dated January 1, 1886, due in three months from its date; one note for $800, dated January 1, 1886, due in four months from its date; one note for $1,000, dated January 1, 1886, due in six months from its date; and one note for $645, dated February 13, 1886, due in ten days from its date,—all bearing interest at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum, from their respective dates, and all signed by the firm of Millspaugh, Highman & Co., and payable to the firm of Bliss & Wood. The chattel mortgage provided that Bliss & Wood might appoint the firm of Millspaugh, Highman & Co. agents to make sale of the goods and merchandise in the ordinary course of trade, and to keep an accurate account of such sales, and to forward such accounts and proceeds of all sales, less the expenses of carrying on the business, to the firm of Bliss & Wood, at Winfield, in this state, on the first of each and every month after the date of the chattel mortgage until the indebtedness was fully paid. This mortgage was filed for record on the 16th day of March, 1886. On the same day Bliss & Wood took possession of the property, under and by virtue of the mortgage, and appointed Millspaugh, Highman & Co. their agents to sell and dispose of the property in the usual course of trade, and to account to the firm of Bliss & Wood for the money realized on account of the sales of the property, less what was actually necessary to pay running expenses, and less what was necessary to be used in purchasing such staple articles as were essential and necessary to have, to keep the stock up, so as to meet the demands of the trade. The note calling for the sum of $645, and interest on same, was paid, and credits, amounting to the sum of $267, were made upon the note calling for the sum of $800, with money realized from the sale of the goods described in the chattel mortgage. Bliss & Wood held the possession of the mortgaged property from the 16th day of March, 1886, to the 3d day of December, 1886, at which time I. P. Couch took possession of the property, under and by virtue of an execution issued out of the district court of Harper county, at the instance of Smith & Co., creditors of Millspaugh, Highman & Co. The execution was dated on the 12th day of November, 1886. It is contended that there is no evidence to sustain the general finding of the court in favor of I. P. Couch, the sheriff. We have carefully examined the record, and do not find that there is any evidence tending to show that the chattel mortgage executed by Millspaugh, Highman & Co. to Bliss & Wood was fraudulent or void. It appears from all the evidence that the mortgage was given to secure the payment of a bona fide indebtedness for flour. In Frankhouser v. Ellett, 22 Kan. 147, a majority of the court decided "that the statute authorizes a stipulation in a chattel mortgage for a retention of the possession by the mortgagor, and that a possession retained in accordance with the terms of such mortgage is not, when duly filed, per se fraudulent, or even prima facie evidence of fraud, as against creditors and subsequent purchasers." A majority of the court further decided in that case "that the mortgagor, if he may keep the possession, may as well make the sales as a stranger. He acts in that respect as a quasi agent, at least, of the mortgagee, and as such agent and salesman is entitled to compensation for his services." Swiggett v. Dodson, 38 Kan. 702, 17 Pac. Rep. 594; Rankine v. Greer, 38 Kan. 343, 16 Pac. Rep. 680. We know that "fraud is rarely susceptible of positive proof, for the obvious reason that it does not cry aloud in the streets, nor proclaim its iniquitous purposes from the housetops. Its vermiculations are chiefly traceable by covered tracks and studious con-cealments." Notwithstanding this general doctrine, fraud is never presumed, but must be established by some evidence. If a creditor of a mortgagor assails the mortgage or transfer for fraud, the burden of proof rests upon him. Baughman v. Penn, 33 Kan. 504, 6 Pac. Rep. 890. In Long v. West, 31 Kan. 298, 1 Pac. Rep. 545, it was decided that, "in the absence of evidence to the contrary, honesty and fair dealing in all transactions are always presumed; and if any person claims that there was fraud in any transaction it devolves upon such person to prove the fraud, and it does not devolve upon the party charged with committing the fraud to prove that the transaction was honest and bona fide." Although Millspaugh, Highman & Co. were insolvent at the time of the execution of the chattel mortgage to Bliss & Wood, they had the right to prefer Bliss & Wood as creditors, if the same was done in good faith. Arn v. Hoersemann, 26 Kan. 413; Randall v. Shaw, 28 Kan. 419; Avery v. Eastes, 18 Kan. 505; Bishop v. Jones, 28 Kan. 680; McPike v. Atwell, 34 Kan. 142, 8 Pac. Rep. 118; Cundet v. Lahmer, 16 Kan. 527. It was decided in Randall v. Shaw, 28 Kan. 419, "that the vigilant creditor is entitled to the advantages secured by his watchfulness and attention to his own interest."

There was some evidence introduced upon the trial on the part of the defendant below showing that the members of the firm of Millspaugh, Highman & Co. were brothers-in-law of E. S. Bliss; that other mortgages were also executed by Millspaugh, Highman & Co. to Bliss & Wood to secure the same indebtedness embraced in the chattel mortgage; that a mortgage by Millspaugh, Highman & Co., to secure E. S. Bliss as a surety, had been paid, but not released; that after this action was commenced, Bliss & Wood traded off the stock of goods for a farm worth about $4,000. But we do not think that any of these things, or these altogether, with some other matters that were presented upon the trial, establish that the chattel mortgage of Millspaugh, Highman & Co. to Bliss & Wood was given without consideration, or was fraudulent. We think it was proper for the trial court to admit evidence of everything connected with the possession of the property under the chattel mortgage, and the sale and transfer of the goods by Bliss & Wood, as throwing light on the transactions between the parties to the chattel mortgage. But all of the mortgages, given to secure the indebtedness existing from Millspaugh, Highman & Co. to Bliss & Wood, were not excessive in value, and the amount of the indebtedness in the mortgages was not exaggerated or overvalued. It is possible that, upon a new trial, something may develop the mala fides of the transactions between Millspaugh, Highman & Co. and Bliss & Wood, but, upon the evidence presented in this record, we cannot see how the chattel mortgage can be defeated or set aside. If Bliss & Wood have received, under their mortgage, more than sufficient proceeds to pay their indebtedness, they may be held to account to the creditors for any overplus. It is claimed upon the part of plaintiff below that I. P. Couch, as sheriff, did not have in his possession the goods and merchandise in dispute at the time that the last order of delivery was issued and served. He did have, however, the actual possession of the goods when the petition was filed, and when the first summons and the first order of delivery were issued. These were set aside on account of the irregularities and alias orders issued. On January 27, 1887, the court directed the goods and merchandise to be turned over to the defendant below. He did not file any disclaimer, but attempted to show title in himself, and the right of possession incident thereto, under an execution properly issued and placed in his hands. Therefore no proof of demand or refusal was required. Raper v. Harrison, 37 Kan. 243, 15 Pac. Rep. 219; Bogle v. Gordon, 39 Kan. 81, 17 Pac. Rep. 857; Machine Co. v. Mann, 42 Kan. 372, 22 Pac. Rep. 417; section 184, Civil Code; Morrill v. Douglass, 14 Kan. 293; Higbee v. McMillan, 18 Kan. 133. The judgment of the district court will be reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

1. When error is apparent in the final judgment the case may be reviewed in this court without a motion for a new trial.

2. Where there is a conflict between the general and special verdicts the latter must prevail.

(Syllabus by Strang, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Crawford county; GEORGE CHANDLER, Judge.

D. B. Van Syckle, for plaintiff in error.
John T. Voss, for defendant in error.

STRANG, C. November 7, 1887, the plaintiff company commenced its action in the district court of Crawford county, to foreclose a lien and recover the value of a certain windmill furnished and erected by the plaintiff upon the land of the defendant. The amount claimed was $221.28. Defendant alleges in his answer that the windmill entirely failed to perform the services for which it was erected, and that there was therefore no consideration for the claim sued on. Plaintiff replied the general denial. The case was tried by the court and a jury, which rendered a general verdict for the plaintiff for $98.44, and also made the following special findings of fact: "Question 1. Did the windmill placed on A. Buchanan's premises work well for a period of 30 days after November 24, 1886? Answer. Did not. Q. 2. Did the defendant, A. Buchanan, notify plaintiff December 12, 1886, (or within 30 days from November 24, 1886,) that said windmill did not work well? A. Yes, he did. Q. 3. If yea, did plaintiff fix or cause to be fixed said windmill, after receiving said notice, and within 30 days after receiving said notice? A. Yes, he did. Q. 4. Did plaintiff or its agents 'remedy the defects' in said windmill within thirty days, (if there were any such defects,) so that said windmill would run well? A. Yes. Q. 5. Was the order [set out in plaintiff's petition] presented to defendant, A. Buchanan, prior to the commencement of this action by the plaintiff herein? A. Yes. Q. 6. Did the defendant, A. Buchanan, refuse to execute notes mentioned in plaintiff's petition prior to the commencement of this action? If so, why? A. He did, because he claimed the mill did not work well. Q. 7. Did defendant, A. Buchanan, fail and neglect to execute said notes after he had been requested to do so by the plaintiff? If so, why? A. He did, because he claimed the mill would not work well. Q. 8. Was said mill built according to the contract set out in plaintiff's petition? A. Yes, in its material construction." The plaintiff, ignoring the general verdict, moved the court for judgment on the special verdict for the amount of its claim as shown in its petition. The court sustained the motion for judgment on the findings to the extent of the amount returned by the jury in the general verdict, which was a practical denial of the motion of the plaintiff. No motion for new trial was filed, but the plaintiff comes to this court, and alleges that the court below erred in not sustaining its motion for the full amount of its claim. The defendant says this case cannot be reviewed by this court because the plaintiff filed no motion for new trial. We think the error, if any there is, is apparent upon the face of the judgment, and therefore no motion for a new trial was necessary to a review of the question here. Lender v. Caldwell, 4 Kan. 339; Dutton v. Hobson, 7 Kan. 196; Sawyer v. Bryson, 10 Kan. 199; Coburn v. Weed, 12 Kan. 182; Stapleton v. Orr, 43 Kan. 170, 23 Pac. Rep. 109. Was there any error committed in this case by the trial court? The petition in the case alleged that the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff upon a written order for a windmill and fixtures and the erection of the same in the sum of $221.28. The defendant, in his answer, admitted the execution of the order sued on, but claimed the mill failed to perform the work for which it was erected, and was therefore useless and of no value. The jury in the general verdict say they find the issues in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant, and then assess the amount of the plaintiff's recovery at $98.44. This verdict carries with it a finding in the plaintiff's favor upon all questions at issue, except, perhaps, as to the value of the mill erected. The order admitted to have been executed by the defendant expressly fixes the value of the improvement, the mill and fixtures, at $221.28. It is true the order required the company, upon notice within 30 days of the failure of the mill to work well, to make it so work. The jury found specially that the mill was constructed in accordance with the terms of the contract, and that, while the mill did not work well at first, the company, upon notice, remedied the defects therein, after which it did work well. Considering the pleadings in the case and these findings together, we think the plaintiff was entitled to a judgment for the full amount of its claim, and that the refusal of the court to sustain the plaintiff's motion for judgment in such amount was error. It is therefore recommended that the district court be directed to modify its judgment so as to give the plaintiff judgment for the full amount of its claim and a foreclosure of its lien.

REVIEW ON APPEAL.

A general finding of a trial court, in an action of ejectment, a jury having been waived, will not be disturbed by this court, where there is some evidence to sustain such a finding.

(Syllabus by Simpson, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Cowley county; M. G. TROUP, Judge.

S. D. Pryor, for plaintiff in error. Case & Beach, for defendants in error.

SIMPSON, C. Action in ejectment to recover a quarter section of land in Cowley county. Both sides claim title through one N. L. F. Monroe, who, in the month of December, 1879, made a conveyance thereof to Margie Young. It is claimed that the sole consideration for this conveyance was paid by William Young, the husband of Margie Young, and that he caused the deed to be made to her to defraud his creditors; that the said William Young, at the time this conveyance was made, was indebted to several persons, and among them to the firm of Morehead, Young & Co., who recovered a judgment against William Young in the district court of Shawnee county on the 13th day of May, 1875, and on the 14th day of February, 1880, a transcript of which judgment was duly filed in the office of and with the clerk of the district court of Cowley county, and became a lien on all the lands and real estate of William Young in that county, and particularly the land in controversy; that an execution was issued on said judgment, and said land sold to George W. Crane, who received a sheriff's deed therefor on the 11th day of June, 1880; that Crane sold and conveyed said land to one H. L. Barker on the 21st day of June, 1880, who took possession of the same; that Barker sold said land and conveyed it to Marion Culver on the 2d day of December, 1881, and since that time two-thirds of said land has been conveyed to this plaintiff in error, John Culver, and Adilene Tully and Marion Culver are the owners of the other third; that these parties have been in the actual, open, and notorious possession of this land, claiming to be the owners thereof, ever since the 21st day of June, 1880; that more than six years have elapsed since the recording of said sheriff's deed to said land.

John Culver filed a supplemental answer, alleging that since this action was commenced he had become the sole owner of the land in controversy. Margie Young conveyed this land to Thomas W. Cochrane; Cochrane conveyed it to William P. Wilson; Wilson conveyed it by quitclaim to I. E. H. Moeser; Margie Young conveyed to Cochrane 19th February, 1880; Cochrane conveyed to Wilson, 7th May, 1881; Wilson conveyed to Moeser, 20th November, 1884. A jury was waived, and a trial had to the court, and a general finding for the defendant in error was made, and judgment entered in her favor. A motion for a new trial was overruled, and the case is here for review.

The sole contention of counsel for the plaintiff in error here is that on the evidence produced at the trial the plaintiff in error was clearly entitled to a judgment in his favor, and that there is no evidence to sustain the judgment rendered. Counsel overlook the fact that there is not a particle of evidence tending to connect Margie Young with the judgment of Morehead, Young & Co., or with an attempt to defraud the creditors of her husband, or with any knowledge of the gambling transaction in which her husband participated, until this action is commenced, by an apparently innocent purchaser, to recover the possession of the land; and in the mean time Margie Young has conveyed to Cochrane, Cochrane has conveyed to Wilson, and Wilson to Mrs. Moeser, the defendant in error, with no hint in the evidence that either Cochrane, Wilson, or the defendant in error had notice or knowledge of the gambling transaction, or of the attempt on the part of Young to defraud his creditors; and all the time there was nothing in the record in any manner connecting Margie Young with the judgment and sale of this land to satisfy the claim of Morehead, Young & Co. The first subdivision of section 16 of the Code has no application to the facts in this case, so far as this defendant in error is concerned. She is not the execution debtor or his heir, nor does she claim under him, but she claims by virtue of the title held by Margie Young; whereas, the judgment on which the land was sold was not rendered against Margie Young, but against William B. Young, her husband. If this conveyance was made to Margie Young, the consideration having been paid by her husband, and the title was put in her name to defraud his creditors, and Mrs. Moeser knew these facts at the time she bought the land, then there would be force in the claim; but there is no evidence showing notice to or knowledge by either Cochrane, Wilson, or the defendant in error of these facts. It is partially shown that the sole consideration for the conveyance by Monroe to Margie Young was a gambling debt due from Monroe to William Young, but this is not shown to have been known to Cochrane, who bought from Mrs. Young, or to Wilson, who bought from Cochrane, or to the defendant in error, who bought from Wilson. There is no legal view that can be taken of the facts disclosed by this record that would justify a reversal of the cause. It is recommended that the judgment be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

CHICAGO, K. & W. R. CO. v. TOWNSHIP OF OZARK *et al.*¹

RAILROAD AID BONDS — AMOUNT — VALIDITY OF ELECTION — POWERS OF TOWN OFFICERS.

1. Where an election has been held in a township authorizing a subscription to the capital stock of a railroad company to the amount of $18,000, and authorizing the issuing of a like amount of township bonds to the railroad company in payment for such stock, but three days prior to the election it was agreed between a portion of the electors of the township and certain agents of the railroad company that if the election should be in the affirmative the amount of the subscription and of the bonds to be issued should be only $10,000, and the election resulted in an affirmative vote, authorizing a subscription to be made and bonds to be issued in the amount of $18,000, but immediately afterwards, in a proceeding instituted by a tax-payer and an elector of the township, the officers and the railroad company were enjoined from making a subscription or issuing or receiving an amount of bonds exceeding $10,000, and the subscription was then made for $10,000, and the railroad company accepted the subscription, and relinquished all claim to an amount of bonds above that amount, and afterwards the railroad was built, and all the other conditions imposed upon the railroad company by the proposition voted upon were complied with and fulfilled by the railroad company in pursuance of such election and of such subscription, held, that the railroad company is entitled to the bonds of the township to the amount of $10,000.

2. Where an election is pending in a township for the purpose of authorizing a subscription to the capital stock of a railroad company, and the issuing of bonds in payment therefor to the amount of $18,000, and while the election is pending a portion of the electors and certain agents of the railroad company agree that if the election should result favorably to the subscription and the issuing of the bonds the amount of each should be only $10,000 instead of $18,000, held, that such an agreement is not in effect or tantamount to a bribe to the voters, and will not necessarily render the election wholly invalid.

3. When authority is given to the officers of a public corporation by an election or otherwise to issue a certain amount of the bonds of the corporation, the officers will have the power and the right, whenever there is a sufficient reason therefor, to issue a less amount of the bonds of the corporation.

Error from district court, Anderson county; A. W. BENSON, Judge.

This was an action brought in the district court of Anderson county by the township of Ozark against the Colony, Neosho Falls & Western Railroad Company, the Southern Kansas Railway Company, H. K. Winants, H. A. Bearly, and S. A. Herriman, the county commissioners, and A. D. McFadden, the county clerk, of said county, to enjoin the defendants from issuing or accepting certain township bonds. It afterwards appearing that the Chicago, Kansas & Western Railroad Company had, by the consolidation of various railroad companies, succeeded to all the rights of the Colony, Neosho Falls & Western Railroad Company and of other companies, the plaintiff amended its petition, making the Chicago, Kansas & Western Railroad Company a party defendant, and praying for the same relief against it as it had previously prayed for against the other railroad companies. The Chicago, Kansas & Western Railroad Company then answered, and the case was dismissed as to the Southern Kansas Railway Company. The case was tried before the court without a jury, and the court made special findings of fact and conclusions of law as follows:

Findings of fact: (1) The plaintiff is, and was at the times hereinafter referred to, a municipal township of Anderson county. The defendant the Colony, Neosho Falls & Western Railroad Company was duly organized and incorporated as a railway corporation of this state on the 27th day of November, 1885, to construct, operate, and maintain a line of railroad from a point at or near Colony, in the plaintiff township, south-westerly into Allen, Woodson, and other counties. The Chicago, Kansas & Western Railroad Company was organized and incorporated under the laws of this state on the 21st day of November, 1885, to construct, operate, and maintain certain lines of railroad in its charter mentioned, and on the 31st day of May, 1886, it succeeded by consolidation to all the rights, privileges, and immunities, and to the property, estate, and franchises, of said Colony, Neosho Falls & Western Railroad Company. (2) On the 11th day of January, 1886, pursuant to a petition therefor duly presented and in all things proper and sufficient, the board of county commissioners of this county duly convened, and made an order, as provided by law in such cases, for an election to be had, held in said township on the 15th day of February, 1886, upon the proposition to subscribe to the capital stock of the said Colony, Neosho Falls & Western Railroad Company, and to issue the bonds of the township in payment therefor to the amount of $18,000. Due and legal proclamation and notice of said election was given, the call therefor being as set out in the petition, and the election was held accordingly, resulting in a vote of 193 for and 137 against said proposition, as shown by an official canvass of said votes duly made and declared by said board on the 19th day of February, 1886. (3) On the 4th day of January, 1886, the said Colony, Neosho Falls & Western Railroad Company deposited in a bank at Colony, aforesaid, the sum of $75, to be used to pay the expenses of said election in Ozark township if the proposition was carried, but to be returned to the railroad company if it was defeated. (4) On the 12th day of February, 1886, after full discussion and deliberation by the people upon said proposition, it became apparent to and was generally believed by the citizens of the township, and by the railroad company as well, that said proposition would be defeated as it then stood. Thereupon, on the evening of that day, the president, secretary, and treasurer, and board of directors held a meeting at Colony, together with about fifty citizens of that city and two farmers of the township, residing outside of the city, to consider the situation. In response to inquiries from the officers of the company, it was the unanimous expression of the opinion of the citizens that the proposition as it then stood would be defeated. A vote, however, was taken by the citizens present upon the question of voting $10,000 instead of $18,000, and it was carried with only one dissenting vote. Thereupon the treasurer of the company, in the presence of the other officers and directors, stated in substance that, having heard of the probable defeat and failure of the pending proposition, the company was about to change or amend their charter so as to submit another point on the Southern Kansas Railway instead of Colony, but that the company would take a less sum than $18,000, rather than suffer the delay and start anew; that the executive committee was present with power to act, and, if the sense of the meeting was in favor of $10,000, and the people would go on and vote the $18,000 proposition, as it stood, the company would relinquish all over $10,000, and issue therefor that amount of stock, and file such relinquishment with the county clerk. The meeting assenting to this, the company executed a paper relinquishing such excess, and reserving the right to issue stock to the amount of the bonds to be received, viz., $10,000. The official act of the company constituting such relinquishment is set out in full in the circular copied into the petition, and was filed in the county clerk's office February 13, 1886. The said officers and directors, acting in conjunction with said citizens' meeting, caused the legal opinion also contained in said circular to be obtained, and immediately published said circular, and circulated it generally and thoroughly in said township prior to said election. It was mailed to every voter, so far as their names could be ascertained, and posted at the polls and in other public places. It was received and read by and otherwise came to the notice of all, or nearly all, the voters. It seems to have been well understood, and acted upon in good faith, as a modification of the pending proposition. The object, purpose, and intent of the company in taking such action was to influence the voters of the township in favor of said proposition, and to cause the same to be carried. The effect of such action and publication and reading thereof was to change the sentiment of the voters so as to carry said proposition, and but for such action and publication the proposition would have been defeated. (5) After the official canvass of said vote the board of county commissioners ordered the county clerk to make, and the county clerk did make accordingly, a subscription upon the books of said railroad company to the capital stock of said company for shares to the amount of $10,000, and likewise ordered the chairman of said board to make, and, with the county clerk, to seal, sign, and deliver, the bonds of said township to a like amount, upon the conditions and payable as stated in the said proposition. The subscription was made by the county clerk as directed, and the proper officers were ready, willing, and about to issue said bonds when this suit was brought and the injunction allowed. (6) On the 1st day of March, 1887, the railroad of the Colony, Neosho Falls & Western Railroad Company was built from the depot of the Southern Kansas Railway in Colony within 2,000 feet of the north line of said town, as stated in the proposition, to a point beyond the east line of Woodson county, and the road was in operation and cars running thereon on regular schedule time. The engine, however, backed up from the western terminus to Colony, there being no turn-table at said terminus; and trains were so operated until the road was completed to Yates Center. The track was not surfaced up all the way on the 1st of March, but that was partly done, and was finished on the 1st of June following. There is a deep cut, some 600 feet in length, and at the deepest place 19 feet in depth, on the line a little south of Colony. This was not cut wide enough prior to March 1, 1887, so that in thawing and freezing the banks caved somewhat, so as to fill up the ditches along the track. These ditches were cleaned out, and the cut was widened, in the spring of 1888. The running of trains, however, was not impeded, but they have been operated regularly since February 25, 1887, and so I conclude that the road was built and operated substantially according to the terms of the proposition. (7) On the 19th of February, 1886, a suit was brought in this court by one J. W. Schuessler, a tax-payer of said township, who alleged in his petition against said railroad company and against the county commissioners and county clerk, defendants therein, the making of said petition and order, and the holding of said election, and the action of said company hereinbefore stated, providing for a reduction of the subscription to $10,000, and averred that the board was about to issue $18,000 in bonds so voted, whereupon a temporary injunction was allowed. Afterwards, by consent of the parties plaintiff and said county commissioners and clerk, the suit having been dismissed by the plaintiff as to the railroad company, the judge at chambers dissolved said injunction, and allowed another temporary injunction restraining the board and clerk from issuing more than $10,000 in amount of said bonds, and from subscribing for more than $10,000 in amount to the capital stock of said company. Nothing further was done in said action. This order was made March 29, 1886. The board had not ordered nor had the clerk subscribed for said stock prior to the allowance of said temporary injunction, and did not do so solely because of said first injunction. After the order of the district judge last above stated said board did order and said clerk did make the subscription for $10,000 of said stock as hereinbefore stated. The said Colony, Neosho Falls & Western Railroad Company has not, nor has its successor, the Chicago, Kansas & Western Railroad Company, ever claimed in any manner more than said $10,000 in bonds since the relinquishment of February

"Conclusions of law: (1) A petition of two-fifths of the tax-payers, designating the amount of stock to be taken, the order for and notice of the election for such amount, and a majority vote therefor, are conditions precedent to a valid municipal subscription for stock in a railroad corporation. (2) The county commissioners are the agents of the township to make such subscription, when so authorized. Such agency is, however, special and limited, depending upon the express assent of the voters, and such assent can only be given in the manner prescribed by law. (3) When a railway company, pending a vote by the township to subscribe to its capital stock, in order to secure a majority for the proposition, which otherwise would be defeated, relinquishes a part of the bonds proposed to be voted for such stock, reserving, however, a corresponding part of the stock, and the election is carried by such means, a subscription made for a part of the stock so voted is void. The township, as a contracting party, has a right to determine what amount of stock it will subscribe, and to determine it in the manner prescribed by the statute. No mere understanding with the voters, however general, can vary the result of an election. (4) The subscription being void, and the company having full knowledge of all the facts making it void, the doctrine of equitable estoppel has no application, although the railroad was built as provided in the proposition. (5) It follows that the bonds demanded in payment of such subscription should not be issued. (6) Judgment for a perpetual injunction will be rendered accordingly as prayed for by the plaintiff."

Upon the foregoing findings and conclusions the court below rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendants, perpetually enjoining the defendants from issuing, delivering, accepting, or receiving any of the aforesaid bonds. The Chicago, Kansas & Western Railroad Company, which is the successor to all the rights of the other defendant railroad companies, brings the case to this court for review, making Ozark township, the county commissioners, and the county clerk defendants in error.

Geo. R. Peck, A. A. Hurd, and Robt. Dunlap, for plaintiff in error. James D. Snoddy, for defendants in error.

VALENTINE, J., (after stating the facts as above.) The court below, in rendering judgment in this case, delivered the following opinion, to-wit: "This is an action to restrain the issuance of bonds claimed to have been voted by Ozark township to pay for stock in the Colony, Neosho Falls & Western Railroad Company. It is conceded that a proper petition was presented, the order made, notice given, and the election held according to law. It appeared, however, that three days before the day named for the election the voters of the township and the railroad company alike became convinced that the proposition, which was for a

$18,000, and the issuance of bonds therefor, would be lost, but it was believed that a less sum could be voted. Thereupon, as the result of a meeting of the board of directors with some fifty citizens of the township, the company offered, if the proposition was carried, to, and did, relinquish its claim to all but $10,000 of the bonds, reserving the right to issue only that amount of stock. Such offer and relinquishment, duly executed by the proper officers of the company, was thereupon published, posted, and mailed to the voters, who were thereby induced to and did vote for the bonds, so that the proposition was carried. But for such action it would have been defeated. The company filed its relinquishment to such excess with the county clerk. The board duly canvassed the vote, declared the proposition carried, and ordered the clerk to subscribe for $10,000 only of said stock, upon the terms and conditions stated in the petition, order, and notice, which was done. The company, having built its road as provided in the proposition, offered to deliver the proper certificates for $10,000 of said stock, and demanded the issuance and delivery of the bonds. No claim is made to the $8,000 excess, but the relinquishment thereof is treated as valid and effectual by both parties. The exact question, then, is whether upon a petition, order, notice, and election under the act in question, (Comp. Laws, 1885, pp. 783, 784,) authorizing a subscription for a certain amount of stock, a township can be legally compelled to accept and pay for a less amount under the circumstances appearing in this case. The sole authority for such subscription is the statute, and section 69 provides: 'Before such subscription * * * shall be made, the question shall first be submitted to the qualified electors of the township at a special or general election, as * * * specified in the petition, which petition shall also designate the railroad company and the amount of stock proposed to be taken.' The next section requires that such petition shall be presented, the board convened, and the order made, 'embracing the terms and conditions set forth in the petition.' Manifestly, the presentation of such a petition, signed by two-fifths of the resident tax-payers, is a condition precedent to the order of the board, and the order for and the affirmative vote upon the proposition so submitted are conditions precedent to the subscription. The commissioners are the agents of the township. Railroad, etc., Co. v. Davis Co., 6 Kan. 256; Railroad Co. v. Douglas Co., 18 Kan. 169; Turner v. Woodson Co., 27 Kan. 314. But such agency is special and limited, and rests upon the express assent of the voters. Lewis v. Bourbon Co., 12 Kan. 186. The preliminary steps constitute the authority of the commissioners to make the subscription, which is the contract. Railroad, etc., Co. v. Davis Co., supra. The vital question is whether the subscription is valid, and this must depend upon the power of the commissioners to make it under the existing facts. That power we have seen 'rests upon the express assent of the voters,' and that assent must be shown in the manner provided by law. There must, of course, be a valid election, authorizing, not a subscription, but the subscription actually made. Railroad Co. v. Miami Co., 12 Kan. 230; Lewis v. Bourbon Co., Id. 186. And before the election there must be a petition, not for a proposition to subscribe generally, but designating 'the amount of stock proposed to be taken;' and then thirty days' notice must be given. A less time invalidates the bonds that may be voted. George v. Oxford Tp., 16 Kan. 72. A special election, as the court says in the case last cited, 'depends for its validity upon being legally called, and upon legal and proper notice thereof being given.' Now, if we attempt to uphold this subscription upon the argument that the reduction of the amount by the company, accepted and acted upon in good faith by the voters, was equivalent to a change in the proposition, we are met by the difficulty already indicated by the citation of authorities, viz., that there was no petition, order, or notice for an election upon such a modified proposition, all of which steps are jurisdictional. Besides, the people had only two days' notice upon which to consider and discuss the grave matter of placing a lien upon all the taxable property of the township. They had already discussed, and, it appears, condemned, the pending proposition. Who shall say that they might not have repudiated this new and modified one, had time for deliberation and discussion been given? But, passing over all questions as to the petition and notice, the election itself, when canvassed in any manner known to the law, did not authorize the subscription made. The will of the voter must be determined from the ballot. Its language must govern when the terms used are such as to make known his will beyond a reasonable doubt. Clark v. Montgomery Co., 33 Kan. 202, 6 Pac. Rep. 311. It cannot be that the terms used, taken in connection with the proposition submitted, plain and certain as they were in the case, can be varied or contradicted by any prior understanding of the voters, however general, that their ballots should be held to mean something different. If elections are to depend upon such loose and uncertain considerations, then a government resting upon the ballot is indeed precarious. Nor can this subscription be upheld upon the proposition that the greater includes the less. Possibly that might be urged if this was a donation or gift merely, but it is not. This was an attempt to subscribe for stock in a railroad company, and to pay therefor, as any other subscriber, dollar for dollar. It was a business venture, which, however hazardous, the township might engage in, provided lawful methods were observed. If A. offers to take stock in a corporation to a given amount, which offer is accepted, can he be legally compelled to take and pay for a less amount? Every man has a right to determine the quantity of any commodity he will buy, and the seller may not be allowed to coerce him into taking less. And a township contracting for stock in a railroad company is after all only a contracting party, and, being charged with the liabilities, it must have the corresponding rights of any other. So, here, this township had the right to determine what amount of stock it would take, and it could only determine it in the way provided by law. Solemn legal formalities, carefully designed to protect the tax-payer against the improvident assumption of grievous burdens by the voters, are not to be lightly set aside by the resolutions of a casual meeting of citizens. This is a government of laws. It is free because it rests on the consent of the governed; but that consent must be given by certain well-defined methods sanctioned by law. The vast volume of municipal debt incurred in aid of railroad building is a sufficient reminder that the legal barriers against the hasty assumption of such burdens are none too strong, and certainly should not be weakened by judicial interpretation. The conclusion is that the subscription in question was made without lawful authority, and is void.

"It is urged, however, with great earnestness, and with reference to numerous authorities, that the township is estopped from denying the validity of the subscription, the road having been built in reliance upon it. The law of equitable estoppel, however, cannot be invoked, for two reasons: First, the subscription, which is the contract, being void, no legal rights in favor of a party to it can be founded upon it, (Sheldon v. Donohoe, 40 Kan. 346, 19 Pac. Rep. 901;) and, second, because the railroad company had full knowledge that the preliminary steps did not warrant the commissioners in making the subscription. The company did not build its road rightfully relying upon the validity of the subscription, for it initiated and carried out the very proceedings that made the subscription void. Bigelow, Estop. pp. 466, 467; Bernstein v. Smith, 10 Kan. 60; People v. Cline, 63 Ill. 394. After all it seems that the simple inquiry is whether the forms of law have been complied with so far as to make a valid contract. If they have, it should be sustained; if they have not, it must fail. The court cannot make and then enforce a contract. Certain solemn forms of procedure have been prescribed to protect the tax-payers, that nothing be done without their consent. These are all the protection the tax-payer has, and should not be frittered away by judicial construction. So says our supreme court in substance in Lewis v. Bourbon Co., 12 Kan. 186. It must be remembered that this is not a case where the municipality has received the fruit of another's labor or expenditure, and refuses to pay therefor, although retaining and enjoying such fruits, as in Sleeper v. Bullen, 6 Kan. 300. Nor is it the case of part performance by one and acceptance by another. The company owns its road. It has parted with nothing which the township has received. The township has accepted and appropriated none of its materials or labor. The road was not built for the township, but for the company. It was built presumably for profit, as a legitimate business enterprise, and now the township declines to accept and pay for the stock offered, for the reason that it never contracted to do so. Railroad Co. v. Thompson, 24 Kan. 170. "The injunction against the issuance of the bonds should be made perpetual."

The paramount question presented in this case is substantially as follows. Where an election has been held in a township authorizing a subscription to the capital stock of a railroad company to the amount of $18,000, and authorizing the issuing of a like amount of township bonds to the railroad company in payment for such stock, but three days prior to the election it was agreed between a portion of the electors of the township and certain agents of the railroad company that, if the election should be in the affirmative, the amount of the subscription and of the bonds to be issued should be only $10,000, and the election resulted in an affirmative vote, authorizing a subscription to be made and bonds to be issued in the amount of $18,000, but immediately afterwards, in a proceeding instituted by a tax-payer and an elector of the township, the officers and the railroad company were enjoined from making a subscription or issuing or receiving an amount of bonds exceeding $10,000, and the subscription was then made for $10,000, and the railroad company accepted the subscription and relinquished all claim to an amount of bonds above that amount, and afterwards the railroad was built and all the other conditions imposed upon the railroad company by the proposition voted upon were complied with and fulfilled by the railroad company in pursuance of such election and of such subscription, is the railroad company entitled to the bonds of the township to the amount of $10,000? We think this question must be answered in the affirmative. It is contended, however, by the township that the aforesaid agreement between a portion of the electors of the township and the agents of the railroad company that, if the election should result favorably to the subscription and the issuing of the bonds, the amount of the subscription and the bonds should be only $10,000, instead of $18,000, was in effect or tantamount to a bribe to the voters, which rendered the election absolutely and wholly invalid. There certainly cannot be anything in this, and it does not appear that the court below so held. It is also claimed that the election was not an election at all for any purpose, for the following reasons: First, it is claimed that it was not an election for a subscription and bonds to the amount of $18,000, for the reason that a portion of the electors and the agents of the railroad company agreed otherwise; and, second, it is claimed that it was not an election for a subscription and bonds in the amount of $10,000, or any other amount less than $18,000, for the reason that no valid election was ever called, ordered, or provided for for any less amount than $18,000. Now, we think the election was in fact an election, and that prima facie, and upon the records of the county and township, it was an election for a subscription and bonds to the amount of $18,000, but in all fairness and justice it was an election for a subscription and bonds in a sum not exceeding $10,000. We think the election was valid, to the extent at least of authorizing a subscription and the issuing of bonds to the amount of $10,000; or, in other words, it was not wholly void. It is also claimed that there cannot in any case be a subscription made or bonds issued for any less amount than that actually voted for by the electors of the township. This certainly cannot be true, as has already been held by this court in the case of Turner v. Commissioners, 27 Kan. 314. This question has also been virtually decided in the same way by the supreme court of Alabama. Winter v. City Council, 65 Ala. 403. This last case cited is as nearly in point, as nearly applicable, as nearly analogous, to the present case, as it could well be, and we know of no authority to the contrary; and the principle enunciated in the cases cited is substantially that, when authority is given to the officers of a public corporation, by an election or otherwise, to issue a certain amount of the bonds of the corporation, the officers will have the power and the right, whenever there is a sufficient reason therefor, to issue a less amount of the bonds of the corporation. This, we think, is good law; and we think there was and is ample reason for the issuing of Ozark township bonds to the amount of $10,000 instead of $18,000. Besides, it is evidently greatly more to the interest of Ozark township that only $10,000 in amount of its bonds should be issued than that the whole amount of $18,000 of its bonds should be issued. The township has by the election and subscription procured the railroad to be built, and has obtained all that it expected to obtain from the railroad company. The railroad has been built and equipped in accordance with the election and subscription, and it is now to the interest of the township that as small an amount of its bonds should be issued as is possible. The stock of the railroad company is probably worth but little, and the issuing of the bonds for such stock is virtually a donation. This is nearly always the case in similar transactions, and all well-informed persons know it. Undoubtedly the railroad company would be perfectly willing to issue to the township $18,000 of its stock if it could thereby procure a like amount of the township bonds. Such a thing would be very much like giving nothing for something. The object of the law in permitting public corporations to subscribe for stock in railroad companies, and to issue their bonds in payment therefor, is not intended as a business transaction like that consummated by an individual when he purchases stock and pays therefor in money or in something else. It is merely for the purpose of procuring greater facilities for travel and transportation for the general public, which is always considered as a public purpose, and not merely as a private purpose, enterprise, or business transaction. The act itself, authorizing counties, townships, and municipal corporations to subscribe for stock in and to issue bonds to railroad companies, is entitled "An act to enable counties, townships, and cities to aid in the construction of railroads," etc. Laws 1876, c. 107. This shows that the main object of the act was to enable counties, townships and cities "to aid in the construction of railroads," and was not to permit such corporations to engage in such transactions as a mere business venture, or as an investment in stocks, or a speculation in bonds and stocks. Twenty years ago it was said by this court in the case of Leavenworth Co. v. Miller, 7 Kan. 528, 529, 532, among other things, as follows: "If a railroad company is purely a private corporation, and if the construction and operation thereof is purely a private purpose, neither the government nor any municipal corporation has any right to become a stockholder therein. Governments were not organized for the purpose of engaging in private enterprises or private business, but only for the transaction and promotion of public affairs. Even if the purchase of stock in a railroad company should be a paying transaction as an investment, (which, unfortunately for counties and municipal corporations, it is not,) still a governmental organization would have no right, for that reason alone, to engage in it, for governmental organizations are not created for purposes of speculation, nor are they created for the purpose of enriching the organization as such, but only for the purpose of promoting the general welfare of the individual members thereof as citizens. The increased facility for travel and transportation is the main object in the creation of railroads, and this it is which constitutes a railroad a public purpose. All other benefits, though belonging of right to the public, are simply incidental." Pages 528, 529. "The opening of hotels, the running of stage-coaches, hacks, drays, etc., have never been considered as incumbent upon governments. Governments have never undertaken to keep hotel, run stage-coaches, etc.; and it has never been considered that there was any moral or legal obligation resting upon them to do so. But the duty of opening highways, canals, and other like improvements for the accommodation of travel and commerce has always been considered most binding upon all governments." Page 532. In the case of Winter v. City Council, above cited, the supreme court of Alabama used the following, among other, language: "We do not discover that the city council varied the propositions which were submitted to and approved by the voters at the election. The proposition was, when fairly construed, that the city should extend aid to the railroad company, by the issue of its bonds, to an amount not exceeding one million of dollars, which were to be employed in building and equipping the road. It was not pecuniary gain, nor any of the advantages which would accrue to an individual from membership in the railroad company, that formed a motive or inducement for clothing the city with the power to aid in the construction of the road. The benefits which would result to the commerce and industry of the city, the increased facilities of access to it, were the purposes for which the power was conferred. If these could be secured without involving the city in a debt of one million of dollars, it was not only within the power, but it was the duty, of the city council to secure them for the least practicable sum. The power to create the larger included the power to create the lesser debt. Omne majus continet in se minus." Page 416. The sovereign power of eminent domain is always exercised in favor of railroads, because they are considered as public purposes, as instruments of commerce and of travel and transportation, and not because of any stock which might be held in them by any public corporation. We do not think that the agreement between a portion of the electors of Ozark township and the agents of the railroad company prior to the election, or anything else that occurred prior or subsequent to the election, will so invalidate the election or so destroy the rights or claims of the railroad company that it may not demand and receive the bonds of Ozark township up to the amount of $10,000; and we so decide without reference to any question of estoppel or of res adjudicata; and we might here say that the railroad company claims under both. It claims that, as the township permitted the railroad company to construct and equip its railroad upon the faith of the aforesaid election and subscription, the township is now estopped from claiming that either the election or the subscription is void; and that, as the injunction suit between the aforesaid tax-payer and elector of Ozark township and the railroad company and the officers whose duty it might be to make the subscription and to issue the bonds of the township resulted in the granting of an injunction restraining the subscription and the issuing of the bonds only to the extent of the excess over and above $10,000, and permitting the officers to make the subscription, and to issue the bonds to the amount of $10,000, and permitting the railroad company to accept and receive such an amount of the township bonds, all the substantial questions presented in this case were virtually adjudicated in and by that case, and have become res adjudicata. The judgment of the court below will be reversed, and the cause remanded, with the order that judgment be rendered in favor of the defendants below and against the plaintiff below. All the justices concurring.

SHERMAN CENTER TOWN CO. v. RUSSELL.

TOWN-SITE COMPANIES—CONTRACTS.

1. Town Co. v. Swigart, 43 Kan. 292, 23 Pac. Rep. 569, and Town Co. v. Morris, 43 Kan. 282, 23 Pac. Rep. 569, followed.

2. A contract, entered into by a town company, incorporated "for the purchasing of lands, the surveying and platting of town-sites and selling town lots and other lands," in which it was agreed that if R. would remove a bank, barn, and restaurant located elsewhere to the town-site, the town company would convey to him certain lots in the town, and pay him the sum of $1,000, tends directly to enhance the value of the remaining property of the corporation, and is not necessarily ultra vires.

Error from district court, Sherman county; LOUIS K. PRATT, Judge.

Hardy & Stirling, for plaintiff in error.
J. W. Servis, for defendant in error.

JOHNSTON, J. The Sherman Center Town Company entered into a contract with C. P. Russell, in which it was agreed that if Russell would remove his bank, barn, and restaurant from Voltaire, and establish them in Sherman Center, the company would convey to him certain lots in the town of Sherman Center, and pay the sum of $1,000. There were other details included in the contract that it is unnecessary to mention. Russell brought an action against the company, alleging that he had fully performed the contract on his part, but that the company had failed to pay him the consideration named, and he asked for judgment for $1,000. The company allege and contend that the contract was not authorized by the board of directors, and that it had no authority under its charter to make the same. The main contentions of the company before this court are that the contract was ultra vires, and entered into without the authority of the directors of the company. The contract is executed in the name of the company, signed by its president and secretary, with the seal of the company attached. It appears that no formal resolution or order was made by the board of directors authorizing the president and secretary to execute the contract, but a majority of them lived at Sherman Center, and executed and carried out a great number of contracts of a like character. Means were furnished by the company to carry out the contracts thus made, and it received and enjoyed the benefits to be derived from the acts and agreements of the officers. The officers appear to be vested with authority to execute contracts and manage the business affairs of the corporation, and they acted openly and publicly as the agents of the company, with the knowledge and acquiescence of the directors. Under the authority of Town Co. v. Swigart, 48 Kan. 292, 23 Pac. Rep. 569, the company cannot escape liability on the contract on account of a want of authority from the company to the officers to make the same. See, also, University of Builders v. Martin, 39 Kan. 750, 18 Pac. Rep. 941. There is another claim, that the provision of the charter that "the indebtedness of the company shall not exceed $500 at any time" limits the powers of the corporation, and renders void the obligation to pay $1,000. This provision has been the subject of consideration by the court, and it was determined that it is to be regarded as a by-law of the company, directory only, and not such a provision as will annul the contract, where the corporation has enjoyed the benefits of the same. Town Co. v. Morris, 43 Kan. 282, 23 Pac. Rep. 569. The plaintiff in error also insists that the contract is not within the objects of the corporation, and is ultra vires. The town company was incorporated for "the purchasing of lands, the surveying and platting of town-sites, and selling town lots and other lands." The corporation may exercise not only the powers expressly enumerated in its charter, if they are authorized by law, but "may enter into any obligation or contract essential to the transaction of its ordinary affairs," and incidental to the exercise of the powers expressly enumerated. Gen. St. 1889, par. 1167. The company is not restricted to the mere purchase and sale of lots, but may doubtless enter into contracts which would directly tend to promote the prosperity of the town, and enhance the value of the lots remaining unsold. To this end they may expend money for the advertising of the property, the making of improvements on a part of the same, may contract for the erection of school buildings and other improvements, the direct and proximate tendency of which will be to attract people to the town, and make the property of the company more desirable and salable. The location of Russell, with his bank, his barn, and restaurant, at the town of Sherman Center no doubt tended directly and proximately to build up the town, and give it prestige in that community, thus enhancing the value of the remaining lots and promoting the legitimate objects of the corporation. In Whetstone v. Ottawa University, 18 Kan. 320, the question arose whether the Ottawa Town Company could donate the property of the corporation to the Ottawa University for the purpose of erecting a school-building outside of the limits of the town of Ottawa, and more than one-fourth of a mile outside of the limits of the property and the land owned by the town company. Justice BREWER, who pronounced the judgment of the court, remarked that "the town-site companies are neither novel nor rare in Kansas. Every county has been the home of several, and the manner of their working, and the means employed to accomplish their purposes, are familiar to us all. Nor is Kansas peculiar in this respect. Every western state is full of them. They are private corporations, organized for the purposes of gain. They take real estate, lay it off in lots and blocks, streets, and alleys, induce people to settle and purchase, and by the sale of lots make their profits. * * * If by the donation of one lot they can double the value of the remainder, is not the one lot used directly to accomplish the legitimate object of the corporation? If by donating one hundred lots to the county they can secure the county-seat and the erection of county buildings, are they not furthering the very purpose of building up a town? * * * The purpose of securing improvements on the town-site is not simply that the improvements be there, but that thereby the property the corporation has to sell may be enhanced in value; and, if the lots were donated to secure the erection of a hospital or school at a remote place, as suggested by counsel, there would be no resultant benefit to the corporation of enhanced value of its unsold lots. It seems to us that this must be the test: If the direct and proximate tendency of the improvements sought to be obtained by the donation is the building up of the town and the enhanced value of the remaining property of the corporation, the donation is not ultra vires." The discussion in that case furnishes a strong argument that the contract in question was within the powers of the corporation, and that the money expended to bring new buildings and establish new business enterprises in the town directly tended to accomplish the purposes of the corporation. We are of opinion that the contract was not ultra vires. But, even if it were not fully authorized, the company is hardly in a position to invoke the application of that doctrine. Russell had performed the contract on his part. His buildings and business have been removed to Sherman Center, and he has united with the town company in building up the town and in augmenting the value of the company's property. These considerations and advantages have been received by the company, and it continues to enjoy the benefits of the contract performed on its behalf by Russell. The company has joined with Russell in the execution of the contract, and officers of the company furnished men and machinery and assisted in moving the buildings. They executed conveyance to Russell for the lots which they agreed to convey to him, and he, acting in good faith, has done all that was required of him. After the transaction has been carried out, and the company has had the benefits of performance by Russell, they cannot in justice be allowed to repudiate the transaction, although it may have been in excess of authority. Town Co. v. Morris, supra; Mor. Priv. Corp. §§ 632, 634. Some other objections are made, which are not deemed to be material, and, on an examination of the entire record, we find no prejudicial error. The judgment of the district court will be affirmed. All the justices concurring.

SHERMAN CENTER TOWN CO. v. LEONARD.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. May 9, 1901.)

BREACH OF CONTRACT — MEASURE OF DAMAGES — EVIDENCE.

1. Where a party contracted with the owner to move his hotel from the town of I. to the town of S., and refused to carry out the contract, the prospective profit which the owner would have possibly gained if the building had been removed is not the measure of damages; but, upon the refusal of the contractor, it was the duty of the owner to have the hotel removed at once; and, where the contractor had been paid for the removal, the owner would ordinarily recover, as damages for the breach, only the necessary expenses of removing the building, and of avoiding the consequences of the other's wrong.

2. Where a party seeks redress for the wrong of another, the law requires that he shall do whatever he reasonably can, and improve all reasonable opportunities, to avoid the consequences and to lessen the injury.

3. Damages cannot be established by the statement of a witness giving in the lump the damages which he thinks the plaintiff has sustained. Town Co. v. Morris, 39 Kan. 377, 18 Pac. Rep. 230.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from district court, Sherman county; LOUIS K. PRATT, Judge.

Harley & Stirling, for plaintiff in error. John E. Bagley and J. W. Lewis, for defendant in error.

JOHNSTON, J. Thomas P. Leonard recovered a judgment for $600 against the Sherman Center Town Company as damage for the breach of a contract. Leonard owned a hotel in Itasca, and Sherman Center, which was three miles away, was a candidate for county-seat of Sherman county. The town company, desiring to increase the population and influence of Sherman Center and strengthen its candidacy, held out inducements to the citizens of the surrounding towns to remove their buildings and establish themselves in business in Sherman Center, and unite in an effort to make that town the county-seat of the county. Accordingly they entered into an agreement with Leonard by which Leonard was to join them in building up the town, and remove his hotel from Itasca, in consideration of which the company was to convey to him certain lots in Sherman Center, and provide at their own expense men and machinery to remove the hotel, and place it over a cellar of equal size, and on a foundation of a similar kind, as it was then resting upon in Itasca. The plaintiff alleged that the company had failed and refused to remove the hotel in accordance with the terms of the contract; that the other buildings which were then situated in Itasca have been removed to Sherman Center, and the town of Itasca has become depopulated, and the business of hotel-keeping of no value; and that the hotel now stands alone, with no town nearer to it than Sherman Center, which is nearly three miles distant. He further alleged that it was a large and well-furnished hotel, and that the cost of its construction and the furniture contained therein was about $4,500. It is alleged that the cost of removal would be about the sum of $800, and that he suffered damages by the refusal of the company to comply with the contract in the sum of $1,200. He therefore asked judgment for $2,000. The company by its answer denies the execution of the contract, or that it is authorized by its charter to enter into the contract alleged to have been made.

There are several errors assigned by the company, but only one of them requires attention. It appears that the company has conveyed the lots to Leonard, as stipulated in the contract, but the hotel has not been removed, and, according to plaintiff's testimony, the non-removal is owing to the refusal of the company to furnish the men and machinery for that purpose, although frequent demands have been made upon them. In the course of the trial the plaintiff testified that, by reason of the removal of the people and their buildings from other towns, Sherman Center became a flourishing place of several hundred people, where he could have profitably carried on the hotel business, but that the town of Itasca was practically abandoned, so that he is without business, and simply remains at the hotel to protect the goods and furniture therein. In order to prove the extent of his injury, the following question was asked and allowed by the court over the objection of the defendant: "State, as near as you can, what would have been your profits, or what your damages was, in other words, by reason of the non-fulfillment of this contract,—not moving your hotel and establishing your business at Sherman Center." Another question which was allowed, over objection, was: "State what the damage was by reason of them not moving your hotel to Sherman Center, as they agreed to, in money." He answered that the loss or profits would have been $150 a month, and that the total damage sustained by reason of not having the hotel located at Sherman Center, besides the cost of moving the building, was from $1,200 to $1,500, and that it would cost about $800 to move the building. The questions asked were objectionable, and the testimony given was inadmissible, upon two grounds: First, the questions were objectionable because they did not call for specific facts, but permitted the witness to state a mere opinion, giving in the lump the amount of damages thought to be sustained. It is the function of the court or jury trying the case to determine from evidence properly presented what the amount of damages sustained is, and, while it might be very convenient for the plaintiff to permit him and his witnesses to give the damages suffered in a lump, it would be a very unsafe practice to allow them to state the amount of damages supposed to be sustained, without regard to the facts or knowledge upon which their opinions were based. It is well settled that the practice is not permissible. Roberts v. Commissioners, 21 Kan. 248; Railroad Co. v. Kuhn, 38 Kan. 675, 17 Pac. Rep. 322; Town Co. v. Morris, 39 Kan. 377, 13 Pac. Rep. 230; Railway Co. v. Nelman, 45 Kan. —, ante, 22. Then, again, the prospective profits that he lost by the breach of the contract are too remote, uncertain, and speculative to be recoverable. Who can tell what the future gains of the hotel business would have been in Sherman Center, if he had moved there? His past profits in Itasca were not shown, and there is no testimony of the gains of others established in the same business at Sherman Center. How, then, does Leonard know that the profits would have been $150 per month? The gains to be derived from the business depended upon many contingencies other than the mere removal of his hotel to that place. The growth of the town; the location of the county-seat there or at another town near by; the immigration and travel; the competition in the hotel business; the price of provisions and the cost of help; the general reputation of the house; and the popularity of the landlord with the traveling public and the people of that community,—are suggested as some of the considerations that would affect the anticipated benefits. Where the breach of a contract results in the loss of definite profits, which are ascertainable, and were within the contemplation of the contracting parties, they may generally be recovered; but the prospective profits do not furnish the correct measure of damages in the present case. Aside from the remote, conjectural, and speculative character of the anticipated benefits, it cannot be said that the loss of them is the direct and unavoidable consequence of the breach. The plaintiff could not sit idle an indefinite length of time, and safely count on the recovery of $150 per month as damages. If there was a breach of the contract, it was his duty, upon learning of it, to at once remove the building, or employ others to do so, and charge the cost of the removal to the town company. The law requires that the injured party shall do whatever he reasonably can, and improve all reasonable opportunities to lessen the injury. From the testimony it appears that Leonard could have procured others to move the hotel; and in such a case the ordinary measure of damages is the cost of removal, and the reasonable expenses of avoiding the consequence of the defendant's wrong. Railway Co. v. Mihlman, 17 Kan. 224; Loker v. Damon, 17 Pick. 284; 1 Sedg. Dam. 165, and cases cited. Counsel for plaintiff in error say that no more than the cost of removal was allowed by the court; but the admission of the objectionable evidence, against the opposition of the plaintiff in error, would indicate that the court adopted an incorrect measure of damages, and did not limit the recovery to the expense of the removal. The liability of the plaintiff in error for any loss is not conceded. It is shown in the testimony that soon after the time for the removal of the building the people of Sherman Center abandoned the attempt to obtain the county-seat, and all or nearly all of them moved to another place. It is claimed by plaintiff in error that Leonard objected to the removal of his building until the question of the location of the county-seat was settled. He testified at the trial that he did not intend to move the building to Sherman Center, and that he would not move the building at all, until the county-seat was permanently located. If the non-removal of the building was due to the fault of Leonard, he is not entitled to recover anything. This is a disputed question of fact, which must be settled on another trial. For the error of the court in admitting testimony the judgment of the court below will be reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial. All the justices concurring.

WALKER V. STATE INS. CO.

APPLICATION FOR INSURANCE — PAROL EVIDENCE.

Where an application for insurance has been reduced to writing, and the applicant has had an opportunity to read the same, but signs it without reading it, and there is no fraud practiced, and the applicant afterwards receives the policy of insurance based upon such application, and retains it for several months without objection, he cannot, in an action brought upon a note given for the premium on such policy, vary or contradict the statements in the written application by parol evidence.

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Elk county; M. G. TROUP, Judge.

A. M. Jackson, for plaintiff in error.

Glasscock & Car and Thos. H. Bain, for defendant in error.

GREEN, C. This was an action on a promissory note executed on the 9th day of April, 1886, by Phillip Walker to the State Insurance Company, of Des Moines, Iowa, for $51.50, and due April 1, 1887, given in payment of the premium on an insurance policy. The case came on appeal to the district court of Elk county, where it was tried, and judgment was rendered in favor of the defendant in error. The defense sought to be made by the maker of the note was that there was a failure of consideration, and fraud and deceit practiced in the procurement of the note; that the insurance policy was to cover some stock which the defendant below had, but was not in fact included in the application for the policy; that the agents of the company had him sign the application which they had filled out, without reading it; that the policy did not insure the property which he requested the agents to have insured. It is claimed that the court erred in not permitting the defendant below to introduce evidence tending to contradict the application which he had signed. There is no question raised but what the policy was in accordance with the application. The defendant stated upon the trial that he took the application in his hands to read, but he was ashamed to say that he signed it without reading it, and his only excuse was that he did not have a desirable opportunity to read it. There is no pretense but what the defendant could have read the application before he attached his signature to it, if he had desired to do so. The application itself cautioned him to read it before signing it, to see that each question was fully and truthfully answered. There was no fraud shown in the procurement of the application, and the statement of counsel is not borne out by the record that the consideration of the note had wholly failed. It was in evidence that the defendant received his policy, and retained it for some months before he made any objection to it. On the 31st day of January, 1887, he wrote to the company about having his policy canceled, but said nothing about the fraud practiced upon him by the agents; and again, on February 7, 1887, he wrote the company that he would pay short rates on his policy, and to figure it up so he could obtain a cancellation. This was a recognition of the policy, and showed some consideration for the note. The court properly excluded the evidence by which it was attempted to vary and contradict the statements of the written application. We recommend an affirmance of the judgment.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

STEWART v. BODLEY.

SUMMONS FROM JUSTICE'S COURT—SERVICE OF DEFECTIVE COPY—VALIDITY OF JUDGMENT.

Where a summons is issued by a justice of the peace, and served by a constable by leaving, at the usual place of residence of the defendant, a paper which is a copy of the original summons, with the exception that the name of the constable is signed to the copy in the place of the name of the justice of the peace, but the indorsement upon the copy contains the name of the justice issuing the same, held, that such mistake in the copy of the summons does not render a judgment entered upon such service void, but only voidable.

(Syllabus by Green, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Harper county; J. T. HERRICK, Judge.

Shepard, Grove & Shepard, for plaintiff in error. George E. McMahan, for defendant in error.

GREEN, C. On the 21st day of May, 1886, William M. Duncan sued E. J. Stewart, before A. R. BLACKBURN, a justice of the peace of Harper county, to recover the sum of $58 for services rendered. The justice of the peace issued a summons which was regular upon its face, and delivered it to C. M. Bodley, a constable. The summons was returned with the indorsement that service had been made by copy left at the residence of the defendant. On the return-day the defendant made no appearance, and judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the amount claimed. On the following day an execution was issued on said judgment and delivered to Bodley, as constable, which was levied upon the property in controversy in this action. On the 12th of June the plaintiff in error brought an action in replevin against Bodley and Stewart to recover the property taken on execution. The defendants in this replevin suit gave a redelivery bond, retained possession of the property, and it was sold under the execution. This replevin action was never tried, but was continued from term to term until June, 1887, when it was dismissed by the plaintiff without prejudice. This action was commenced in the district court of Harper county on the 19th day of July, 1887, to recover the value of the property sold upon execution by Bodley as constable. The defendant answered, and set up three defenses: First, a general denial; second, justification under the execution; and, third, the replevin action. The plaintiff demurred to the third ground, which was sustained by the court. The plaintiff then filed a reply to the second defense, denying the judgment, and alleged that Bodley did not serve a copy of the summons upon the plaintiff, but made a false return; that the copy left at the residence of Stewart was signed by C. M. Bodley, justice of the peace; and that no appearance was made by Stewart. It was further alleged that Bodley knew that said return was false. The case was tried by the court, and resulted in a finding and judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiff brings the case here for review.

The assignment of error is that the court should not have overruled the plaintiff's demurrer to the evidence of the defendant, and this raises the question as to whether or not the judgment rendered in the case of Duncan v. Stewart, before A. R. BLACKBURN, justice of the peace, was void. This is the main question in the case. If the judgment was rendered without service it was void. To determine the question of service we must consider what was left at the usual place of residence of the defendant. The summons issued by the justice of the peace was regular. The copy served was signed by the constable, instead of the justice of the peace. It was addressed to Bodley, as constable, and contained the indorsement that, if the defendant failed to appear, judgment would be taken for the sum of $58, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from the 21st day of May, 1886, and costs of suit, and signed by A. R. Blackburn, justice of the peace. It could be seen at a glance that Bodley could not have been the justice of the peace and constable too; that his signature to the copy must have been a clerical error. The defendant served lived in the same township where the officers resided, and would be presumed to know who they were; and the fact that the name of the justice of the peace did appear in one place upon the copy, and that the process was addressed to Bodley, was sufficient to inform him that he had been sued. There is no question but what the service would have been set aside if a motion had been made for that purpose; but we are not prepared to say that the judgment was absolutely void, but might have been set aside in a direct proceeding. We conclude, therefore, that the service made upon E. J. Stewart in the original suit was only voidable, and not void. See Rassett v. Mitchell, 40 Kan. 549, 20 Pac. Rep. 192; Friend v. Green, 43 Kan. 167, 23 Pac. Rep. 93. Holding, as we do, that the judgment rendered in favor of Duncan and against Stewart was not void, but only voidable, there was no error in the trial of this action in the court below, and we therefore recommend an affirmance of the judgment.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

COATES V. SULAU.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. May 9, 1891.)

IMPEACHMENT OF WITNESS—GENERAL REPUTATION.

1. Where the answers of impeaching witnesses show that they understood the questions in a general sense, and the answers also show that they relate to the general reputation of the witness sought to be impeached, the omission of the word "general" from the question will not render the evidence of such witnesses incompetent.

2. Where a witness sought to be impeached has within a few months changed his residence from one state to another it is not error to permit witnesses, who knew him a long time in his former place of residence, to testify as to his reputation for truth and veracity there.

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Wyandotte county; O. L. MILLER, Judge.

J. W. Jenkins, for plaintiff in error. C. F. Mussey, Jr., and Wm. H. Pope, for defendant in error.

STRANG, C. This was an action on a promissory note for $131, alleged to have been given by the defendant below to the plaintiff below in final settlement of a contract for building a house. Action was begun before a justice of the peace. Defendant admitted the giving of the note, but claimed it was not given on final settlement of said contract, but was given before any settlement was had upon said contract, for the purpose of making a payment on said contract. And the defendant below further claimed that when he came to look over his receipts for money paid on said contract, together with some offsets he had against it, he found he had overpaid the plaintiff, including the note sued on, in the sum of $21.50, and that the plaintiff below actually owed him, over and above the amount of the note sued on, the said sum of $21.50. Judgment was rendered by the justice in favor of the defendant below for the sum of $21.50 and costs. Plaintiff appealed to the district court, where the case was tried by the court and a jury, resulting in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff below for the amount of his note, $138.20. Motion for new trial was overruled. Coates brings the case here for review.

The plaintiff in error first complains of the character of the impeaching testimony offered by the plaintiff below, and received in evidence in the case over his objection. He asserts that such evidence was not competent; the question put to the impeaching witnesses did not call for the general reputation of the defendant below as to truth and veracity. The question would have been better if the word "general" had been used in framing it, but the answers show that each of the several witnesses understood the question as calling for the general reputation of the defendant below. The answers of the several witnesses were much alike, except that some of them added that in a matter in which Coates had a pecuniary interest they would not believe him under oath. Each of the witnesses answered substantially as follows: "I am well acquainted with Coates' reputation in this community for truth and veracity." They speak of his reputation in the community. That means in the whole community, and is as general as reputation can be. "Reputation" is what is said of one. "General reputation" is what is said of one by the people in general in the neighborhood or community where he resides, and where, therefore, the people are acquainted with him. We think the evidence sufficiently general in its character. Where the answers show the questions are understood in a general sense by the witnesses, and the answers themselves are sufficiently general, the fact that the word "general" is omitted in framing the question will not render the evidence incompetent.

The plaintiff also alleges that impeaching evidence must be confined to the present character of the witness. Coates lived for many years in Cummins ville, which is now the Twenty-Fifth ward of Cincinnati, Ohio. He left there, and came to Kansas City, Kan., and at the time of the trial had lived there a few months,—less than a year. The evidence complained of was as to his reputation at his old home in Cincinnati; and it is objected that it was incompetent, for the reason that such evidence must be confined to the present character of the witness; and it is alleged that Coates had no present character at Cincinnati, because he left there several months before. We do not think this position of the plaintiff tenable. The evidence related to Coates' character in the community and among the people where he had lived a long time, and from whom he had been absent but a few months. He had not lived in Kansas City long enough to have a reputation there; and, if such evidence is needed, we think it proper to seek it from among his old neighbors, among whom he had lived until recently before the trial. If it could not be got there it could not be got anywhere until he had lived in a new community long enough to have a reputation there. The fact that a person has moved away from a community in which he has lived a long time, when his change of residence is recent, does not render the evidence of his old neighbors as to his reputation incompetent. There is no arbitrary, iron-clad rule in relation to such evidence. It must depend largely upon the circumstances of the particular case. Sometimes it may be sought some distance away both in point of time and space. The plaintiff also says such evidence must be confined to the reputation of the witness "in the neighborhood,—his reputation among his neighbors." That is exactly what was done in this case. The impeaching witnesses all lived in the same neighborhood in which Coates lived for years before moving to Kansas. We do not think any substantial error was committed in the admission of the impeaching testimony. The jury would have been justified in returning the verdict they did without any of the impeaching testimony. It is true Coates says he did not owe the note; "that at the time he executed it, he supposed he owed Sulau the money, but that when he got home and looked up his receipts he found he did not." This was in Cincinnati. And yet when the first note came due it went to protest, and afterwards he made the note sued on to take up the first. After he came to Kansas he wrote back, acknowledging the debt, and promising to pay it. These facts are so inconsistent with the claim that he did not owe the note that the jury were justified in rendering a verdict against him for the amount of the note on his own evidence, taken in connection with his former acts relating to the transaction. Complaint is made of the admission of the evidence of A. G. Cutler and Charles Stork, who testified in explanation of the written plans and specifications,—a part of the building contract. They gave no evidence by way of contradiction of anything in the plans and specifications. Their evidence was simply explanatory of the plans and specifications, and was exactly the same kind of evidence that was introduced by the defendant below by the witness Martin. That the plans and specifications were ambiguous, and were subject to explanation, is manifest from the fact that the witness Martin finally admitted he could not tell from them how many gables were contemplated thereby. We see no error in connection with

SIMPSON v. CITY OF KANSAS CITY et al.

CITIES — OPENING STREETS — ASSESSMENTS — LOTS AND BLOCKS.

Where a petition for opening and grading a portion of a street is presented to the mayor and city council of a city of the first class, under the proviso to section 4 of chapter 99 of the Laws of 1887, and all the necessary steps are taken to have said street opened and graded, the mayor and city council may assess and apportion the cost of such improvement against the lots and parcels of land abutting on the improved portion of said street, and said assessment may be made on each block separately, as a taxing district.

ON REHEARING.

1. Where the charter of a city provides that the streets may be graded at the expense of the abutting land-owners, and the mayor and council are given power, in the language of the proviso to section 4, c. 99, Sess. Laws 1887, (paragraph 557, Gen. St. 1889,) "to assess the cost of such improvement against the lots and parcels of land abutting on such streets so improved," the whole length of the street embraced in the petition of a majority of the resident property owners and improved is one taxing district, and the part so improved is not to be divided into blocks, and each block made liable for the improvement in front thereof.

2. Section 14, c. 63, Sess. Laws 1886, (paragraph 1077, Gen. St. 1889,) concerning the grading of streets, avenues, and alleys in consolidated cities, is repealed by section 4, c. 99, Sess. Laws 1887, (paragraph 557, Gen. St. 1889.)

Alden & McGrew, for plaintiff in error.
L. W. Keplinger, for defendant in error.

GREEN, C. On the 10th day of July, 1889, a petition signed by a majority of the resident property owners of a majority of the front feet on that portion of Reynolds avenue between Fifth and Tenth streets, in the city of Kansas City, was presented to the council of said city, asking to have said avenue opened and graded, at the cost of the owners of the land fronting upon that portion of said avenue between Fifth and Tenth streets, as provided in section 4, c. 99, Laws 1887. This petition was by the mayor and council ordered spread upon the journal, and on August 6, 1889, the mayor and city council passed an ordinance providing for the grading of Reynolds avenue between Fifth and Tenth streets. Section 1 of said ordinance provides "that in pursuance of a petition of a majority of the resident property owners of a majority of the front feet abutting on Reynolds avenue between Fifth street and Tenth street, which petition was by a majority of the council-elect, on the 30th day of July, 1889, ordered spread upon the journal of said council, it is hereby declared necessary to grade said Reynolds avenue between Fifth street and Tenth street the full width of said avenue, and said grading is hereby ordered to be done; the cost thereof to be assessed against the lots and parcels of land abutting on such avenue so improved." This ordinance was duly approved and published; and afterwards, in pursuance of the petition and ordinance mentioned, said city caused Reynolds avenue to be graded between Fifth street and Tenth street. After the completion of the grade, and for the purpose of making assessments for the cost thereof against the lots and parcels of land abutting on such street improved, the mayor and city council appointed three disinterested appraisers to assess the value of all the lots and pieces of land abutting on the avenue between the limits named, and the lots and pieces of land were appraised, and report made to the mayor and council of the value and of the appraisalment, which was accepted and approved by the mayor and council, and adopted as a basis for apportioning and assessing the cost of said improvements against the lots and parcels of land abutting on that portion of the avenue so improved. It is claimed upon the part of the plaintiff in error that in making the apportionment of the cost of grading the mayor and city council wrongfully and unlawfully apportioned and assessed against the lands of said plaintiff the sum of $6,034.86, being $3,173.49 in excess of the amount that should have been assessed thereon. The plaintiff in error tendered payment of the amount of $2,862.37, which it is claimed is all the plaintiff in error's property was chargeable with. This was refused, and the plaintiff brought this action in the district court of Wyandotte county to restrain the defendants from proceeding to collect the additional amount assessed against said land. Application was made for a temporary injunction, which was refused. To reverse the judgment of the court below, the plaintiff files a petition in error in this court.

It is claimed upon the part of the plaintiff in error that the assessments for the cost of grading this portion of Reynolds avenue should have been made upon all the lots and parcels of land abutting upon said avenue so improved, as indicated in the proviso in section 4 of chapter 99 of the Session Laws of 1887, and that under this proviso the whole street improved was the taxing district. The real question for our determination in this case is the proper method of apportioning special assessments for opening and grading streets in cities of the first class, organized in the first instance under chapter 63 of the Session Laws of 1886. The petition presented to the mayor and city council asked that this portion of Reynolds avenue be opened and graded as provided in section 4, c. 99, Laws 1887, being "An act to incorporate and regulate cities of the first class, and to repeal all prior acts," approved March 5, 1887. We shall assume that under this petition the owners of the real estate abutting on Reynolds avenue between Fifth and Tenth streets asked that this portion of said avenue be opened and graded in accordance with the authority conferred in said section 4, that the petition was valid, and that all the jurisdictional and initiatory steps were taken by the city government to confer the necessary jurisdiction in order to have the improvements made as prayed for. Was the city council authorized to make the assessments for such improvements upon each block as a separate taxing district, or should the assessments have been made, as contended for by the plaintiff in error, upon that portion of the street improved, as a taxing district? To arrive at the true intent and meaning of this law,—which, we must confess, is somewhat obscure,—we may be permitted to go back of the proviso to the body of the section for a fair interpretation of the section as an entirety. The first clause of the section provides: "For opening, widening, extending and grading any street, lane, alley, or avenue, and for doing all excavating and grading necessary for the same, and for all improvements of the squares and areas formed by the crossing of streets, and for building culverts, bridges, viaducts, and all crossings of streets, alleys, and avenues, the cost or contract price thereof shall be paid out of the general improvement fund, except as otherwise provided by law; and for all paving, macadamizing, curbing, and guttering of the streets and alleys the assessments shall be made for the full cost thereof on each block separately." The proviso reads: "That in case a petition of a majority of the resident property owners of a majority of the front feet on any street, or part thereof, shall petition the mayor and council to grade any street, and to grade and pave the intersections thereof, at the cost of the owners of the lands fronting upon the street described in the petition, and if such petition shall be ordered spread upon the journal of the council by a majority of the council-elect, the mayor and council shall thereafter have power to assess the cost of such improvement against the lots and parcels of land abutting on such street so improved abutting property." Now, an improvement made under this proviso necessarily contemplates some paving. It says, "shall petition the mayor and council to grade any street, and to grade and pave the intersections thereof, at the cost of the owners," etc. Is it not intended that the street may be paved, also, under the authority of this proviso? Why should the intersections be paved, and not the balance of the street? This proviso gives the mayor and council power to assess the cost of such improvements. What improvements? Necessarily, grading any street, and grading and paving the intersections thereof, which, under the authority of this section, may be assessed upon each block separately, as a taxing district. We think this proviso is susceptible of this interpretation. But conceding that the method of the assessment is not plainly marked out and defined, would not the mayor and city council be authorized to adopt such a method, in making the assessment for the improvements prayed for, as would be fair, just, and equitable to all? Judge Dillon, in his work on Municipal Corporations, (section 94,) says: "Power to do an act is often conferred upon municipal corporations in general terms, without being accompanied by any prescribed mode of exercising it. In such cases the common council or governing body necessarily have, to a greater or less extent, a discretion as to the manner in which the power shall be used. This discretion cannot be judicially interfered with or questioned, except where the power is exceeded, or fraud is imputed and shown, or there is a manifest invasion of private rights. Thus, where the law or charter confers upon the city council or local legislature power to determine upon the expediency or necessity of measures relating to the local government, their judgment upon matters thus committed to them, while acting within the scope of their authority, cannot be controlled by the courts. In such case the decision of the proper corporate officers is, in the absence of fraud, final and conclusive, unless they transcend their powers. Thus, for example, if a city has power to grade streets, the courts will not inquire into the necessity of the exercise of it, or the refusal to exercise it, nor whether a particular grade adopted, or a particular mode of executing the grade, is judicious." Express Co. v. St. Joseph, 66 Mo. 680; Farrar v. City of St. Louis, 80 Mo. 393; Gilmore v. Hentig, 83 Kan. 156, 5 Pac. Rep. 781. A city has large discretion as to the opening, grading, and repairing of streets, in respect to the time, manner, and cost of the same. In the exercise of such power, it will not be controlled by the courts, unless there is great abuse, operating oppressively upon individuals. Bush v. City of Carbondale, 78 Ill. 74. A city intrusted with power to make improvements must be allowed some discretion in the manner of making them, unless it appears from the charter power that a particular method has been prescribed. The rule is well settled that where a municipality is clothed with certain powers, and is not confined to a particular method, but has the discretion and the choice of methods, a plain case of abuse must be shown, to warrant an injunction against the corporation. Page v. City of St. Louis, 20 Mo. 136. No such abuse is shown in this case. The original act, under which this city was organized, expressly authorized this method of special assessments; and, as indicated, we are of the opinion that the section under consideration permitted the very method adopted by the city government, and we cannot say that it is unjust, or that the power has been abused in any manner.

Taking the whole section together, we think the mayor and city council had the authority to make the special assessments in the manner ordered; that the court below committed no error in refusing to grant the preliminary injunction; and we would recommend that the judgment be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

ON REHEARING.

SIMPSON, C. A motion for a rehearing was filed in this case, that among other causes assigned for a reversal of the judgment below alleges the following: "It had escaped the attention of the court and counsel for plaintiff in error, until after the argument, that the amendment contained in the Laws of 1887 was borrowed from a state whose supreme court has construed it at least twice, as claimed by counsel for plaintiff in error." It is also claimed "that the court inadvertently applied the principle of construction and power of legislative bodies as set forth in Farrar v. City of St. Louis, 80 Mo. 393, and cases referred to, while it will be apparent on a reconsideration that the court of the state from which the rule was borrowed shows that the rule of apportionment—the front foot—is provided by the law, and any change by the council makes the proceedings null and void." Again, it is urged "that the court inadvertently overlooked the fact that the proviso and amendment of 1887, providing for grading on a petition, is to be construed independently, or as modifying all the previous laws on the same subject, as this court has decided in another case." The petition for the grading of Reynolds avenue from Fifth street to Tenth street asked that the grading be done as provided in section 4 of the act of the legislature entitled "An act to amend sections eight, nine, eleven, thirteen, fourteen, etc., of an act entitled 'An act to incorporate and regulate cities of the first class, and to repeal all prior acts,' etc., approved March 5, 1887." It was stipulated and admitted on the hearing below that the defendant city was formed by the consolidation of the former cities of Wyandotte, Kansas City, Kansas, and Armourdale, in April, 1886, under the provisions of an act of the legislature of the state of Kansas entitled "An act to provide for the consolidation of cities," approved February 11, 1886, and an act amendatory thereto, approved February 18, 1886. This petition to grade the street was filed in July, 1889; and at that time section 13, or paragraph 557, Gen. St. 1889, was in force, and read as follows: "Sec. 13. For opening, widening, extending, and grading any street, lane, alley, or avenue, and for doing all excavating and grading necessary for the same, and for all improvements of the squares and areas formed by the crossing of streets, and for building culverts, bridges, viaducts, and all crossings of streets, alleys, and avenues, the cost or contract price thereof shall be paid out of the general improvement fund, except as otherwise provided by law; and for all paving, macadamizing, curbing, and guttering of the streets and alleys the assessments shall be made for the full cost thereof on each block separately; on all lots and pieces of ground to the center of the block on either side of such street or avenue, the distance improved or to be improved, or on the lots or pieces of ground abutting on such alley, according to the assessed value of the lots or pieces of ground, without regard to the buildings or improvements thereon, which value shall be ascertained by three disinterested appraisers appointed by the mayor and council. It shall be the duty of said appraisers, within ten days after being notified of their appointment, to proceed to appraise such lots and pieces of land as may be designated by the council, after having taken and subscribed an oath to make a true and impartial appraisal, which appraisal shall be returned to the city council at its first meeting after the same shall have been completed. When said appraisal is returned, the mayor and council shall appoint a time for holding a special session, on some day to be fixed by them, to hear any complaint that may be made as to the valuation of any lot or piece of ground appraised as aforesaid, a notice of which special session shall be given by the mayor in the official paper of the city; and said mayor and council, at said special session, shall alter the valuation of any lot or piece of ground, if in their opinion the same has been appraised too high or too low; provided, that in case a petition of a majority of the resident property owners of a majority of the front feet on any street, or part thereof, shall petition the mayor and council to grade any street, and to grade and pave the intersections thereof, at the cost of the owners of the lands fronting upon the street described in the petition, and if such petition shall be ordered spread upon the journal of the council by a majority of the council-elect, the mayor and council shall thereafter have power to assess the cost of such improvements against the lots and parcels of land abutting on such street so improved abutting property." Paragraph 1077 was also, it is claimed, in force, and it reads as follows: "The grading of all streets, avenues, and alleys in said consolidated city, after such consolidation, shall be borne by the property abutting thereon, and the assessments for the payment thereof shall be made on each block separately, in the same manner and with like effect as is provided by the law governing cities of the first class for paving, macadamizing, curbing, and guttering the streets."

It is claimed by the city that the assessments for the grading were made under paragraph 1077, as this was a consolidated city; while it is claimed by the plaintiff in error that these assessments must be governed by the proviso contained in paragraph 557. The opinion heretofore rendered affirmed the judgment below by a construction of the proviso to paragraph 557, Gen. St. 1889; the theory of the decision being that the proviso did not expressly state a rule for apportionment, and, the one adopted being fair, just, and equitable, the court would not interfere. Under the authorities cited by counsel for plaintiff in error, we have serious doubts as to this proposition, and are strongly inclined to the belief that the proviso does fix a rule of apportionment. In the case of City of Lexington v. McQuillan's Heirs, 9 Dana, 513, the charter of the city gave the mayor and council authority to grade and macadamize streets and alleys of said city at the cost and expense of the lot-owners fronting such streets or alleys, and they shall apportion the cost and expense of grading and macadamizing equally on the lot-holders. In the year 1836 the council graded and macadamized Main street, from the intersection of High to Maxwell streets, and distributed the cost thereof among the owners of lots on each of the squares opposite to and adjoining the improvement thus made. McQuillan's heirs being owners of a lot on the corner of Main and High streets, the city council assessed against them, as their portion of the cost of the work, the sum of $509.92, that being one-half the amount charged for grading and paving opposite to their ground. This sum greatly exceeded the proportionate cost of the entire work done opposite to the lots of ground, respectively, in the same square, in consequence of a deep cut and a stone-wall made opposite to the lot of McQuillan's heirs, and they resisted the payment of the amount so assessed against them. One of the questions discussed in the opinion is as to the rule of apportionment, and the court, by Chief Justice ROBERTSON, say: "It is manifest that this section of the charter prescribes a distribution of the entire cost of grading and paving a street to the whole extent of the square among the owners of the ground in that square, according to some principle of equity, and that it did not intend to authorize the exaction from any such proprietor of the cost of construction opposite to and co-extensive with the front of his lot, when the cost of that portion of the work had exceeded the average charge upon the whole square. And it seems to us, also, that the rule of equality prescribed by the legislature is the territorial extent, and not the value, of each lot of ground. This is the test of the authority given to a portion of the owners of the grounds in any one square to renovation of the street and sidewalks opposite such square at the cost of all the owners of ground in it. Had the ad valorem principle been adopted, the owner of a comparatively small piece of ground, expensively improved, might control the other owners of ground in the same square, and impose on the majority a heavy burden against their consent, and possibly against their interest. And as the extent of each proprietor's front on the street is the criterion of authority given to a part of them to control the whole, and impose a common burden, it is altogether reasonable to infer that the aggregate responsibility should be, and was intended to be, distributed according to the same principle. Then, as the amount assessed against McQuillan's heirs is admitted to be much greater than their portion of the cost of the work opposite the whole square distributed among the several owners of the ground therein, according to the rule prescribed by the statute, the circuit judge did not err in enjoining the coercive collection of the assessment as thus illegally made." This is equivalent to saying that under the section of the charter the whole square is a taxing district, and the legal mode of assessment is to ascertain the cost of the improvement of the square, and apportion that cost equally to the lot-owners in proportion to the frontage of their respective lots on the square.

In the case of City of Louisville v. Hyatt, 2 B. Mon. 177, it appears that section 9 of the charter of that city is the same as section 11 of the charter of the city of Lexington, construed in the case cited from 9 Dana. It is said in the Louisville case, in reference to that section, "that, in distributing the burden of the entire cost of improvement, each lot-holder on the square divided by the graded street should be required to pay, not one-half the cost of the grade opposite his ground, but his adequate portion of the whole cost, estimated according to the relative extent of his lot on the street."

In the case of State v. City of Portage, 12 Wis. 562, it will be seen that the charter of the city provided that, upon the application of two-thirds of the owners of lots on a street, the council shall have power to have such street graded, and, for the purpose of defraying the cost, to levy and collect a special tax on the lots abutting on such street in proportion to the size or front of such lots, respectively. The city passed an ordinance requiring a certain street to be graded, and directed that each lot should be charged with the work done in front thereof. This ordinance the court held void, as being repugnant to the charter: Paine, J., saying: "That all that part of the ordinance which provided that each lot or part of a lot should be chargeable with all the work done in front of it is repugnant to the provisions of the charter on that subject can admit of no question. The charter evidently requires that, when any street is ordered to be graded, the section so ordered to be improved shall, for the purposes of taxation, be treated as a whole, and that, when the whole amount of tax to be raised for that work is ascertained, it shall be equalized and divided among the various lots chargeable therefor, according to their front or size. This, it is obvious, is an entirely different principle of assessment from that which charges each lot with the entire expense of the improvement in front of it, and seems to avoid much of the inequality and injustice of the latter system. But it is the latter which is provided for in the ordinance under which the contract is let, and that part of it is of course void."

The cases of Williams v. Mayor, 2 Mich. 560, and Woodbridge v. City of Detroit, 8 Mich. 274, construing provisions in the charter of the city of Detroit similar to the proviso we are now considering, apart from their value as to the necessity of a just and reasonable rule for the apportionment of the cost of a public improvement, will be found in their general trend in harmony with the cases we have already cited. The general rule deduced from these earlier cases is that, where the grading of a street is to be paid for by the owners of lots abutting on the improved street, the whole length of the street so graded is to be considered as one taxing district, and the individual owner of a lot or lots so abutting is required to pay his fair proportion of the cost of the grading along the whole line of street improved; not the cost of grading of his lot or lots, or of the block in which his lot or lots may be situate, but his proportionate part of the cost of grading the entire distance improved. This principle was distinctly recognized by this court in the case of Parker v. Challis, 9 Kan. 107. The charter of the city of Atchison expressly provided that the city council should have power to make sidewalks, and, "for making and repairing sidewalks, the assessments shall be made on all lots or pieces of ground abutting on the improvement according to the front foot thereof." In January, 1869, the city council by ordinance required the owners of lots on 17 different streets to build sidewalks. Challis owned seven lots in a block fronting on Kansas avenue in said city. He resisted the collection of the special assessment made for the construction of the sidewalk in front of his lots, principally on the ground "that the city had no authority to make assessments for buildings sidewalks on said various streets upon all the lots on said streets fronting on said sidewalks; the power existing only to assess lots on each street for the sidewalks built thereon;" and this was the finding and judgment of the district court of Atchison county. It will be seen from this statement that the question was whether the whole distance of all the streets ordered to be improved was the taxing district, or whether each street was a separate and distinct taxing district. Among the facts shown on the trial below was that some of the streets on which sidewalks were ordered to be built were not graded, and that portions of said sidewalk, by reason of the uneven condition of the streets, were necessarily built on posts, in some cases five feet high. On error to this court it was said by Brewer, J.: "The power to make sidewalks is here given absolutely and without limitation. When and upon what streets they shall be made is committed to the discretion of the mayor and council. This discretion is not limited to a single street. They may sidewalk the whole city at once, and by a single contract. But the right to assess the lots fronting on the improvement to pay for the same is co-extensive with the power to make it. True, as urged, a sidewalk on one street may cost more than a sidewalk on another street, and, if both be united in one contract and one assessment, the owner of a lot on the latter street may have to pay more than if his street only was side-walked; but the same is true not only of two streets, but also of two blocks on the same street, or of two lots in the same block. Still, there is no injustice in apportioning the entire cost of a sidewalk upon the several lots fronting it. The value of a sidewalk depends greatly upon its extent. * * * It seems to the writer of this opinion that this case is a clear recognition of the principle that where the charter of a city provides that the streets may be graded at the expense of the abutting land-owners, and the council is given power, in the language of the proviso to section 4, c. 99, Laws 1887, "to assess the costs of such improvement against the lots and parcels of land abutting on such street so improved," the whole length of the street so improved is one taxing district, and that it is not to be divided into blocks, and each block made liable for the improvement in front thereof.

In the case of City of Lawrence v. Killam, 11 Kan. 499, it was conceded in the briefs of counsel for both sides "that the statute does not charge the property with the cost of building the walk in front of the lots, but the entire improvement—all the walk directed to be built—is to be assessed to the abutting property according to the front foot thereof;" and with this concession the question was whether the assessment was illegal because it did not average a wide walk with a narrow one.

The case of Hines v. City of Leavenworth, 3 Kan. 186, is instructive because of the change in the rule of apportionment during the progress of the improvement. In June, 1863, the city passed an ordinance providing for the improvement of streets, the third section of which provided: "For the purpose of making such improvements, a special tax shall be levied and collected upon adjacent real estate, extending to the center of the block on either side of the improvements." While the work was in progress, the legislature passed an act amending the act incorporating cities, by which several methods were prescribed for levying taxes for the improvement of streets, and, among others, a levy according to the area of the abutting property, and providing that this method shall apply to improvements now being made. The city passed an ordinance in pursuance to the amended charter. The city engineer made another assessment of the cost of the work according to the area of the lots. Hines et al. attacked the validity of the assessments, they being owners of lots abutting on the improved streets, on the ground that the law under which the assessment was made was not applicable; that the law was unconstitutional, in that the rate of assessment authorized was not equal and uniform. The court, after affirming the constitutionality of the amended act, and declaring its application to the improvements then in progress, says: "The cost of the improvement must be assessed against the adjacent property. The charge must extend back to the middle of the block. It must be levied in one of three prescribed ways, and in proportion to the cost of the whole improvement." This is the only equitable construction that can be given to the statute under consideration. Special assessments are made upon the assumption that a portion of the community is to be specially and peculiarly benefited in the enhancement of property peculiarly situated as regards the contemplated expenditure. Cooley, Tax'n, 606.

The principle is that "when certain persons are so placed as to have a common interest among themselves, but in common with the rest of the community, laws may be justly made providing that under suitable and equitable regulations those common interests shall be managed so those who enjoy the benefits shall equally bear the burden." Shaw, C. J., in Wright v. Boston, 9 Cush. 233. In Palmer v. Stumph, 29 Ind. 329, an assessment is spoken of as "being the adjustment of the shares of a contribution to be made by several towards a common object, according to the benefit received." In this state assessments by benefits are made by appraisers, who value the property included in the district to be improved, and apportion the cost thereof in proportion to such valuation. This is a legislative requirement, and in the opinion of Judge Cooley in his work on Taxation is the most equal and just method. The legislature must determine over what territory the benefits must be diffused, because this is an undoubted and necessary power pertaining to all matters of taxation. The whole subject of taxing districts belongs to the legislature. Cooley, Tax'n, 640. See, especially, the case of Sinton v. Ashbury, 41 Cal. 525. Property can only be assessed for local improvement on the principle of benefits received by the property from the construction of the work, and the benefits must be imposed on the property proportionately. Crawford v. People, 82 Ill. 557. It is equally within the power of the legislature to prescribe one district over which the whole cost of the improvement shall be spread, or to make separate districts for the improvement along the several blocks, (Creighton v. Scott, 14 Ohio St. 438;) but when once prescribed the levy must embrace all the property within the district, and to omit any would defeat the rule of apportionment, (Hassan v. Rochester, 67 N. Y. 528; In re Churchill, 82 N. Y. 288; People v. McCune, 57 Cal. 153.) Whatever rule of apportionment is adopted, it must be just and equitable; and this is a question for the courts. Judge Dillon, in his work on Municipal Corporations, states that there has been a diversity of opinion in the courts as to whether a law compelling owners of lots to pay the entire cost of the improvement in front of their lots, instead of their proportion of the cost of the entire work, is constitutional; but the later adjudications seem to be that, where this rule is expressly commanded by the statute, it will be upheld. The learned author further says "that in his judgment the one right in principle, and most just in its practical workings, is that "the assessment be made upon all the property specially benefited by the particular improvement, according to the exceptional benefit each lot or parcel of property actually and separately receives." Page 934, § 761, subsec. 5. This is the sole object of our statute requiring each and every lot or parcel of ground to be appraised, excluding improvements thereon, so that each naked lot can bear its proper proportion of the cost made in improving the block in which it is situated, or the entire distance on the street improved. These cases establish the rule that, when the legislature establishes the extent of the taxing district, it cannot be lessened or divided by the council, but that body must act in strict compliance with the terms of the power delegated. If, under this proviso, the extent of the improved street is the taxing district, the council must not depart therefrom, and say that each block must be separately taxed for the improvement made in its front, as that is establishing a different rule for the apportionment of the cost of the work.

From these decisions it inevitably follows that, without some express legislative sanction, the true rule is that the whole property to be improved constitutes a single taxing district, and the owner of a lot abutting on the improved street is required to pay that portion of the cost of the improvement that the valuation of his lot bears to the valuation of all the lots or parcels of ground subject to assessment in the taxing district. This rule is changed by the legislature in respect to paving, macadamizing, curbing, and guttering streets in cities of the first class, and each block separately made a taxing district for these purposes; but, as we think, the rule applies to the proviso we are considering. An examination of section 4, c. 99, Laws 1887, will disclose that the first eight lines of the section provides for opening, widening, extending, and grading streets, and for other improvements, and for doing the work thereof, and that the cost thereof shall be paid out of the general improvement fund, except as otherwise provided by law. And then follows the provision that for all paving, macadamizing, curbing, and guttering of streets and alleys the assessments shall be made for the full cost thereof on each block separately. Then follows provisions for appraisalment, and notice, and hearing complaints of the appraisalment. Then comes this proviso: "That in case a petition of a majority of the resident property owners or a majority of the front feet on any street, or part thereof, shall petition the mayor and council to grade the street at the cost of the owners of land fronting on the street described in the petition, and if such petition be ordered spread upon the journal of the council-elect, the mayor and council shall thereafter have power to assess the cost of such improvement against the lots and parcels of land abutting on such street so improved." The council have power originally, without petition from lot-owners, to order a street graded, and to pay for such improvement out of the general improvement fund. If the council refuse or neglect to order a particular street, or part of a street, graded, the proviso gives the resident lot-owners who have a majority of the front feet on a street the right to have the street graded on certain conditions; but in such a case the cost of grading must be apportioned to the lots and parcels of land abutting on the graded street. This proviso, then, gave a right not granted by the body of the section. The council cannot pay the cost of paving, macadamizing, curbing, and guttering streets out of the general improvement fund; for the full cost of such an improvement must be assessed against each block separately thus improved. If this proviso intended that the grading of a part of a street petitioned for should be paid for in the same manner as paving, macadamizing, curbing, and guttering is, why does it contain the word, "to assess the cost against the lots or parcels of land abutting on such street?" Or why did it not say, "by each block separately?" Because the intent of the legislature was to provide a different rule of apportionment from that made in the body of the section. We use the words "proviso" because it has crept in the case on the argument, in the briefs; but this is not a proviso in the technical sense, but a separate and independent clause in the section, giving a right to petitioners not hereinbefore enjoyed. It seems to us to be an irresistible conclusion, coming to the mind instantly, and without mental effort, on the first reading of the section, that the legislature had made separate and distinct rules of apportionment for the cost of paving streets and grading streets. We have endeavored by numerous citations to show that the true construction of the language used in the concluding clause of the section is that the whole length of the street improved is the taxing district, and not each block separately. No construction of the proviso is admissible that will make it mean the same as the body of the section, because, in the nature of things, the proviso is intended to cover ground not within the balance of the section, or else there would be no reason for its existence. If the legislature intended that the cost of grading a street on the petition of the lot-owners whose property abutted; that each separate block should pay only for the grading in its immediate front, as in paving, macadamizing, curbing, and guttering,—the word "grading" would have occurred in connection with the other improvements. It is evident that a different rule of apportionment was provided for grading, and hence the legislature did establish a rule of apportionment, and the common council of the city had no discretion to exercise. Any other construction renders the concluding part of the section meaningless.

There must be special authority by law conferred upon the city council to make the assessments. The ordinary grant to municipal corporations to levy taxes for municipal purposes will not justify other than ordinary taxes. The power to make assessments is exceptional, and must be strictly construed. Cooley, Tax'n, 609; Hitchcock v. Galveston, 96 U. S. 341. The method of apportionment is a legislative question, and in every act providing for a local improvement a method of apportionment of the cost must be provided. We hold in this case that the legislature did fix the method of apportionment with reference to this particular improvement. But it is said that this amendment to the law, made in 1887, has no application to this city, because, as appears from the record, it is a city formed by the consolidation of the cities of Kansas City, Wyandotte, and Armourdale, under the provisions of an act of the legislature that took effect on the 12th day of February, 1886, entitled "An act to provide for the consolidation of cities," commencing with paragraph 1064, Gen. St. 1889. We have referred heretofore to paragraph 1077 of this act, and we are asked now to say that this assessment, having been made in conformity to that section, is good. This raises questions both as to the validity and application of the paragraph. It is a very doubtful question whether it was constitutional or not; not because of its special legislation, but for the reason that the subject-matter of the section does not seem to be embraced in the title to the act in which it is found. The legislature has power to consolidate cities, and to prescribe the rules and conditions upon which such consolidation shall take place; and every section of the act that can, by fair inference, be held to be an incident to the power to consolidate, or a condition of such consolidation, may be said to be fairly expressed by the title. But it is difficult for the ordinary mind to realize how a particular manner of apportioning the cost of grading streets in a consolidated city can be held to be a condition, or to be embraced within the meaning of the title of this act. There are no words used in this title that would suggest to the most acute mind that it contained provisions about grading streets. The strong inclination is to regard it as void. A clearer question is presented of its repeal. We think it is repealed by the act we are considering, that was passed at the session of the legislature in 1887, and took effect on the 12th day of March; not expressly repealed, but by necessary implication, because of their antagonism, and because it is impossible to reconcile them. After these enumerated cities were consolidated, and formed Kansas City, Kan., that city became one of the first class, and is to be governed in all respects by the laws regulating cities of the first class. Every act passed by the legislature in respect to matters affecting cities of the first class has the same application to that as to any other city of the class in the state. It cannot be maintained that the act providing for the consolidation of cities is in the nature of a contract, whose obligations cannot be changed by legislation. An act of the legislature prescribing a different method and rule of apportioning the cost of a local improvement than the rule expressed in the act consolidating cities, so conflicting that the two cannot be reconciled, and one or the other must fall, must necessarily have the effect to repeal the prior one, or that prior one must be invested with some unusual attribute to obviate that result. We regard the act to provide for the consolidation of cities as a general law of uniform operation, that operates on cities already in existence, and will operate on those that grow in the future; that is, subject to amendment or repeal like any other general law upon the statute book. If the later act of the legislature is in actual conflict with one of its provisions or sections, that provision or section must go, for the same reason that applies to all repeals by implication. Hence we say that this assessment by the separate block cannot be upheld by the section of the act under which this city became a consolidated one. Without there are strongly coercive reasons, it ought not to be held that we have two statutes in force in this state prescribing different methods for the apportionment of the cost of a local improvement in a city of the first class; and every consideration of public policy, as well as the uniformity of our legislation, demands the declaration that, when the act of consolidation became complete, Kansas City was subjected to all the provisions of our statute regulating and governing cities of the first class, as if created in the usual statutory method, and all amendments made to such laws applied to that municipality as well as all others of that class.

It follows that the motion for rehearing is sustained, and the judgment of the court below reversed, for the sole reason that there is a rule of apportionment prescribed by the legislature making the whole distance on the street to be improved the taxing district. The petition and ordinance are valid, and probably the only thing required is a new apportionment and assessment of each lot or parcel of ground abutting on the graded street, so that it pays its proper proportion of the whole cost of the grading.

ENFORCEMENT OF MECHANICS' LIENS — PARTIES — WITHDRAWAL OF SUIT.

1. In an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien, all lienholders and incumbrancers should be made parties, and a lienholder who is not made a party in the first instance is entitled, upon application, to come in at any time before final judgment, and, by an answer in the nature of a cross-petition, set forth his claim of lien, and ask to have the same foreclosed.

2. In such a case his right to proceed to a final determination of his lien will not be defeated, where the plaintiff's petition is held upon demurrer to be insufficient, or where there is a compromise or withdrawal of any claim for a lien by the plaintiff or other lienholder who is a party in the action.

Error from district court, Finney county; A. J. ABBOTT, Judge.

H. R. Boyd, for plaintiff in error. Hopkins & Hoskinson, for defendants in error.

JOHNSTON, J. Keeler & Hudson contracted to build a house for Benjamin H. Barr, and purchased building material for that purpose of the Western Lumber Company. Failing to pay for the material, the lumber company filed a statement and claimed a lien on the property improved. Thereafter the lumber company brought an action against the contractors and the owner to recover what was due from the contractors and to foreclose their lien. Subsequently John Johnson, who had also furnished material to the contractors for the same building, which had not been paid for, and who had duly filed and claimed a lien, applied to the court to be made a party to the action brought by the lumber company, and to have his lien on, and interest in, the property determined. This application was heard by the court and granted on May 31, 1888, and Johnson filed an answer in the nature of a cross-bill, setting forth the sale of the material for use in the construction of the house, and that it was so used by the contractors; that there was still due thereon the sum of $76.50; that a statement for a subcontractor's lien had been filed, which was set out at length; and he asked for a judgment against the contractors for the amount due, and that it be declared a prior and paramount lien to that of the lumber company upon the premises of Barr. On June 1, 1888, a demurrer, filed by Barr to the petition of the lumber company, was sustained by the court, upon the ground that the statement filed by the company for a subcontractor's lien was insufficient to authorize a lien against the property of Barr. Proceedings in error were instituted in this court by the lumber company, and the ruling of the district court was reversed. Cunningham v. Barr, 45 Kan. —, 25 Pac. Rep. 583. After the demurrer of the lumber company was sustained, and on June 18, 1888, the defendants Barr and Keeler & Hudson filed separate motions to strike the answer or cross-petition of Johnson from the files, and to dismiss it because the pleading was unwarranted by the Code, and the court had no jurisdiction to hear and determine the matters therein stated. These motions were sustained, and Johnson complains of the ruling.

The action of the court in dismissing the cross-petition of Johnson cannot be sustained. He was a proper party in the action, and his pleading set forth a cause of action and right to affirmative relief. He had an interest in the subject of the controversy, and his presence was necessary to a complete determination of the same. The statute relating to the foreclosure of mechanics' liens expressly provides that all persons whose liens are filed as the statute provides and all incumbancers shall be made parties, and therefore Johnson should have been made a party in the first instance. Laws 1871, c. 97, § 5. As this was not done, it was proper to grant his application, and permit him to come in and have his claim and lien adjudicated. Indeed, if he had begun an independent proceeding, it would have been proper for the court, under the mechanic's lien law, to have consolidated the actions, and tried them as a single case. The fact that what is termed a "cross-petition" is not expressly authorized by the Code seems to have been relied on as a ground for dismissal. The name of the pleading is unimportant. The defendant may file an answer in the nature of a cross-petition, setting forth a statement of his right to affirmative relief. Civil Code, § 94. "The answer of the defendant setting up his claim is what formerly was a cross-petition in name, and in effect is still the same, although called an 'answer.' The reply his co-defendants may make to it is in legal effect an answer, although called by a different name. And all this is within the spirit of the Code, and a mere difference about names ought not to operate to defeat it." Kimball v. Connor, 3 Kan. 414. See, also, Sharon Town Co. v. Morris, 39 Kan. 377, 18 Pac. Rep. 230; Civil Code, §§ 36, 41, 42. Neither did the action of the court, in sustaining Barr's demurrer to the petition of the lumber company, work a discontinuance of the action, nor warrant the dismissal of Johnson's cross-petition. In the first place, as has been seen, that was an erroneous decision; but if it had been correctly decided, and there had been a voluntary withdrawal of the claim of lien by the lumber company, it would not have prejudiced the right of Johnson to proceed with the foreclosure of his lien. After he came in and filed his pleading, the other parties were bound to take notice of his claim, and of every subsequent step taken in the action. He is properly before the court, asking affirmative relief, and the compromise settlement or withdrawal of a claim by another lienholder or incumbancer who is a party to the action should not and will not defeat him in proceeding with the action to a final determination of the matters involved. Venable v. Dutch, 37 Kan. 515, 15 Pac. Rep. 520; Worrell v. Wade's Heirs, 17 Iowa, 96; King v. Thorp, 21 Iowa, 67. The judgment of the district court will be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

BURDEN OF PROOF—HARMLESS ERROR.

2. The admission of immaterial evidence is not cause for reversal.

(Syllabus by Simpson, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Elk county; M. G. TROUP, Judge.

Mechem & Smart, for plaintiff in error.
R. H. Nichols, for defendant in error.

SIMPSON, C. R. S. Parker commenced an action in replevin in the district court of Elk county against Richolson and H. and Winifred Baird, claiming that he had a special interest in and the right to the immediate possession of certain horses described in a chattel mortgage made by H. Baird to W. D. Parker on the 11th day of March, 1887, to secure a promissory note for $700 of that date, payable on or before the 18th of December, 1890, with 10 per cent. interest, payable annually, made by Baird, and in favor of W. D. Parker, and assigned by W. D. Parker to R. S. Parker on the 9th day of February, 1888; that said chattel mortgage was renewed by affidavit, as provided by law, and kept in force and effect. Richolson and other parties defendant filed a general denial, and a jury was waived, and a trial had by the court that resulted in a general finding and judgment in favor of the defendants in error. Certain judgment creditors of W. D. Parker, by proceedings in aid of execution, procured the appointment of Richolson as receiver of the property of Parker, and the mortgaged chattels, for the recovery of which this suit was brought, were in the possession of the receiver. At the trial the sole question of fact was as to the ownership of the note and chattel mortgage executed by H. Baird to W. D. Parker. The plaintiff in error claimed to be the owner by virtue of a purchase from his father, W. D. Parker; while on the other side the creditors of W. D. Parker claimed that he was the owner, and that his son was aiding him in an attempt to defraud his creditors. Whatever may be the technical construction of the pleadings, the case was tried by both sides upon the theory that the main question was whether the note and chattel mortgage was the property of the father or the son, and upon this issue the plaintiff in error voluntarily assumed the affirmative. It is now too late to complain of the order of trial, the burden of proof, or the condition of the pleadings. The renewal affidavit made by W. D. Parker, the notice of sale in which he described himself as mortgagee, his continued possession of the note and chattel mortgage, his apparent complete control and exclusive management of the entire business, are enough to enable us to say that there is some evidence to sustain the general finding of the trial court. Complaint is made of the admission of the proceedings in aid of execution before the probate court, but it is a glittering generality, and does not specifically point out particular parts as erroneous. A part of these proceedings were an absolute necessity, so far as Richolson was concerned, because by them alone was he connected with this controversy. These proceedings were admissible to show the official character of Richolson, his right to the possession of the mortgaged property, and to fix his status in the litigation. They may not have been the best or the original evidence of the indebtedness of Parker, the father, or to establish some other facts, but, being admissible to establish necessary things, we are not to infer that they were used for other things prejudicial to this plaintiff in error, without some showing to that effect. Again, the material and controlling fact was as to the ownership of the note and chattel mortgage. All other facts were subordinate, and perhaps immaterial, and hence we say that all parts of the transcript of the supplemental proceedings in aid of execution, except such as showed the appointment of the receiver and his authority to take possession of the mortgaged property, were, under the theory of the trial court, immaterial. As we have said, there is evidence sufficient to sustain the general finding, and we can only recommend an affirmance of the judgment.

BERKLEY v. TOOTLE et al.

CHATTEL MORTGAGE BY PARTNERSHIP—VALIDITY.

An existing bona fide indebtedness may be secured by chattel mortgage duly executed by the individuals composing a partnership, of which the husband is a member, to the wife, notwithstanding the fact that the firm has been sued, and its creditors are about to levy upon the firm property.

(Syllabus by Green, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Decatur county; Louis K. PRATT, Judge.

S. D. Decker, for plaintiff in error. Wilson & Hays, for defendant in error.

GREEN, C. R. J. Berkley sued J. E. Bebb, sheriff of Decatur county, in replevin, to recover a stock of goods claimed by her under a chattel mortgage executed by J. M. Berkley, her husband, and P. A. Kahnman, doing business under the firm name of Berkley & Kahnman, and P. A. Kahnman & Co., upon a stock of boots, shoes, rubber goods, tools, sewing-machines, fixtures and furniture in a building known as the "Blue Front," in Oberlin, given to secure the payment of $3,500, and dated and filed for record on the 27th day of December, 1887. Subsequently the stock was levied upon by the sheriff for certain execution and attachment creditors of Berkley & Kahnman, and before the trial commenced the creditors were substituted for the sheriff as defendants. The action was tried to the court on the 27th day of April, 1888, in Decatur county, and resulted in a general finding and judgment for the defendants; and the plaintiff in error brings the case here, claiming error. It is insisted that there was no evidence to support the findings and judgment of the trial court; that there was no fraud shown in the execution of the chattel mortgage by J. M. Berkley and P. A. Kahnman; and that there was an existing and valid debt to support the mortgage. It seems from the evidence that J. M. Berkley had executed a note to his wife for the sum of $2,190, on the 30th day of March, 1875, and that this money came from her father's estate; that on the 15th day of December, 1886, J. M. Berkley executed another note for $2,500, in place of the other note, which had been mislaid, and delivered the same to his wife; and that he afterwards gave his wife a note for $1,000, which had been executed by P. A. Kahnman to him on the 1st day of June, 1887, for money that the plaintiff had given her husband, and he had loaned it to Kahnman to go into business with him. This money also came from her father's estate. This last note had a credit of $263, on September 1, 1887. According to the plaintiff's testimony, the mortgage was given to secure the payment of these two notes. We do not know upon what theory the court below decided this case, and have not been furnished with a brief upon the part of the defendants in error, and hence are not advised as to their position in regard to this transaction. It is obvious, from the examination of the evidence which we have made, that there was a bona fide and existing indebtedness from Berkley & Kahan to the plaintiff. Now, it would seem that if such indebtedness existed at the time the chattel mortgage was executed the firm would have the right to secure the plaintiff. This court has said: "The weight of authority seems to be that mere insolvency, where no actual fraud intervenes, will not deprive the partners of their legal control over the property and of the right to dispose of the same as they may choose; and where the separate creditor purchases from the firm in good faith, and the individual indebtedness is a fair price for the property purchased, such purchase cannot of itself be held fraudulent as against the general creditors of the firm." Woodmansie v. Holcomb, 34 Kan. 35, 7 Pac. Rep. 603, and authorities there cited. While the relation existing between the parties called for a more critical examination of the dealings between them than if two of the parties had not been husband and wife, still, if the evidence clearly established an existing and bona fide debt to the wife, she would have the same right as any other individual creditor to have her debt secured. The debtors would have the undoubted legal right to prefer her as a creditor, even if the giving of the security would have the effect to consume the property thus pledged in satisfaction of her debt. Monroe v. May, 9 Kan. 473; Kennedy v. Powell, 34 Kan. 22, 7 Pac. Rep. 606; Chapman v. Summerfield, 36 Kan. 610, 14 Pac. Rep. 235. We recommend a reversal of the judgment.

2. Where an action is brought against a railroad company under chapter 94, Laws 1874, (pars. 1252-1257, Gen. St. 1889,) for damages for stock killed at a place where the road is not inclosed with a good and lawful fence, the company may show as a defense that the stock was killed at a crossing of the road used and traveled by the public as a highway, although not established or regularly laid out by the county authorities.

Error from district court, Chautauqua county; M. G. TROUP, Judge.

J. H. Richards and C. E. Benton, for plaintiff in error. J. Milton and J. V. Beekman, for defendant in error.

HORTON, C. J. In this case there was some evidence tending to show that the animal was injured at the crossing of a road over the track and right of way. The railroad company attempted to show that this crossing was used and traveled by the public as a highway, and therefore that the company was not bound to fence or inclose such crossing. The trial court refused to receive most of this evidence, and also refused to submit the question to the jury whether the animal was killed at a crossing used by the public. This was error, and material error. It was decided in Railroad Co. v. Griffin, 28 Kan. 539, that a railroad company is not liable under chapter 9, Laws 1874, for stock killed at the crossing of a road used and traveled by the public as a highway, though the crossing and route thus traveled is in fact not a regularly laid out and established highway. See, also, 13 Amer. & Eng. R. Cas. 532, 533, and cases there cited. In a note to the principal case it is stated that "the true test whether or not a railroad company is bound to fence at a particular point is whether there is a practical user of the land at such point as a public place, either as a highway or otherwise. This is irrespective of the questions of dedication, statutory appropriation," etc. The judgment of the district court will be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial. All the justices concurring.

CHICAGO, K. & W. R. CO. v. EASLEY.

EMINENT DOMAIN—COMPENSATION—TO WHOM PAYABLE—EVIDENCE OF INTEREST.

1. Where commissioners in a railroad right-of-way proceeding award damages for injuries to a tract of land to a certain land and cattle company as the owner thereof, and also allow nominal damages to another party for injuries to the same land, and the latter appeals from such award to the district court, before he can recover damages in said court he must show that he had some interest in the land over which the right of way was condemned, at the time of the condemnation proceedings.

2. Record in this case examined, and held, that no competent evidence was offered by the plaintiff to show he had any interest in the land when the right of way was appropriated by the railroad company.

3. Where a party, seeking to recover damages to a farm consisting of 160 acres, puts a witness on the stand to prove his damages, and the witness says he cannot set a value on 80 acres of the land, and does not know the market value of the other 80, but says it is in his judgment worth $20 per acre, it is error to permit him, over the objection of the adverse party, to state how much less the whole farm was worth immediately after the appropriation of the right of way across it by the railroad company than it was immediately before such right of way was appropriated.

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Barber county; LOREN EDWARDS, Judge pro tem.

Geo. R. Peck, A. A. Hurd, and Robt. Dunlap, for plaintiff in error. W. S. Denton, for defendant in error.

STRANG, C. This was an appeal from the report of condemnation commissioners in a railroad right-of-way proceeding. The commissioners awarded the legal representatives of the Ohio Land & Cattle Company the sum of $272 as damages for injuries to the tract of land, damages for injuries to which the defendant, J. R. Easley, is now claiming, and also allowed said J. R. Easley the sum of one dollar as damages to the same. Easley appealed, and the case was tried before the court and a jury, February 27, 1887. The jury returned a general verdict, awarding damages to the defendant in the sum of $427.33, and also made certain special findings, which they returned with the general verdict. The railroad company moved for a new trial, which motion was overruled. The defendant in error challenges the record in this court, but we think it is sufficient as a bill of exceptions, and therefore it is unnecessary to look further into the matters alleged against it. The company says the defendant is not entitled to any damages, because he failed to show any title to or possession of the land at the time of the condemnation proceedings. There is but little evidence in the record upon this question, and perhaps none which may be said to be competent testimony, and, unfortunately for the defendant in error herein, what little there is seems to be against him. McNeal, a witness called by the defendant in error to establish his ownership and possession of the land, testified that the land belonged to Easley; that, while he did not live on it, he was possessed of it. He also testified that he had control of the place for Easley, as far as his knowledge of it was concerned. The statement that the place belonged to Easley was not competent evidence to prove Easley's ownership of the land, and the evasive statement that, "while he did not live upon the land, he was possessed of it," does not prove possession of the land by Easley; and the statement that the witness had control of the land for Easley, "so far as his knowledge of the place was concerned," does not prove anything. He may not have had any knowledge of the place, and, judging from the character of his evidence, he did not have much knowledge of it. But later on in his testimony he was asked how long Easley had had possession of the place, and his final answer is, "My remembrance would be something like six months since it was deeded back to him." This evidence, if it was competent to prove ownership, would show that the land was deeded to Easley six months after the condemnation proceedings were had. Another witness testifies that Easley sold the land about a year before the trial, which, if it proved anything, would, in connection with McNeal's evidence and the report of the condemnation commissioners, show that Easley sold the land to the Ohio Land & Cattle Company before the condemnation proceedings, and that it was deeded back to him six months after the condemnation proceedings were had, and that in the mean time he had no interest, or but a slight interest, at most, in the land. However, it is unnecessary to speculate as to what interest Easley had in the land. He did not show by any competent evidence that he had any ownership in or the possession of the land. Failing to show any interest in the land that was subject to injury, he could not recover any damages.

The next error assigned grows out of the action of the court in overruling plaintiff's objection to testimony, and in refusing to strike it out after it was in. C. W. Pease was called as a witness by the plaintiff below to prove the amount of his damages. The witness says he could not tell anything about the value of one 80 of the farm, and as to the other 80 said: "I would only have to say, in regard to that, I do not know what it would sell for. I would have to use my own opinion, my own judgment, in regard to what I considered the value of it. I have never heard it offered for sale, or any body make any offers on it. Would have to use my own opinion with regard to what it was worth afterwards; but what was the real market value I would not know." He gave it as his opinion that this 80 was worth $20 per acre. He was then asked, "Were you acquainted with the value of land in that neighborhood similar to that, about that time?" and answered, "I know what has been offered and asked for land." The following question was then put to him: "How much less, taking into consideration the inconvenience, if any, by reason of the railroad company running its right of way through there, was it worth immediately after the appropriation of the railroad's right of way through it than it was immediately before the railroad had appropriated the land?" (Objected to as irrelevant, incompetent, and immaterial, and for the further reason that it has not been shown that the witness was competent to answer. Overruled.) I consider the value less $800 on that place, that is, on the entire farm." The admission of this evidence was probably erroneous, within the case of Railroad Co. v. Kuhn, 38 Kan. 675, 17 Pac. Rep. 322, and the case of Railroad Co. v. Muller, (Kan.) 25 Pac. Rep. 210. But it certainly was erroneous, for the reason that the witness had shown he was not qualified to testify. He testified that he could put no value on one 80, and as to the other 80 it was his opinion it was worth $20 per acre; but that as to the market value he did not know what it was, and he would have to use his own judgment in fixing the value; and yet he is permitted to tell how much less in value the whole farm was, after the appropriation of the right of way over said land by the railroad company, than it was before the appropriation of such right of way was made. This was error. There are other assignments of error, but we do not think it necessary to notice them. It is recommended that the judgment of the district court be reversed, and the cause remanded for new trial.

Error from district court, Harvey county; L. HOOK, Judge.

Bowman & Bucher, for defendant in error.

JOHNSTON, J. On May 12, 1888, G. W. Rogers brought an action against R. W. Hodgson, M. S. Hodgson, Cynthia A. Shafer, and H. Shafer, to recover upon a note, and to foreclose a mortgage which was given to secure the same. The note was for $2,500, and was executed on May 1, 1886, by Hodgson and wife to Smedley Darlington, due in five years, with 7 per cent. interest, payable semi-annually, according to the terms of 10 semi-annual coupons of $87.50 each, attached to the note, due on the 1st days of May and November of each year. He alleged that Smedley Darlington sold and assigned the note and mortgage to the plaintiff, who is now the owner and holder of the same. It is further averred that the mortgage given to secure the payment of the note provided that, if any coupon remained due and unpaid more than 30 days after it became due, the whole debt should then become due, and bear 12 per cent. interest from date. The plaintiff further says that the interest coupons maturing November 1, 1886, and May 1, 1887, were paid, but that the coupon maturing November 1, 1887, was not paid at the time the same became due, nor for more than 30 days thereafter, and was still due and unpaid; and that the interest coupon maturing May 1, 1888, was past due and unpaid. There is a further allegation that the conditions of the mortgage were broken by the failure to pay the taxes on the premises and to keep the property insured. On account of these defaults the plaintiff alleges that he has elected to exercise his option to declare the whole sum due and payable, according to the terms of the note and mortgage. He asks for a personal judgment against the defendants Hodgson and wife for the sum of $2,500, with interest thereon at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum from May 1, 1886, less the two interest coupons which have been paid as above stated; and also for a decree foreclosing the mortgage. The defendants filed a joint answer, admitting the execution of the note and mortgage; denying the assignment of the same by Darlington to the plaintiff; alleging that the coupon due November 1, 1887, was paid to Darlington before the pretended assignment, and alleging an offer to pay the coupon of May 1, 1888, within 30 days after the same became due, at the place where it was made payable, and that within the same time they offered to pay the last-named coupon to plaintiff, but that it was refused; alleging that the agent of Darlington, who negotiated the loan, agreed that no insurance need be taken out on the premises, and waived that condition of the mortgage, and that W. E. Brown, who purchased the premises from Hodgson on April 23, 1887, assumed the payment of the mortgage note and coupons mentioned, but that afterwards he combined with the defendant, J. T. Axtell, and one A. B. Gilbert to injure and defraud the defendant, and in pursuance thereof they obtained possession of the note and mortgage from Darlington upon the pretense of the payment of the same by said Brown, and that they did not in any sense obtain an assignment from Darlington to Rogers; that subsequently W. E. Brown entered into an agreement to reconvey the premises to Hodgson, free and clear of all incumbrances, except that Hodgson was to pay the note and the balance of the unmatured coupons as they became due, but with the distinct agreement that no forfeiture of any of the terms and conditions of the note and mortgage had occurred. It is further alleged that no part of the note is due, nor are any of the coupons due except the one maturing May 1, 1888, and that payment of that had been tendered. On December 21, 1888, the plaintiff asked leave to file a supplemental petition, alleging in substance that since the commencement of this action the defendant had allowed the interest coupon due May 1, 1888, to remain unpaid more than 30 days after its maturity, and had failed to pay the taxes which were due December 20, 1888, and had allowed the interest coupon due November 1, 1888, to remain unpaid for more than 30 days after its maturity, and had still allowed the buildings on the premises to remain uninsured; and that for these reasons, in addition to those set up in the original petition, the whole amount of the debt had become due. The court denied the application to file the supplemental petition, and upon the trial which was afterwards had a demurrer was sustained by the court to the plaintiff's evidence. The plaintiff excepted to the rulings of the court in denying the application to file the supplemental petition, and in sustaining the demurrer to the plaintiff's evidence. By the supplemental petition offered the plaintiff undertook to allege such defaults as would entitle him to recover 12 per cent. interest from the date of the mortgage, instead of the 7 per cent. rate stipulated therein. By the conditions of the mortgage a default in the payment of any interest for more than 30 days after the same became due gave the holder the option to declare the whole amount due, and to collect interest thereon at 12 per cent. from the date of the note. In the petition filed he alleged a default in the payment of the interest due November 1, 1887, and that the same was still due and unpaid when the action was brought on May 12, 1888. He also alleged that the coupon due on May 1, 1888, was past due and still unpaid. More than six months after the commencement of the suit, and just before the trial, he asked to file a supplemental petition, alleging the non-payment of the coupons due on May and November, 1888, for more than 30 days after the maturity of the same, and the continued failure to procure insurance, as well as the non-payment of the taxes for the year 1888. These amendatory provisions related only to the right of the plaintiff to declare the whole amount due, and to collect the additional rate of interest on the note and mortgage. If there had been no default before the commencement of the action the plaintiff would hardly be entitled to enlarge his action by a supplemental petition setting forth subsequent defaults or grounds of forfeiture which did not exist at the commencement of the suit; but if a part of the amount claimed in the petition was due and unpaid at the commencement of the action, it would seem that the plaintiff would be entitled to set up any facts occurring since the commencement of the action showing that a greater or that the entire amount was due and unpaid. The Code provides that "either party may be allowed, on notice, and on such terms as to costs as the court may prescribe, to file a supplemental petition, answer, or reply, alleging facts material to the case, occurring after the former petition, answer, or reply." Section 144. The action was brought on May 12, 1888, and the coupon, which was due 12 days prior to that time, had remained unpaid for more than 30 days after its maturity, which by the terms of the mortgage gave the plaintiff the option to elect to declare the whole amount due. The supplemental petition offered also alleged that the taxes which were due December 20, 1888, were unpaid; and that also constituted a ground of forfeiture, and a cause for declaring the whole amount due. As the plaintiff was claiming a personal judgment for the entire principal, and all the interest due thereon, as well as the additional rate, where there was a default of more than 30 days the court would have been warranted in allowing the supplemental petition to be filed alleging additional defaults, which would entitle the plaintiff to recover a greater amount. However, the filing of amendatory and supplemental pleadings rests very largely in the discretion of the court, and unless there is a clear abuse of discretion its ruling will not be reversed. Tefft v. Fiery, 22 Kan. 753. We cannot hold that the refusal of the court is such an abuse of discretion as constitutes a ground of reversal.

The next assignment is the ruling of the court in sustaining the defendants' demurrer to the plaintiff's evidence. It is contended by the defendants in error that the coupon which became due on November 1, 1887, had been paid, and that there was no default on account of the non-payment of the taxes or the failure to insure the buildings on the premises. The proof strongly tends to show, and we think would be amply sufficient to sustain a verdict or finding, that at the commencement of the action no defaults had occurred which gave the plaintiff the right to elect to declare the whole amount due. It leads us to think that there was a payment of the coupon due November 1, 1887, and that the taxes due December 20, 1888, were paid by the party holding the legal title to the premises at the time the taxes were due. The tax-receipt and the coupon of November, 1887, were both surrendered to the owner of the mortgaged premises prior to the commencement of the action. The testimony in regard to the payment and surrender of this coupon, as well as the payment of the taxes, is inconsistent with forfeiture. Neither does it appear that there was any forfeiture by reason of the non-insurance of the property. No provision is contained in the mortgage note with reference to insurance, and the one contained in the mortgage provides that the buildings will be insured by the mortgagors at their own expense, with the loss payable to the mortgagee; and, instead of reciting that the failure to do so shall be a ground of forfeiture, it provides that, in the event of the failure of the mortgagors, the mortgagee may procure such insurance and collect the cost thereof from the mortgagors, and that the mortgage shall stand as security for the insurance. Besides, the testimony offered tends strongly to show that the mortgagee and his agent did not desire or demand insurance, and, if they had a right to demand the same, that there had been a waiver of such right. If the decision of the district court had been a finding at the final submission of the case that no defaults had occurred prior to May, 1888, we would readily yield our concurrence and declare that the testimony offered fully warranted the finding; but it is not so clear that a demurrer to the evidence should have been sustained. "A demurrer to the evidence admits every fact and conclusion which the evidence most favorable to the other party tends to prove." Christie v. Barnes, 33 Kan. 317, 6 Pac. Rep. 599. In such a case the court cannot weigh conflicting evidence, but must view that which is given in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, and unless all that is offered fails to establish his case, or some material fact in issue in the case, the court should overrule the demurrer. Railroad Co. v. Foster, 39 Kan. 329, 18 Pac. Rep. 285, and cases there cited. We are inclined to the opinion that under these rules the demurrer should have been overruled. It certainly should as to the coupon note due May 1, 1888, that was past due when the action was commenced, and defendants admitted that it was still unpaid. In any event, plaintiff was entitled to a judgment for the amount of that coupon and the costs of the action. It is true, as contended, that the plaintiff claimed more than that, and that he claimed the amount of principal and interest at the advanced rate, but it appears that he set out the principal mortgage note in his petition, and all the coupon notes that were unpaid, and he asked a personal judgment for the amount of the principal, together with all interest due thereon. The coupon note maturing May 1, 1888, was recited at length, and the plaintiff alleged that it was past due and was still unpaid. Even if the principal note was not due when the suit was begun, and no defaults had occurred which authorized the plaintiff to declare the whole amount due, still he was entitled to recover that which was due, and this was fairly included within the allegations of his petition. There was some testimony relating to a tender of the amount of this coupon, but there was no offer to confess judgment, and the tender, if any was made, did not include the costs of the proceeding. Guided by the rules referred to in relation to a demurrer to the evidence, we cannot say that a sufficient tender was made, or that the demurrer should have been sustained. The facts of the case, as indicated by the record, are such that we would have been pleased to have affirmed the judgment if it could have been done under the rules of law, but we feel compelled to hold that the demurrer should have been overruled. The judgment of the district court will be reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial. All the justices concurring.

ACTION FOR RENT—EVICTION AS A DEFENSE.

1. Where an action is brought by a landlord to recover of his tenant rent for a stated time, an answer of the tenant alleging that during the term of the lease the landlord entered the premises and took possession thereof, leased them to various parties, and collected and retained the rent therefor, states a defense to at least a part of the landlord's claim for rent.

2. The amended answer in this case states a defense to the cause of action set up in the plaintiff's bill of particulars, or to at least a portion of it, and therefore the demurrer to said answer ought to have been overruled.

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, McPherson county; FRANK DOSTER, Judge.

Frank G. White, for plaintiffs in error. Simpson & Bowker, for defendant in error.

STRANG, C. Emma J. Tyler commenced this action before a justice of the peace in McPherson county to recover $135 and interest thereon, for rent alleged to be due her from the defendants below. The case was tried before a justice, resulting in a judgment for the plaintiff in the sum of $136.57. From this judgment the defendants therein appealed to the district court, where they filed an answer to the plaintiff's bill of particulars. A demurrer was interposed to such answer, and by the court sustained. Afterwards the defendants filed an amended answer, to which the plaintiff below again demurred. This second demurrer was also sustained. To the ruling of the court sustaining this demurrer the defendants below objected and saved an exception, and the case comes here for review of the ruling on said demurrer. The amended answer filed in the court below reads as follows: "Defendants say that they deny that they are indebted to the plaintiff in the amount sued for, or in any other sum of money whatsoever, for the following reasons: Prior to August 1, 1888, the date when the installment of rent herein sued for is alleged to have fallen due, defendants fully and completely abandoned and vacated the premises described in the plaintiff's bill of particulars, and released all claims of possession or right to them, and plaintiff resumed possession and control of said premises, leased them to various and divers parties, collecting and retaining the rent for the same in all respects the same as she did before the date of the alleged lease to the defendants, and has at all times since assumed and retained full and complete control of the premises; and defendants allege that by reason of the vacation of the premises by them, and reoccupying and control of them by the plaintiff, a cancellation of said lease was then and there perfected by operation of law." While this answer is not well drawn, yet we think it states a cause of defense, at least to some part of the plaintiff's claim, and should have been held good as against a demurrer. It is therefore recommended that the judgment of the court below be reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

BRANT et al. v. JOHNSON.

PROMISE TO PAY DEBT OF ANOTHER — PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—CONTRACT.

1. A verbal promise to pay the debt of another is within the statutes of fraud, unless it is, in effect, substituted for the original liability.

2. A letter of instructions from one agent to another cannot be construed into a contract between the principal and a third party respecting the business referred to in the letter.

(Syllabus by Simpson, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Franklin county; A. W. BENSON, Judge.

John W. Deford, for plaintiff in error. Mechem & Smart, for defendant in error.

SIMPSON, C. Brant & Beachy sued D. P. Johnson in the district court of Franklin county, alleging, substantially, that they were partners conducting a real-estate agency at Ottawa, in said county. That on the 19th day of March, 1883, they made a contract with Edwin E. Wilson by which Wilson employed them to sell seven tracts of land lying in said county for the sum of $22,252, and, if they sold at that price, they were to receive 3 per cent. commission, and were to make no charges for expenses. That, if all the land should be sold within six months, they were entitled to the amount realized in excess of $21,000. If the total amount realized by a sale within six months shall be $500, or more in excess of $22,252, then their commission was to be 6 per cent. of the gross sales, and no more. If not sold within six months, but within one year, then the commission shall be 4½ per cent. If any of the property should remain unsold after one year, or if the land did not sell for $22,252, the commissions and charges of every kind shall not be in excess of 3 per cent. Brant & Beachy were to take charge of and lease the land, but no lease to interfere with the sale. On the 10th day of May, 1883, an additional contract was made between the parties, wherein it was provided that the amount of $814 is due Brant & Beachy when that sum shall have been derived from the sale of the real-estate known as the "Hamilton Lands," in Franklin county, subject to a payment, out of the proceeds of said sale, of $1,500 due Hamilton. On the 26th day of December, 1883, Brant & Beachy entered into a contract with one W. A. Clark that recited that the previous contracts with Wilson were made for Clark, Underwood & Co., and for convenience in business Wilson had conveyed to Clark the lands mentioned in the original contract, who holds the same for Clark, Underwood & Co.; that said conveyance shall not be considered a breach of the original contract; and that Brant & Beachy shall continue to handle the lands upon the terms agreed upon; the firm of Underwood, Clark & Co., however, to have the full benefit of and be subject to any agreements in existence between Wilson and Brant & Beachy in relation to said lands, the same having been made by Wilson for Underwood, Clark & Co. It is then alleged that Clark mortgaged these lands to D. P. Johnson to secure the payment of $20,000 due from Underwood, Clark & Co. In said mortgage it was agreed that, at any time that a sale was made of any part of the land at fair prices, the said Johnson, on receiving the purchase price of the land sold, should credit it on the notes, and release the tract sold from the operation of the mortgage. On the 15th day of May, 1884, it was further agreed between Clark and Brant & Beachy that, in consideration of the sale of the balance of the Hamilton lands to Fickenger at the price of $8,500, the said Brant & Beachy are to receive as total commissions the sum of $365, there being the sum of $814 to be paid Brant & Beachy out of the sale to Fickenger; Brant & Beachy representing that the proceeds of rent in their hands amount to $300. That on the 25th day of September, 1884, the said D. P. Johnson, through his agent, the Goodin Bank of Ottawa, duly authorized, promised, and specially agreed with Brant & Beachy that if they would complete the sale to Fickenger, or his assignee, Kerr, and to David Fogle, that, as soon as the proceeds of said sale were paid, the sum due them would be paid by his agent, the bank, or by himself. That they did complete said sales, the one to Fogle for $4,800, and the other to Kerr for $8,500, which sums were paid to the Goodin Bank. That Johnson refused to pay, and they ask judgment against him for $978.64, with interest from May 1, 1885. Johnson answered, denying generally, and for a second defense pleads the statute of limitations, and for a third defense alleges that heretofore, in a certain action in the district court of Franklin county, wherein these plaintiffs brought an action against W. A. Clark, defendant, the identical fund of $1,100 mentioned in the petition (being the balance of the proceeds of the sales to Fogle and Kerr remaining on deposit in the Goodin Bank) was attached as the property of Clark; that thereupon this defendant filed an interplea in said action, claiming said funds as his, and the plaintiffs filed a reply to said interplea, denying the claim set up therein, and setting forth the same facts which are now set up in this petition as the foundation of their action, and praying judgment therein against the defendant. Said action came on for trial, and was tried upon the issue presented by the interplea, reply, and denial, and judgment was rendered thereon in favor of this defendant. The defendant alleges that all the matters and things now complained of and sought to be litigated were finally adjudicated in that action in favor of this defendant. The entire pleadings, records, and proceedings in that action are made a part of the answer. This case was tried by the court at the October term, 1888, and findings of fact and conclusions of law were entered as follows:

"FINDINGS OF FACT.

"(1) The plaintiffs are, and at the times herein referred to were, copartners in the business of real-estate agents and loan-brokers at Ottawa, Kansas.

"(2) On the 19th of March, 1883, the plaintiffs, by written agreement, undertook, as such brokers, to sell for E. E. Wilson certain land in this county. This agreement was modified by a further writing on May 10, 1883, whereby it was agreed that $814 of the proceeds of said sale, when made, should be paid over to the plaintiffs. This was a balance of purchase money due on said land to one Hamilton, and by agreement between him and the plaintiffs was to be received by the latter in satisfaction of a debt Hamilton owed them.

"(3) Wilson conveyed said lands December 26, 1883, to W. A. Clark as a member of and for the firm of Underwood, Clark & Co., whose agent Wilson was, and for whom he had held the legal title to said lands; and therefore said Clark adopted and ratified the said prior agreements between Wilson and plaintiffs.

"(4) On December 28, 1883, Clark mortgaged said lands to D. P. Johnson, the defendant, to secure $20,000 on indebtedness due him from Underwood, Clark & Co. This mortgage contained a condition that Clark might sell the lands or parcels thereof at fair prices, and that upon receipt of the purchase price Johnson would release the tracts so sold. When he took this mortgage the defendant had no knowledge of the plaintiff's claim upon proceeds.

"(5) On May 15, 1884, the plaintiffs agreed in writing, set out in the petition, with said W. A. Clark, that, in consideration of certain sales of the remainder of said land to the plaintiffs, they should have a total commission for such sales of $365, and that they should have also out of the proceeds of such sale said $814, and should account for $300 rent received.

"(6) Written agreements for the sales of said remainder of the Hamilton lands had been made by the plaintiffs, as such agents, with two certain parties, and were outstanding and in full force on May 15, 1884, and remained without being carried into effect for considerable time, because of defects in the title which said plaintiffs were endeavoring to and did afterwards correct, at the request of Clark and his grantor, Wilson, whereby they became entitled to $99.64 for their services and expenses therein from said Clark.

"(7) On September 22, 1884, the defendant, upon request of Clark, forwarded to Goodin Bank at Ottawa releases for the lands so sold by the plaintiffs, with instructions to deliver on payment of purchase money in full to the bank for him, (Johnson.) Plaintiffs, learning of this, informed the bank of their claims heretofore referred to, and demanded payment thereof out of said proceeds. The bank at once informed defendant by letter of said claims and demands. Thereupon the defendant's agents, thereto duly authorized, instructed the bank in writing, duly signed by them, as follows, in relation thereto: 'Underwood, Clark & Co. told us that they would settle Beachy's claim. Presume they will do so if they have to. We think it will be arranged, but perhaps they hope to reduce the demand some. We would prefer to have the whole amount, but, if Beachy's claim must be settled, let it be done. U., C. & Co. will make the amount good to us. [Signed] RICHMOND & TITUS.'

"(8) On receiving this letter and instructions, the bank showed Mr. Beachy the letter, and orally promised the plaintiff payment out of the proceeds when they came in. Considerable delay, however, occurred, occasioned by an apparent defect in the title, to cure which the plaintiffs were endeavoring to obtain a certain quit-claim deed, which they finally procured and placed on record November 5, 1884. Pending this delay, the defendant ordered and caused the return of his releases and all other papers from said bank.

"(9) After said deed was procured, still further delays occurred, occasioned by the efforts of the purchasers to negotiate loans upon the lands to pay the purchase money. In March, 1885, the defendant, who lived in Iowa, came in person to investigate the matter and look after the lands. After seeing the lands, he called upon the plaintiffs, and inquired for and obtained the particulars of their claim, and of the terms and conditions of the pending contracts of sale, and promised to plaintiffs to pay said claim, saying to them, with reference thereto, 'I will make it my debt, and see it paid;' and told the plaintiff Beachy to go on and close up the trade, and he should have his pay out of the proceeds. This promise was entirely verbal.

"(10) The plaintiffs negotiated the sales of the lands referred to, and, after the contracts were signed, were active in making the title satisfactory to the purchasers, and in bringing about a compliance on the part of both parties. They were engaged in this when the defendant made the promise just referred to, and continued the same service afterwards; and finally, in May, 1885, the parties were ready to and did perform on both sides. In anticipation thereof the defendant had, after said promise, again forwarded said releases to Goodin Bank, with instructions to deliver them only upon full payment of all the proceeds of sale for him being first made. The deeds from Clark were accordingly delivered, (by another agent,) and the full proceeds of the sales paid to Goodin Bank for Johnson. The plaintiffs protested against this, and demanded payment of their claims from

Clark's agent and from the bank, but were refused.

"(11) While the plaintiffs were at all times active and energetic in making the sales and procuring a compliance with the contracts, and expended much time and work therein, it does not appear that they did anything more or differently because of the defendant's promise than they otherwise would have done, and that, in fact, they did nothing further than they would have done without such promise, but they relied upon receiving their pay out of such proceeds, and when refused they brought suit against Clark, and garnished the bank, as shown in the action of Brant et al. v. Clark, referred to in the preliminary statement.

"(12) The plaintiffs' claims so due from Clark, and which defendant promised to pay, are:

Balance of purchase money as stated....	$ 814 00
Commissions.....	865 00
Services and expenses in perfecting title	99 64
Total	$1,278 64
Less moneys for rents.....	300 00
Interest.....
Total amount due plaintiffs.....

—For the above amount judgment was duly rendered in this action against Clark, November 1, 1888, which judgment is still in full force and unpaid. Underwood, Clark & Co. are insolvent, and after applying all said purchase money they are still heavily indebted to the said D. P. Johnson upon said mortgage debt and otherwise.

"(13) It is admitted that all the written agreements attached to and copied into the petition were duly executed and delivered by the parties thereto alleged.

"CONCLUSIONS OF LAW.

"(1) That the plaintiffs had nollen upon the proceeds of the lands sold by them for Clark for the indebtedness due them from the latter.

"(2) The defendant's promise to pay Clark's debt was a special promise to answer for the debt of another, and, not being in writing, is within sec. 6 of the statute of frauds, and cannot be enforced.

"(3) The authority given by Richmond & Titus to the Goodin Bank in the letter of September 22, 1884, is merely an instruction by one of the defendant's agents to another, and cannot be construed into a contract between the defendant and plaintiffs, or as giving to the latter a lien upon funds still in the hands of the purchasers of the lands. Further, it appears that this instruction was revoked, and other instructions given.

"(4) No legal liability of the defendant to the plaintiffs, as alleged in the petition, is shown by the facts appearing on the trial, and judgment will therefore be rendered for the defendant for costs."

The case is properly here for review, and counsel for plaintiffs in error insist that the promises of Johnson, as shown in the seventh, eighth, and ninth findings, were original, and not collateral.

1. A case in which both Brant & Beachy and Johnson were parties, heretofore decided by this court, (Johnson v. Brant, 38 Kan. 754, 17 Pac. Rep. 794,) to some extent discusses the questions involved in this controversy. The counsel for the plaintiffs in error now insist that the promises of Johnson, as shown in the seventh, eighth, and ninth findings, were original, and not collateral. In the case reported in 88 Kan. and 17 Pac. Rep., Justice VALENTINE says: "As before stated, we think the plaintiffs did not have any lien upon these funds; and, besides, Johnson's waiver appears to have been wholly by parol, and without any consideration whatever; and it was also an agreement to answer for the debtor default of another person." This was said in an action between these same parties, in which the validity of Johnson's promise to pay was directly in issue by the pleadings. It is plain that Brant & Beachy did not, at the time, consider Johnson's promise to pay the debt of Clark an original one, because they did not rely on it, and did not discharge Clark from the debt, but sued him, and insisted on payment from Clark, attempted to garnish funds in the bank which they supposed belonged to Clark, and never attempted to enforce the promise against Johnson until all hope of securing their money from Clark had departed. This conclusively establishes the promise of Johnson as a collateral one. The ingenious theory of counsel for the plaintiffs in error, that seeks to apply the rule that "where one seeks to promote or subserve some interest or purpose of his own by a promise to pay the debt of another, which, if made on a good consideration, is unaffected by the statute of frauds," is not applicable here, because the greater part of the services of Brant & Beachy had already been performed, with a full knowledge on their part that the proceeds of all sales were to be paid to Johnson, and with a special written agreement in their behalf that their agency should not be affected by the execution of the mortgage by Clark to Johnson. With this knowledge when finally they commenced legal proceedings to enforce collection of their commission, Clark was the party against whom they moved, and not Johnson. It would seem from their own acts that this action against Johnson was a dernier ressort. There was no antecedent obligation on the part of Johnson to pay these plaintiffs in error. It is not shown that he was specially benefited, because by the litigation that has resulted it has been adjudicated that he was entitled to the balance in the bank, independent of any agreement with or promise to Brant & Beachy. Brant & Beachy are not brought within any of the judicial exceptions to the statute of frauds. There was no original obligation, and, in the nature of things, the promise of Johnson was a collateral one. In any event, the parol promise must be made upon good consideration, and it is now urged that a good consideration was the fact that Johnson would be saved the trouble and expense of a foreclosure; but he had already provided for that by his contract with Clark, and the mortgage executed by Clark provided in express terms that Clark might sell portions or all the land at fair prices, and that Johnson, upon receiving the purchase price of said sales, shall credit them upon the notes secured by the mortgage. This contract was made by the principal, and Johnson could not be specially benefited by its repetition by the agents. The weight of modern authority now is that the promise, although made upon a new consideration of benefit to the promisor, is held to be collateral, if the original liability remains, and that the promise is within the statute unless it is in effect substituted for the original liability. This rule is sustained from citations from the supreme court reports of Indiana, Iowa, Massachusetts, Michigan, Wisconsin, Mississippi, Georgia, Maine, New York, Nebraska, Ohio, and Pennsylvania, in notes 1 and 2, on page 682, 8 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law.

2. But it is said that the promise of Johnson is in writing, as evidenced by the letter of his agents, Richmond & Titus, to the Goodin Bank, as set forth in the seventh finding of fact. The third conclusion of law of the trial court adopts the language of this court with reference to that contention, and is a conclusive refutation of that claim. It says the authority given by Richmond & Titus to the Goodin Bank in the letter of September 22, 1884, is merely an instruction by one of Johnson's agents to another, and cannot be construed into a contract between Johnson and the plaintiffs in error; and, further, it appears that this instruction was revoked, and others given. No legal liability of Johnson to the plaintiffs in error is shown by the facts contained in the record. It is recommended that the judgment of the district court of Franklin county be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

GROVE V. JENNINGS.

REMOVING CLOUD ON TITLE—DEED IN ESCROW—REDELIVERY.

1. In an action to remove a cloud upon a title, under a petition setting out all of the facts, similar to a bill in equity, and independent of statutory regulations, it is not necessary to allege that the plaintiff was in possession of the premises.

2. Where a deed has been duly executed and placed in escrow by the grantor, to be delivered to the grantee upon the payment of the purchase price, and there is a redelivery of the deed by the depositary to the grantor, and there is no evidence to establish the fact that such redelivery was authorized, or that the grantee had failed to comply with the conditions, held, that the same was unauthorized, and that the findings and judgment in this case are not supported by the evidence.

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Harper county; J. T. HERICK, Judge.

GREEN, C. This was an action brought by Lewis G. Jennings against J. Paul

Grove to remove a cloud upon the title to lot 17, in block 78, in the city of Anthony, in Harper county, and to declare a certain decree of record in the district court of said county affecting said real estate to be null and void. It was alleged that J. B. S. Coplin owned the lot in question on the 14th day of January, 1885; that he and his wife deeded it to the plaintiff, and that the deed was filed for record on the 29th day of January following; that afterwards Grove commenced an action against Coplin and wife to compel the specific performance of a contract to convey said property to him; that he obtained a decree for specific performance; and that the same constituted a cloud upon the title of the plaintiff to said premises. A demurrer was interposed to this petition, which was overruled. The defendant answered—First, by a general denial; second, he admitted that Coplin owned the real estate in controversy on the 14th day of January, 1885; and, third, a cross-petition based upon the judgment and decree before rendered; and alleged that the deed from Coplin and wife to the plaintiff was a cloud upon his title, and asked that he be adjudged to be the owner of said premises. A reply denying the allegations of this cross-petition was filed by the plaintiff. A trial was had upon the issues thus joined to the court, and judgment was rendered for the plaintiff. The plaintiff in error brings the case here.

1. The first assigned error is the overruling of the demurrer to the petition. It is insisted that it lacks two material averments: First, that it did not state that the plaintiff was the owner of the legal or any other title to said premises; second, that the plaintiff was not in possession of the real estate. The first proposition is not tenable. The pleadings state the ownership in Coplin on the 14th day of January, 1885; the plaintiff alleged that on said day Coplin and wife deeded to the plaintiff. We think this a sufficient allegation of ownership and title. The plaintiff in error insists that there is no allegation of possession in plaintiff's petition, and that this is necessary. Is possession necessary in an action to remove a cloud from a title? The doctrine is well settled that courts of equity will grant relief on the principle quia timet,—that is, that the deed or other instrument or proceeding constituting the cloud may be used to injuriously or vexatiously embarrass or affect a plaintiff's title. Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1399. While there appears to be some conflict of opinion as to whether possession is necessary, we think the greater weight of authorities settle the question in favor of the proposition that, where a party out of possession holds the legal title under such circumstances that the law cannot furnish him adequate relief, his resort to equity to have a cloud removed ought not to be questioned, because he may be out of possession or the land vacant. It is said that this was an action to quiet title brought under section 594 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and actual possession was a prerequisite at the time the action commenced. If this were true, counsel's position would be correct, but the action was not brought under section 594, and we do not understand that the statute in regard to quieting titles took away any of the previously existing equitable remedies. This case comes within a well-understood rule of equitable jurisprudence, and is independent of statutory regulations. The relief in such cases is of a kind given under the old practice only in courts of equity, and in cases outside the limits of the statute; and the facts must be fully stated, substantially as in a bill in equity under the former chancery practice. Douglas v. Nuzum, 16 Kan. 515; Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 700-706; Pettit v. Shepherd, 5 Paige, 501; Field v. Holbrook, 6 Duer, 597; Jones v. Smith, 22 Mich. 360. Under this equitable rule a person who holds the legal title to land, though not in possession, may, independently of the statute, maintain a suit in equity to remove a cloud upon his title, and in such suit the court may decree the reformation or cancellation of records, and the execution of deeds or releases. Hager v. Shindler, 29 Cal. 47; Thompson v. Lynch, Id. 189; Kennedy v. Northup, 15 Ill. 148; Redmond v. Pakenham, 66 Ill. 434; Booth v. Wiley, 102 Ill. 84; Tabor v. Cook, 15 Mich. 322; Ormsby v. Barr, 22 Mich. 80; Jones v. Smith, supra; King v. Carpenter, 87 Mich. 363; Low v. Staples, 2 Nev. 209; Almony v. Hicks, 3 Head, 39; Pier v. City of Fond du Lac, 38 Wis. 470; Bunce v. Gallagher, 5 Blatchf. 481.

2. It is next claimed that the findings and judgment of the court below are not sustained by the evidence. This we regard as the most serious question in the case. The evidence established the fact that Grove had been negotiating for the purchase of the lot in controversy before the defendant in error purchased it, and that he had knowledge of such negotiations. He understood that a deed had been executed by Coplin and wife to Grove for this lot, and deposited in a bank at Anthony; that this deed had been withdrawn from the bank by Coplin, and Grove's name had been erased and his own name inserted. The consideration had also been changed from one hundred and seventy-five to three hundred and seventy-five dollars. There was no evidence to establish the fact that the withdrawal and these erasures were authorized by Coplin and wife or either of them. There was no evidence to show that the redelivery by the bank to Coplin was authorized. The record is silent as to the conditions upon which the deed was to be delivered to Grove by the bank; it is not disclosed that the time had expired within which Grove would have been entitled to the deed by paying the consideration. There is no evidence to show Grove's consent to the redelivery to Coplin. Where a deed has been delivered as an escrow, subsequent instructions by the grantor to the depositary cannot change the original nature of the transaction. Robbins v. Magee, 76 Ind. 381; 6 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 863. If Grove had fulfilled the conditions upon his part, the title would have vested in him without further delivery. The contract upon the part of Coplin and wife had been executed; the title had passed from them, subject only to the performance of the conditions upon the part of Grove. Farley v. Palmer, 20 Ohio St. 223. Now, without some evidence to show that the redelivery of the deed was authorized, and that he was lawfully entitled to it, we do not think there is sufficient evidence to uphold the findings and judgment of the trial court, and therefore recommend that the same be reversed.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

CITY OF HUTCHINSON et al. v. DELANO.

INJUNCTION—APPREHENDED NUISANCE—CITY SEWERS.

The apprehended fouling or pollution of a stream of water in the future by the sewage of a part of a city from sewers, which have been legally, scientifically, and properly constructed, but which has not yet taken place, and of which there is no immediate or imminent danger, and which depends upon a contingency that may not happen, does not present a case for an injunction.

Error from district court, Reno county, L. HOUK, Judge.

On March 2, 1889, B. M. Delano commenced his action against the city of Hutchinson and others to perpetually enjoin them from emptying sewage or any filth or offal of the city, or from the houses, hotels, etc., into the waters of Cow creek, and from polluting the waters in any way. At the commencement of the action a temporary restraining order was allowed by the district judge. Subsequently, the city of Hutchinson and the other defendants filed an answer alleging that the city was building and constructing a system of sewers for a portion of the city, and that the sewers so constructed would not be used by more than one-fifth of the inhabitants of the city; that they intended to empty the same into Cow creek, within the corporate limits of the city; but they denied generally the other allegations of the petition. Trial had at the March term of the court for 1889. The court found and filed the following conclusions of fact: "(1) That the plaintiff, B. M. Delano, is the owner of the following described real estate, situated in the county of Reno and state of Kansas, to-wit: The north-west quarter ($\frac{1}{4}$) of section number thirty-three, (33,) in township number twenty-three (23) south, range number five (5) west, of the sixth P. M.,—and resides thereon, with his wife and family, and that they have long occupied the same as their home, and that said real estate is of the value of about six thousand (\$6,000) dollars, including the improvements thereon. (2) That the defendant, the city of Hutchinson, is a city of the second class, duly incorporated under the laws of the state of Kansas; that the defendant L. A. Bigger was the duly elected, qualified, and acting mayor, and the defendants J. B. Brown, W. E. Hutchinson, G. W. Hardy, A. M. West, H. Constant, J. V. Clymer, O. Wolcott, and Frank Vincent were duly elected and qualified and acting councilmen of the defendant the city of Hutchinson at the time this action was commenced, and that the defendants Evans and Jack were partners under the firm name of Evans and Jack, and were contractors with the said city for the purpose of building and constructing certain sewers in said city. (3) That a natural water-course, called 'Cow Creek,' has been for time immemorial, and does now, flow through the ground upon which the said city of Hutchinson is now built, and on through plaintiff's said land, and is the natural drain of said land and ground. (4) That at the time of the commencement of this action said Cow creek was a clear, running stream of water, the purity of which renders it fit for domestic purposes and stock use. (5) That plaintiff's land, through which said Cow creek flows, is situated on said stream about five and one-quarter miles below the said city of Hutchinson. (6) That on said plaintiff's land he had a pasture, fenced with posts and wire, containing about seventy (70) acres, and through which said pasture said Cow creek runs; there being about fifty-eight (58) acres of said pasture on the north side of said stream, and about twelve (12) acres on the south side of said stream. (7) That plaintiff used said pasture for his stock, including his milch cows. The milch cows are used by plaintiff and his family for the purpose of making butter for their own use. (8) That the defendant the city of Hutchinson contains a population of fifteen thousand, and is growing in numbers. (9) That the defendants the city of Hutchinson, its officers, agents, servants, and employees, are threatening and intending to construct immediately a part of a system of sewers in said city for the use of a part of its inhabitants thereof, viz., 4,000 of such inhabitants. (10) That said sewers are what is known as the 'separate system,' and will not receive and carry off the storm water and ordinary street drainage, but are intended for carrying off the sewage from hotels, livery stables, private residences, privies, etc. (11) That said city of Hutchinson, under the contract with the defendants Evans and Jack, are now actually engaged in the laying and constructing of a part of said system of sewers, which portion, when completed, will accommodate about 4,000 people. (12) That the main outlet of the sewer-pipe is twenty-four inches in diameter, the sewage of all the people of said city. (13) That said sewers are so constructed as to empty into said Cow creek at a point within the limits of said city of Hutchinson, and about five miles distant above plaintiff's land. (14) That plaintiff's house on said quarter section of land is north of the said stream called 'Cow Creek,' at the distance of about forty-one rods. (15) That the prevailing winds in this country during the summer months are from the south, and in the winter from the north. (16) That said water in said Cow creek flows ordinarily with the velocity of about a mile in about forty-eight minutes, and that ordinarily the volume of water in said stream is about twenty-eight millions to thirty-six millions gallons per day; that is to say, that amount of water will flow past a given point every twenty-four hours. (17) That during extraordinary and protracted drouth the volume of water flowing in said stream is reduced, and will not exceed fifteen millions gallons every twenty-four hours, but that such occasions are during drouths, and are infrequent. (18) That fifteen hundred thousand gallons flowing every twenty-four hours is necessary to carry off the sewerage from every one thousand population, so that the water moved with the sewerage will not be offensive to the sense of sight, smell, and taste. (19) That plaintiff's said farm is well improved, and has a large barn thereon near his house, and that he has two wells,—one at his house, and the other at his barn; that he has never and does not use the water for anything but stock water, and there is nothing disclosed by the evidence that he would have occasion to use it for any other purposes. (20) That the emptying of said sewerage into said stream will not endanger the lives of plaintiff and his family, or any one residing on said land, and will not be liable to cause such persons to have any disease. (21) That Cow creek heads, about fifty miles above the city of Hutchinson, is from twenty-five to fifty feet wide, one to two feet deep, with sandy bottom and banks; that the fall of said stream from the mouth of said sewer to plaintiff's farm is seventeen and two-thirds feet; that the stream is perennial, and is fed by springs as well as rain water; that there are no trees on its banks between the city of Hutchinson and plaintiff's farm; and that it empties into the Arkansas river a few miles below the farm of plaintiff. (22) That under the city of Hutchinson and plaintiff's farm—indeed, under all Cow Creek valley to its mouth from the city of Hutchinson—is a vast bed of quicksand, through which flows water from the north-west to the south-east, (the direction of the creek;) that this water is on a level with the water of Cow creek; and that on plaintiff's farm as well as at the city on either side of said creek, for an indefinite distance, water can be reached by digging from four to six feet through a sandy loam. (23) That the city of Hutchinson and its officers are authorized by its charter and by proper ordinances to construct sewers and empty same into Cow creek; but no steps, by condemnation or otherwise, were taken against plaintiff or his property. (24) That, some time before the attempt to construct sewers, the city adopted a general system of sewers, including the entire city, or nearly so, so that if any part was constructed it would be in reference to a general system; that said general system comprises the territory south and west of a ridge which runs north-west to south-east through said city, and which is occupied by a majority of the people of said city. No time was fixed for the completion of the entire system, but the intention was to extend it as the exigencies of the city might demand. (25) That before the bringing of this suit the city let a contract to Evans and Jack to construct sewers over a portion of said territory, to-wit, that occupied by about four thousand people, comprising the business part of the city; and said contractors have partly finished the same, and are still engaged in carrying out the contract. When the work is done they are to receive twenty-three thousand dollars. (26) That there is no negligence in the letting of said contract or any construction of said sewers, but they are being put in scientifically. The main pipes, as well as sub-mains and laterals, are glazed earthen pipes, put in with proper fall, with ample ventilators every few hundred feet, with proper flushing conveniences. (27) That there is in said city a system of Holly water-works, which at all times supply an abundance of pure water to the city and the inhabitants of all that part of the territory which will use the sewers, and that thirty gallons or more of water per head each day will be used by the people who will use said sewers, and the city will have an abundant quantity for flushing purposes. (28) That the sewerage passing into the creek will be in fluid shape, and at least ninety-five per cent. water; that of the general deposit, ammonia and albumenoid ammonia in the urine is the deleterious agency; and that it rapidly diffuses by being mixed with water, and oxygenized by the action of air and sunshine. (29) That from each person per day there passes three pints of urine, of which is — per cent. of ammonia, and — per cent. of albumenoid ammonia. (30) That the deposit of fifteen thousand people into Cow creek would probably injure the water on the farm of plaintiff so as to unfit it for drinking and cooking purposes and for milch cows. (31) That the deposit of the people who will use the sewers as now constructed, and in immediate process of construction, will not probably injure the water of Cow creek for either domestic or stock purposes at the farm of plaintiff. (32) That the health and convenience of the city of Hutchinson in that territory proposed to be sewerized by the contract of Evans and Jack, and through which flows Cow creek, require that sewers be constructed." Thereon the court made and filed the following conclusion of law: "That the plaintiff is entitled to an injunction forever restraining the defendants from emptying the sewage of said city into said Cow creek so as to pollute and corrupt the waters thereof to the injury of plaintiff." The defendants excepted, and bring the case here.

Z. L. Wise, Whiteside & Gleason, Swigert & Wisler, and T. S. Brown, for plaintiffs in error. F. L. Martin and Trader, Vendevor & McNell, for defendant in error.

HORTON, C. J., (after stating the facts as above.) It appears from the findings of the court that B. M. Delano, who complains of the city of Hutchinson and its officers and employes on account of their action in constructing a system of sewers in that city, and permitting the sewage to empty into Cow creek, lives five miles below the city of Hutchinson; that Cow creek is a clear, running stream of water, fitted for domestic and stock purposes; that it runs through the city of Hutchinson and the premises of the plaintiff below; that the city of Hutchinson is constructing a system of sewers for 4,000 of its inhabitants, which will carry off the sewage from hotels, livery stables, private residences, etc.; that plaintiff below does not use the water of Cow creek for any other purpose than for his stock; that he has no occasion to use it for any other purpose; that he has two wells,—one at his house, and the other at his barn; that the emptying of the sewage into Cow creek will not endanger the life of plaintiff below, or his family, or any one residing on his land, and will not be liable to cause any person to have disease; that Cow creek is from 25 to 50 feet wide, and 1 or 2 feet deep, with sandy bottom and banks; that the fall of the creek from the mouth of the sewer to plaintiff's farm is 17½ feet; that no time has been fixed for the completion of the entire system of sewers, but the intention is to extend the same as the exigencies of the city may demand; that the sewage of 15,000 people of Hutchinson into Cow creek would probably injure the water of the farm of plaintiff so as to unfit it for drinking and cooking purposes and for the use of milch cows; that the sewage of the people of Hutchinson who will use the sewers now constructed, and in immediate process of construction, will not probably injure the waters of Cow creek for either domestic or stock purposes at the farm of the plaintiff. Upon these findings the most that can be said is that there is an apprehensive pollution or fouling of the water at some future time; possibly, when sewers shall have been constructed for the whole population of Hutchinson, comprising 15,000 people. But under the findings of the court this is not certain, only probable. Clearly, it cannot be said that any immediate danger exists to plaintiff below from the sewage into Cow creek from Hutchinson. The findings disclose that the danger is not imminent, but is wholly contingent, in the future, if certain things are done. Board v. Passaic, (N. J. 1890,) 20 Atl. Rep. 54; Citizens' Coach Co. v. Camden, etc., R. Co., 29 N. J. Eq. 299; Stitt v. Hilton, 81 N. J. Eq. 285; Delaware, etc., R. Co. v. Central Stock-Yard, etc., Co., 43 N. J. Eq. 605, 12 Atl. Rep. 374, and 13 Atl. Rep. 615; Hagerty v. Lee, 45 N. J. Eq. 255, 17 Atl. Rep. 826; Stoudinger v. City of Newark, 28 N. J. Eq. 187; Merrifield v. Worcester, 110 Mass. 216; Brookline v. Mackintosh, 183 Mass. 215; Morgan v. City of Binghamton, 102 N. Y. 500, 7 N. E. Rep. 424; Dunn v. City of Austin, (Tex. 1889,) 11 S. W. Rep. 1125; High, Inj. § 742; Wood, Nuis. §§ 796, 797. The order for the injunction is so doubtful in its language that really it is of little benefit to any one. It forbids the city from emptying its sewage into Cow creek at some time in the future, if such sewage will pollute or corrupt the waters to the injury of plaintiff. It does not forbid the emptying of the present sewage from all of the sewers constructed, or now being constructed. The injunction has but little force. It is unsatisfactory in its terms. It is not definite or certain. It merely declares a proposition of equity, not shown to be applicable in this case.

Upon the findings of fact, we do not think that the injunction should have been granted, and therefore the judgment of the district court will be reversed, and the cause remanded, with direction to the district court to enter judgment in favor of the defendants below, and against the plaintiff. If the exigencies of Hutchinson shall demand in the future the extension or completion of its entire system of sewers, and if the sewage from all of the sewers, when fully completed, should foul or pollute the waters of Cow creek so as to affect in any way the rights of plaintiff below, other and different questions will then be presented. It is sufficient at this time to say there is no pressing necessity for an injunction. The danger is contingent, not immediate and imminent. All the justices concurring.

STATE ex rel. SMITH, County Attorney, v. DENISTON.

VOTERS—QUALIFICATIONS—RESIDENCE—BRIBERY.

1. A man who filed a homestead claim on land in Oklahoma territory and made a settlement and improvements thereon in and after the month of June, 1889, and intended to make said claim his home, and who returned to his former residence in Comanche county, in this state, for a temporary purpose, intending to go back to his claim in Oklahoma, was not a legal voter at an election held in Comanche county on the 5th day of November, 1889.

2. Persons who filed homestead claims on land in Oklahoma territory and made settlement and improvements thereon during and after the month of June, 1889, and who intended to make said homestead claims their homes, and who returned to their former residences in Comanche county, in this state, for a temporary purpose, and agreed to stay and vote at an approaching election if paid for their time, and who voted at said election, and left Comanche county the next day, and have ever since resided in Oklahoma, were not legal voters at an election held in Comanche county on the 5th day of November, 1889.

3. Cattlemen employed on a ranch situated in the Indian Territory, south of the state, working by the month, and who had resided out of the state for more than 35 days prior to the election, and who intended to work on such ranch as long as they were employed, and who had no families residing in Kansas, were not legal voters at an election held in Comanche county, in this state, on the 5th day of November, 1889.

4. When a voter testifies that he was induced to vote for a candidate for office because he was paid a sum of money to so cast his vote, the ballot is an illegal one, and cannot be counted in favor of the candidate in whose interest the money was paid.

JOHNSTON, J., dissenting.

(Syllabus by Simpson, C.)

H. A. Smith and G. C. Clemens, for plaintiff. T. G. Chambers, for defendant.

SIMPSON, C. This is an original action in quo warranto, the object of which is to determine whether Frank Meyer or John I. Deniston was duly elected register of deeds of Comanche county at the general election in 1889. Meyer was declared elected by the board of county canvassers, and received a certificate of election, and within 20 days after the notification of his election, and prior to the second Monday in January, 1890, he took and filed with the county clerk his oath of office, and demanded of Deniston the possession of the office and the things belonging thereto. Deniston, who had previously been elected for a term of two years, and who was legally in the possession of the office, refused to turn it over to Meyer, claiming that he and not Meyer had been elected in 1889. In July, 1890, Meyer tendered to the board of county commissioners, then in regular session, his resignation, which was accepted, and one S. D. Stipp was appointed to serve until the election in 1890. Stipp took the oath of office, filed a bond, and demanded possession of the office from Deniston, who refused to surrender. This action was commenced on behalf of Stipp on the 26th day of July, 1890. The official canvass of the election in 1889 shows 680 votes cast for candidates for the office of register of deeds, and of these Frank Meyer received 345 and John I. Deniston received 335. Deniston alleges that at the polling place of Coldwater township J. M. Stringer, Gater Stringer, Perry Kinman, J. H. Grattner, G. W. Hoffman, Walter Goff, J. S. Calloway, and Samuel Brown voted for Frank Meyer, when in truth and in fact they were not qualified electors, and not entitled to vote at said election; that in Valley township Abram Vanwey, Otto Barley, W. S. Mussett, Isaac Mussett, E. T. Bidwell, H. H. Dunham, James Crouch, Alexander Boland, George Overocker, and Burt Crew voted for Frank Meyer for register of deeds, and that each and all of them were not qualified voters; that in Protection township W. M. Davis, W. Y. Davis, and Newton Davis voted for Frank Meyer for register of deeds, and that each and all of them were not qualified electors; that in Irwin township Jonathan Morgan and C. M. Ross each voted for Frank Meyer for register of deeds, and they were not qualified electors; that in Avilla township Samuel Young voted for Frank Meyer for register of deeds, and he was not a qualified elector; that in Shimer township Thomas Curran and R. C. Brennon voted for Frank Meyer for register of deeds, and they were not legal voters. That one O. P. Snare voted at the polls in this township for Frank Meyer for register of deeds for and in consideration of the sum of $7.50, and that this is an illegal vote; same as to one S. O. Miner, who voted for Meyer for a consideration of $5; same as to one William Maynard. This makes 29 illegal votes that are alleged by Deniston to have been cast for Meyer, and, if these are deducted from the 345 given Meyer by the official canvass, Deniston was legally elected. It is shown by the evidence that Abram Vanwey, Otto Barley, W. S. Mussett, Isaac Mussett, E. T. Bidwell, H. H. Dunham, James Crouch, Alexander Boland, George Overocker, and Burt Crew were at the time of the election, to-wit, on the 5th day of November, 1889, and had been for more than 35 days before that time, residents at Gorham's ranch in the Indian Territory, and were not actual residents or legal voters in the state of Kansas. That on the day before the election they agreed to vote at Valley township precinct, in Comanche county, Kan., and to all vote alike, and to vote for Frank Meyer for register of deeds of Comanche county. They voted at that precinct on the day of election. The poll-books in evidence show that they voted together, their votes being numbered on the poll-books as Nos. 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, and 16. It was shown that the tickets were prepared by Dunham, who scratched the name of John I. Deniston off and inserted the name of Frank Meyer. The handwriting of Dunham in the change of the tickets was conclusively proven, and the tickets themselves were in evidence, and it appears from them that but nine tickets were changed. All these men were most clearly not entitled to vote, and it must be held that there were nine illegal votes for Meyer and one for Deniston. William M. Davis, William Y. Davis, and Newton Davis all testify that they left Comanche county on the 22d day of April, 1889, and went to Oklahoma, and there took homestead claims and made settlement and some improvements on their claims, and intended to make their homes in Oklahoma. That in the month of October they came back to Comanche county for various purposes, intending to return to Oklahoma before the election, but that certain persons agreed with them that if they would stay until after the election and vote they would be paid for their time. They all three stayed, voted for Frank Meyer for register of deeds, and left for Oklahoma on the 6th day of November, the day after the election, where they have ever since resided. It is plain that these three men cast illegal votes for Meyer. It is admitted that J. S. Calloway voted at Coldwater township polls. His ballot is numbered 29 on the poll-books, and the name of Frank Meyer as a candidate for register of deeds appears on that ballot. S. T. Golloher testifies that in September, 1889, and long before that time, he was a resident of the state of Alabama; that he knew J. S. Calloway, who was and had been for five years a resident of the state of Alabama; that when Golloher moved to Kansas in September, 1889, he left Calloway in the state of Alabama, and that Calloway wanted Golloher to bring him to Kansas; that he first saw Calloway in Kansas in the month of October, 1889. On this state of facts it must be held that the vote cast for Meyer by Calloway was an illegal vote. Thomas Curran, who moved from Logan township to Shimer township on the 10th day of October, 1889, had rented a place in Shimer township on the 19th day of September, and before the 10th day of October had moved a part of his household furniture and some livestock and farming implements to the rented place, but still resided in Logan township with his family until the 10th day of October. He voted in Shimer township, and voted for Frank Meyer for register of deeds for Comanche county. C. M. Ross voted in Irwin township, but had moved into that township within 6 or 8 days before the election. Before that time he had been living in Coldwater township, and had been engaged in moving his effects for 60 days prior to the election, intending to make his home and permanent residence in Irwin township. He voted for John I. Deniston for register of deeds. His vote and that of Curran are so similar in their surroundings that the same rule must be applied to both. In this particular case, one having voted for Meyer and the other for Deniston, the result cannot be affected no matter what the decision may be. The legality of the votes of R. C. Brennon, Gater Stringer, and others are challenged on the following grounds: Gater Stringer, whose deposition was taken in Kingfisher county, in the territory of Oklahoma, testifies that on the 8th day of June, 1889, he filed a homestead claim on land in the territory of Oklahoma; that he broke ground and put in a small crop in May and June, 1889, and built his house in November and December, 1889; that, from the time he filed on his claim and made settlement, he intended to make that his home and raise his family there. He went back to Coldwater, Comanche county, his former residence, to see his family, who still remained there; voted at the election on the 5th day of November, 1889, for Frank Meyer for register of deeds; left again for Oklahoma on the 7th day of November; his family followed him shortly afterwards, and they have all resided in Canadian county, Oklahoma, ever since. R. C. Brennon filed a homestead claim on land in Oklahoma on the 4th day of June, 1889. He commenced to make his improvements about the middle of September. He intended to make it his home, and had no intention to return to Comanche county, Kan. His family first came to Oklahoma about the middle of September, 1889, but some time before the election he and his family came back to Comanche county to dispose of what crop they had on hand, and to live until they got ready to move away. He voted and served as a judge of the election in Shimer township. He voted for Frank Meyer for register of deeds. He and his family left Comanche county in the latter part of November for their claim in Oklahoma, where they have ever since resided. Perry Kinman left Comanche county to take a homestead in Oklahoma, and made his filing on the 12th day of June, 1889. He planted some in July, and built his house in the winter. He had been back to Comanche county two or three times, but intended always to and did return to Oklahoma. He was in Comanche county on the day of election, and states that he voted the straight Republican ticket without a scratch. Deniston was the Republican candidate for register of deeds. It is very evident that neither Gater Stringer, R. C. Brennon, nor Perry Kinman were legal voters in Comanche county. Two of them voted for Meyer and one for Deniston. One A. H. Wineburner stated that he had received $10 from Deniston for work done for him during the campaign. At the time Deniston paid him a part of the money he told Wineburner he expected his vote, but Wineburner says that he had not promised to vote for him prior to receiving this money. Deniston does not deny giving the money, but claims he did not offer to pay any until Wineburner had declared that he was going to vote for him, and then the money was furnished to pay the expenses of Wineburner on his trips to different localities. It seems to us that this would be a corrupt vote if it was shown that Wineburner did vote for Deniston. There is an inference arising from what is recited above that Wineburner did so vote, but it is at best an inference, when with Wineburner on the stand it was within the power of the party producing him as a witness to establish the fact. So with the witness Charles E. Ferguson, who testified that during the first part of the campaign he was for Frank Meyer, and during the latter part of the campaign he was for Deniston; that Deniston paid him for certain work he did and expenses incurred on his behalf, but the witness is not asked for whom he voted, nor is it shown by other evidence that he did vote at the election. Samuel Brown testified that he voted at Coldwater for Frank Meyer for register of deeds, and that he was paid the sum of five dollars for his vote in favor of Meyer. This embraces all the material evidence respecting illegal votes cast at that election for either party, but does not include a mass of stuff consisting of loose declarations and hearsay, to which we have given no weight. It appears that the following illegal votes were cast for Meyer, to-wit, those of Abram Vanwey, Otto Barley, W. S. Mussett, Isaac Mussett, E. T. Bidwell, James Crouch, Alexander Boland, George Overocker, Burt Crew, William M. Davis, William Y. Davis, Newton Davis, J. S. Calloway, Gater Stringer, R. C. Brennon, and Samuel Brown. It appears that the following illegal votes were cast for John I. Deniston, to-wit, those of H. H. Dunham and Perry Kinman,—two in all. The canvass of the county board is corrected so as to show that 333 votes were cast for John I. Deniston for register of deeds, and 329 for Frank Meyer for register of deeds, of Comanche county. It is recommended that judgment be entered declaring that John I. Deniston was duly elected register of deeds of Comanche county at the election in question, and that a judgment be rendered in his favor for costs.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered.

VALENTINE, J., concurring.

HORTON, C. J., (concurring.) I think, under the evidence introduced upon the trial, that John I. Deniston was elected register of deeds of Comanche county at the general election held in November, 1889, but in my opinion his majority was only one or two,—not more than two in any event. I think upon the evidence J. S. Calloway should be counted for Meyer; that Thomas Curran was a legal voter for Meyer; and that A. H. Wineburner, who voted, I think, for Deniston, should not be counted, because his vote was a corrupt one. I make the legal votes as follows: Deniston, 331; Meyer, 330,—Deniston's majority, 1. If Wineburner's vote is not taken from Deniston's vote, the canvass should be corrected so as to show: Deniston, 332; Meyer, 330, —Deniston's majority, 2.

JOHNSTON, J., (dissenting.) The evidence submitted is not clear or satisfactory as to the exact number of legal votes that were cast for each candidate, but an examination of the same fails to convince me that the board of county canvassers made any mistake in issuing a certificate of election to Frank Meyer, or that John I. Deniston was elected register of deeds by a majority of the legal votes which were cast.

RECEIVING STOLEN GOODS—EVIDENCE.

In a criminal prosecution for buying and receiving stolen property, under section 92 of the crimes act, where the evidence showed that the property was situated in one county, and the defendant was tried in another, and the only evidence connecting the defendant with the property alleged to have been stolen was the fact that he went from the county where he was tried to the county where the property was found, held, that there was no completed offense committed in the county in which the defendant was tried and convicted, and that such conviction was erroneous.

(Syllabus by Green, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Appeal from district court, Grant county; TRKO. BOTKIN, Judge.

S. N. Wood and A. M. Mackey, for appellant. L. B. Kellogg, Atty. Gen., and Wm. Easton Hutchinsou, for the State.

GREEN, C. The information in this case charged the defendant with feloniously buying and receiving one mare of the value of $100, the property of Karl Gall, Jr., "then lately before feloniously stolen, taken, and carried away," knowing the same to have been so stolen. The part of section 92 of the crimes act which is applicable to this case is as follows: "Every person who shall buy or in any way receive any goods, money, rights in action, personal property, or any valuable security or effects whatsoever * * * that shall have been stolen from another, knowing the same to have been so stolen, shall, upon conviction, be punished in the same manner and to the same extent as for stealing the money, property, or other thing so bought or received." The defendant was tried and convicted in the district court of Grant county on the 21st day of July, 1890, and sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary for two years. He appeals to this court. The evidence in this case shows that the mare alleged to have been stolen was taken by John Stoffel from the place of Karl Gall, in Grant county, about 3 o'clock in the afternoon on Wednesday, March 5, 1890, and led to his place in Kearney county. The claim was made by Stoffel that the animal had been given to him for one of his, which Gall had been charged with shooting. There is no evidence to indicate that the defendant ever received or purchased the mare in Grant county. If he ever received the mare at all, it was in Kearney county. There is no evidence to connect the defendant with the reception or possession of the mare in Grant county; and the only theory upon which the conviction can be upheld is that the offense charged to have been committed was begun in Grant county, and completed in Kearney. In accordance with this theory, the court instructed the jury that if there were any overt acts committed in Grant county, and if there were a series of such overt acts continuing into Kearney county, up to the time of receiving the mare, then such reception would be in Grant county. The overt acts in Grant county, if any, consisted in the defendant being present at Hornaday's printing-office in Ulysses, in Grant county, on the 14th day of March, 1890, where a consultation was had between Stoffel and his attorney in regard to his retaining possession of the mare, and the giving of a redelivery bond, in case the animal should be replevied from him; that the attorney for Stoffel wrote something upon a piece of paper, which he gave to the defendant, and told him to "get that or the mare;" that, in pursuance with the advice, the defendant left town, and went to Surprise, in Grant county, and from there to Stoffel's place, in Kearney county. We do not think the evidence warranted a conviction in Grant county. There was no evidence that the defendant commenced the commission of the offense charged against him in the county in which he was tried. The language of section 23 of the Criminal Code is: "When a public offense has been committed partly in one county and partly in another, or the act or effects constituting or requisite to the consummation of the offense occur in one or more counties, the jurisdiction is in either county." Now, can it be said that the act of the defendant in going from one county to another, under the advice of counsel, to aid a person in maintaining what he regarded as his legal rights, constituted any element of the crime alleged? The defendant was charged with buying and receiving stolen property in Grant county. It is conceded that he did not buy or receive the mare in Grant county, but it is insisted that the overt act which led to the commission of the offense had its inception in this county. Can this be true? The elementary principle is so firmly established that there must be some act, coupled with an evil intent, to constitute, in law, a crime, that it is but necessary to state it. Suppose it should appear that the defendant started from Ulysses for the purpose of obtaining the mare in Kearney county, it might be said that the evil intent existed in his mind, but unless that evil intent was combined with some act in Grant county the offense would not be complete. We do not think the fact that the defendant traveled from one county to another was such an overt act as would constitute an offense. The evil intent might have existed in the mind of the defendant while in Grant county; yet, if no act was committed there, one necessary element of the crime would be lacking. There must be a concurrence, in point of time, of the act and intent, to constitute an offense. If the evil intent existed in the defendant's mind in Grant county, to receive the animal charged to have been stolen, there was no act coupled with such intent, and hence there was no completed crime committed in Grant county by the defendant. It is recommended that the judgment of the district court be reversed.

REVIEW ON APPEAL — TEMPORARY INJUNCTION — RESTRAINING TAX LEVY.

1. An order of the district court, or a judge thereof at chambers, allowing a temporary injunction, may be reviewed in the supreme court before final judgment in the case.

2. Before an injunction can be granted to restrain the levying or collection of a tax, some step must be taken by the taxing officers towards the levying or collection of the same.

8. Wyandotte & K. C. Bridge Co. v. Board of County Com'rs, 10 Kan. 326; Challiss v. City of Atchison, 39 Kan. 276, 18 Pac. Rep. 195, cited and followed.

(Syllabus by Strang, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Cowley county; M. G. TROUP, Judge.

John W. Shartel, for plaintiff in error.
D. J. Weir, for defendants in error.

STRANG, C. This was an application by the tax-payers of sewer district No. 1, Arkansas City, for a temporary injunction, made before the district judge of Cowley county at chambers, to enjoin the defendant city, and the mayor and clerk thereof, from making and collecting certain assessments against the property of the plaintiffs in payment of bonds which it is alleged were about to be issued to pay for the construction of a system of sewers in said district, and to enjoin the said city, and the mayor and clerk thereof, from issuing said bonds to pay for said sewer, and to enjoin the defendants Andrews and Quigley from obtaining, or attempting to obtain or negotiate, such bonds. The application for the injunction was made on the 1st day of August, 1890, and the petition, among other things, alleged that the mayor and council of the city of Arkansas City had attempted to create within said city a sewer district known as "Sewer District No. 1," and had let a contract to M. L. Andrews, or to M. L. Andrews for J. B. Quigley, for the construction of a system of sewers in said sewer district; that the said contractors did not comply with the terms of the contract in the construction of said system of sewers, but constructed said sewers in such a negligent, careless, unskillful, and unworkmanlike manner as to render them useless and of no value to said city; that the defendant city, and the officers thereof, unlawfully threaten to and are about to issue bonds for said work to defendant Andrews; that the defendant Benedict, clerk of said city, is about to certify the amount found due and assessed against the property owned by these plaintiffs to the county clerk, for the purpose of being spread upon the tax-rolls of said county. The application was heard by the judge at chambers, a demurrer to the petition was overruled, and a temporary injunction allowed as prayed for. The plaintiff herein objected to the order allowing the temporary injunction, and comes here with his case made and asks this court to review and reverse the order of the judge allowing said temporary injunction.

The first question is raised by a challenge to the jurisdiction of this court. It is asserted that an order of a judge at chambers allowing a temporary injunction is a mere interlocutory order, and may not be reviewed by this court before final judgment. This question involves an examination of the following sections of our statutes: Section 237 of the Code provides as follows: "The injunction provided by this Code is a command to refrain from a particular act. It may be the final judgment in an action, or it may be allowed as a provisional remedy, and, when so allowed, it shall be by order." The judgment in this case is clearly not the final judgment in the action. It was allowed by a judge at chambers, and is by said judge declared to be a temporary injunction. It is not, and could not be, a final judgment in an action, because a judge at chambers could not render a final judgment, and because the action is still pending in the district court, and no final judgment has ever been rendered therein. Not being a final judgment in a case, it follows from the section of the statute above quoted that it was allowed as a provisional remedy. Does any statute of our state permit an appeal from an order allowing an injunction as a provisional remedy? It is conceded that if an appeal lies from such an order it is by force of some statutory provision. Section 542 of the Code reads as follows: "The supreme court may reverse, vacate, or modify a judgment of the district court for errors appearing on the record, and in the reversal of such judgment or order may reverse, vacate, or modify any intermediate order involving the merits of the action, or any portion thereof. The supreme court may also reverse, vacate, or modify any of the following orders of the district court, or a judge thereof: First. A final order. Second. An order that grants or refuses a continuance; discharges, vacates, or modifies a provisional remedy; or grants, refuses, vacates, or modifies an injunction; that grants or refuses a new trial; or that confirms or refuses to confirm the report of a referee; or that sustains or overrules a demurrer. Third. An order that involves the merits of an action, or some part thereof." The contention of the defendants in error is that the injunction mentioned in the above section, and from which an appeal may be taken under the provisions thereof, is the final judgment in the action, and that there is no other provision for an appeal from an injunction, and therefore no appeal from an order allowing an injunction as a provisional remedy. We do not think such contention is supported by a fair construction of the whole section. The first part of the section provides that "the supreme court may reverse, vacate, or modify a judgment of the district court,—that is, the supreme court may reverse, vacate, or modify any final judgment of the district court, which includes the final judgment in an injunction proceeding as much as the final judgment in any other kind of an action. This part of the section then provides for the reversal, vacation, or modification of an injunction when such injunction is the final judgment in an action. Further along in the section it provides that "the supreme court may also reverse, vacate, or modify any of the following orders of the district court, or a judge thereof: First, a final order; second, an order that grants or refuses a continuance, discharges, vacates, or modifies a provisional remedy, or grants, refuses, vacates, or modifies an injunction,"—that is, an order that grants an injunction. An injunction allowed by an order is a provisional remedy. It is not allowed by an order when it is a final judgment. It is clear to us that the injunction mentioned in this section is an injunction employed as a provisional remedy,—an injunction allowed by an order of the court, or a judge thereof. See, also, Wyandotte & K. C. Bridge Co. v. Board of County Com'rs, 10 Kan. 326; Challiss v. City of Atchison, 39 Kan. 276, 18 Pac. Rep. 195; Snively v. Buggy Co., 36 Kan. 106, 12 Pac. Rep. 522. In this last case Judge VALENTINE, writing the opinion, says: "With reference to all provisional remedies except injunctions the statute uses only the words 'discharges,' 'vacates,' and 'modifies.' Hence, as the statutes show, it was clearly not the intention of the legislature that an order of the district court granting, refusing, confirming, or sustaining a provisional remedy, except as to injunctions, should be reviewed in the supreme court prior to the final judgment in the case; nor was it the intention of the legislature that an order 'involving the merits' of a provisional remedy, except as to injunctions, should be reviewed by the supreme court prior to such final judgment, unless such order discharged, vacated, or modified the provisional remedy. The legislature had the whole subject of the reviewing of judgments and orders under consideration, and evidently, from the language used, it did not intend that an order granting, refusing, confirming, or sustaining any provisional remedy, except an injunction, should be re-examined by the supreme court prior to the final judgment." While the question of an appeal from an order allowing an injunction as a provisional remedy was not involved in the case under consideration at the time, Judge VALENTINE seems to have considered the whole subject of review of judgments and orders, and among other things to have concluded that the statute authorized the review of an order of the district court or judge thereof allowing an injunction as a provisional remedy, yet we think his construction of the statute in that regard the proper one to put upon it, and therefore we say that an order of the district court or judge thereof allowing an injunction as a provisional remedy may be reviewed by this court without waiting for a final judgment in the case.

This case being properly here for review we will next consider the question raised by the demurrer to the petition, which was overruled. The demurrer, among other things, alleged that said petition failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against the defendants. This branch of the demurrer challenged the petition generally, and therefore, if for any reason the petition failed to state a cause of action, it was error to overrule the demurrer thereto. Under the law as enunciated in the case of Wyandotte & K. C. Bridge Co. v. Board of County Com'rs, 10 Kan. 326, followed in the case of Challiss v. City of Atchison, 39 Kan. 276, 18 Pac. Rep. 195, this case seems to have been prematurely brought. In the former case it was held that, before an injunction can be granted to restrain the levying or collection of a tax, some step must be taken by the taxing officers towards the levying or collecting of the same. The language of the petition in that case, so far as it relates to the particular question now under consideration, is similar to the language of the petition in this case. The petition in that case says "that said defendant is about to issue bonds of said county, and is about to cause to be levied a tax upon the taxable property of said county to pay interest upon said bonds." In the present petition the allegations are "that the defendant city and the officers thereof unlawfully threaten and are about to issue bonds for said work to M. L. Andrews, and that the clerk of said city is about to certify the amount found due and assessed against the property of the plaintiffs, to the county clerk, to be spread upon the tax-rolls." In the last case above cited it is said: "It is the levy, collection, or proceeding to enforce an alleged tax, charge, or assessment that may be enjoined." In this case, as in that, the petition does not allege "either a levy, collection, or proceeding to enforce" the alleged tax, charge, or assessment, but does allege that the city threatens and is about to issue bonds, and is about to certify the assessment against the property of the plaintiffs to the county clerk, to be placed upon the tax-roll of the county. The plaintiffs could not be hurt until a levy was made, or some attempt is being made to collect the tax assessed against the property. There are many other questions in this case, but as to all of them we express no opinion. It is recommended that the order of the judge allowing the injunction be reversed.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

CLAIMS AGAINST COUNTIES — PRESENTING FALSE ACCOUNT—INDICTMENT.

An indictment which charges that the defendant named therein made out an account against Finney county for $1,551.05 in favor of himself, and attached thereto a statement that the charges are the legal and ordinary charges for the services named therein; that credit has been given the county for all payments and offsets to which it is entitled; and that the account is just, correct, is due and unpaid; which statement was sworn to before the county clerk of said county; and the account was then filed in his office by said defendant, to be presented to the board of county commissioners for their action thereon when they should meet; and also alleges that the charges therein were not the legal and ordinary charges for such services, but were greatly in excess of the legal and ordinary charges for such services; that credit had not been given the county on said account for payments made, and offsets to which it was entitled; that the account was not true, correct, due and unpaid, but, on the contrary, was untrue, incorrect, and had been paid; and that the defendant, in making oath to said account, acted willfully and corruptly,—states a public offense, and it was error for the court to sustain a motion to quash said indictment upon the ground that it does not state an offense.

(Syllabus by Strang, C.)

J. N. Ives, Atty. Gen., and H. F. Mason, for the State. Hopkins & Hoskinson, for appellee.

STRANG, C. In this case the grand jury of Finney county, Kan., found an indictment against the defendant, J. W. Gregory, charging him with the crime of perjury in taking the following oath, attached to an account against the county of Finney in favor of the Garden City Sentinel:

"County voucher: The County of Finney, in the State of Kansas, to the Garden City Sentinel, Dr.:

September 27th, 1886. To publishing election proclamation, Kansas, Texas, and

S. W. Rly.....	$1,106 30
To publishing petition, same.....	444 75

"Statement: Finney county, Kansas—ss.: I do solemnly swear that I am the within-named claimant, and that I have had the means of knowing personally the facts therein set forth; that I have given credit to said county for all payments and offsets to which it is entitled; that the charges therein are the legal and ordinary charges for such services, dollar for dollar, and that the within account is just and correct, is due and unpaid. So help me God. J. W. GREGORY. Sworn to and subscribed before me, this 17th day of November, A. D. 1888. O. V. FOLSOM, Co. Clerk."

Attached to said account and affidavit was a further itemized statement of the same account, and also copies of the proclamation and petition for the publication of which the account was rendered, with proof of their publication. When sworn to, the account was presented by the defendant to the county clerk to be filed as a claim against said county of Finney. The indictment alleges that said statement so sworn to was not true; that an account for the same services had previously been presented to the board of county commissioners and allowed, and a warrant issued in payment therefor; that said charges were not the usual and ordinary charges for such services, but were greatly in excess of the usual and ordinary charges for such services; that one item of $444.75, a part of said account, was not a proper or legal charge against said county under any circumstances; that the defendant, in taking said oath, acted unlawfully, feloniously, willfully, and corruptly. A motion to quash the indictment was presented to the district court, and overruled. Trial by the court and a jury was had, resulting in a conviction of the defendant. Motions for new trial and in arrest of judgment were argued and overruled. These motions were heard and passed upon August 1, 1889. August 19th, thereafter, a new motion for new trial was heard by the same court, and sustained. Then a second motion to quash the indictment was entertained by the court; and this time it, too, was sustained. The state appeals, and the question is, does the indictment charge an offense? We think it does. Section 148 of the crimes act reads as follows: "Every person who shall willfully and corruptly swear, testify, or affirm falsely to any material matter, upon any oath or affirmation or declaration legally administered in any cause, matter, or proceeding before any court, tribunal, public body, or officer, shall be deemed guilty of perjury."

Counsel for defendant exhibit a good deal of industry and skill in the preparation of their brief in this court, but the result of their labor consists principally in technical objections to the indictment, with argument and citations in support of them, all of which is unsuited to the condition of things under our statutes. We have statutes providing for the presentation of claims against the counties of the state to the board of county commissioners of the respective counties for allowance and payment. Such statutes provide that claims so presented shall be accompanied by a statement that the charges therein are the legal and ordinary charges for the kind of services for which the claim is made; that credit has been given the county for all payments thereon, and for all offsets which the county has a right to recoup against the same; and that the account is just and correct, is due and unpaid. The statute also provides that this statement must be verified upon the oath of the claimant. The indictment charges, and counsel for defendant admit in their brief, that the defendant made out a claim against the county of Finney for services rendered the county, and attached thereto the statement required by law, and swore to the same before the clerk of the county, who is ex officio the clerk of the board of county commissioners, and filed said statement with said clerk to be presented to the board of county commissioners to be acted on by them when they should meet. We think, when this was done, if done willfully and corruptly, the crime of perjury was accomplished. All argument that the oath was not in a material matter, that it was not taken in a judicial proceeding nor before a judicial tribunal, is unavailing, in the presence of our statutes which provide for the very thing to be done that was done, and also of section 148, above quoted, which provides that the oath may be taken before a public officer, and that if it is false, and is made willfully and corruptly, it shall constitute perjury. The matter in connection with which the oath was taken was a claim against the county for the sum of $1,551.05. Can it be said that a claim for such an amount against the county is not a material matter, or can it be said that the oath to such a claim is not material to the claim, when the statute expressly provides that the claim shall be verified by oath? But it is said by the counsel in their brief that the matter of the claim and oath thereto are not material, because the statement of the claim which was sworn to shows upon its face that it was barred by the statute relating to the presentation of claims against counties. We do not think this relieves the defendant from the result of his conduct in making and swearing to the claim, but, if material in this connection at all, should operate rather as an aggravation of the offense, since it necessarily admits an attempt on the part of the defendant to collect a claim that counsel say the board of county commissioners are by statute expressly prohibited from paying. We think the information states an offense. It follows, therefore, that the court committed error in sustaining the motion to quash. It is recommended that the action of the court in quashing the indictment be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceeding.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

CRIMINAL LAW—DEFENDANT AS WITNESS—CROSS-EXAMINATION—EXCEPTIONS TO RULINGS.

1. A defendant who voluntarily becomes a witness in his own behalf is subject to the same rule as any other witness, and may be asked by the state, on cross-examination, if he had not been convicted of larceny at the previous term of the same court in which he was being tried.

3. An objection to evidence, to be available, should be made and excepted to when it is introduced.

Commissioners' decision. Appeal from district court, Cowley county; M. G. TROUP, Judge.

W. D. Halfhill, for appellant. J. N. Ives, Atty. Gen., and C. L. Swartz, for the State.

GREEN, C. The appellant Frank Handy was convicted, with one Jake Probasco, at the September term, 1890, of the district court of Cowley county, of grand larceny, and was sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary for three years. He appeals to this court, and asks a reversal of the judgment and sentence, upon a number of grounds.

1. It is claimed that during the cross-examination of the appellant the state was permitted, against his objection, to ask the following question: "As a matter of fact, at the last term of this court you were convicted of grand larceny, were you not?" which was answered: "Yes, sir; I pleaded guilty here to larceny last court,"—and that this was error. The claim of the appellant is not well founded. This court has said, where a defendant, in a criminal case, takes the witness stand to testify in his own behalf, he assumes the character of a witness, and is entitled to the same privileges, and subject to the same tests, and to be contradicted, discredited, or impeached the same, as any other witness. State v. Pfefferle, 36 Kan. 90, 12 Pac. Rep. 406, and authorities there cited. As stated in the opinion, these authorities are to the effect that, for the purpose of impairing his credibility, a witness may be cross-examined as to specific facts tending to discredit him as a witness, although such facts are irrelevant and collateral to the main issue. Under the rule thus established there was no error in the cross-examination of the appellant.

2. Complaint is also made that the trial court erred in its charge to the jury concerning a conspiracy between the defendants on trial and the admissions of one of the defendants. We cannot consider this error, for the reason that no exception was taken to the giving of the instructions or any portion of them. This court will not review instructions given by the district court to the jury unless they are excepted to at the time. Commissioners v. Boyd, 31 Kan. 765, 3 Pac. Rep. 523; Gafford v. Hall, 39 Kan. 166, 17 Pac. Rep. 851; Mercantile Co. v. Fullam, 43 Kan. 181, 23 Pac. Rep. 104. Section 219 of the Criminal Code provides that exceptions to any decisions of the court may be made in the same manner as provided by law in civil cases.

3. The appellant's last assignment of error is that the court permitted the state to ask the defendant Probasco "if Handy did not have a sister upon whom he [Probasco] was waiting" and for that reason he was attempting to shield Handy. No objection was made to the question, and no exception taken at the time. An objection, to be available, must run to the specific testimony which is objectionable. State v. Cole, 22 Kan. 474; Long v. Kasebeer, 28 Kan. 240. In this case no objection was made to the question, and no exception taken at the time to the answer; hence the error cannot be considered. It is recommended that the judgment be affirmed.

Commissioners' decision. Appeal from district court, Elk county; M. G. TROUP, Judge.

M. B. Light and J. V. Beekman, for petitioner. Luther Scott and J. N. Ives, Atty. Gen., for respondent.

SIMPSON, C. An information was filed against one F. Keeler in the district court of Chautauqua county charging that the defendant on the 23d day of August, 1889, unlawfully, willfully, and maliciously made, composed, and circulated against the appellant, S. Lowe, a certain false, malicious, defamatory, and scandalous letter, writing, and communication, set forth in full in said information. A change of venue was taken to Elk county, and the case was tried in the district court of that county before a jury, and a verdict returned October 14, 1889, finding the defendant not guilty; that the prosecution was instituted without probable cause and from malicious motives; and stating the name of the prosecuting witness to be S. Lowe. The defendant, Keeler, was discharged from custody without day. On the 17th day of October, 1890, the appellant, as prosecuting witness, filed a motion for a new trial so far as the verdict related to him as a prosecuting witness, which was overruled. On the 18th day of October he filed a motion in arrest of judgment, and this was overruled. The distinct causes for a new trial and arrest of judgment were: First. That upon the trial had he had not been heard either in person or by his attorney in his own defense touching the matter in controversy, being neither plaintiff nor defendant in the action. Second. That the trial court erred in matters of law, permitting certain depositions to be read, and in certain instructions respecting the same. Third. Error in instruction respecting section 326, c. 82, Code Crim. Proc. Fourth. That the verdict is contrary to the law and the evidence in the case. Fifth. That the court erred in its instruction respecting section 275, c. 31, Comp. Laws 1885; that said section is unconstitutional and void. On motion for arrest of judgment he claimed he had a right to be heard, and that he had a right to a separate trial, which he demands. The court pronounced judgment on the verdict that S. Lowe pay all costs of said action, taxed at $1,053.40; that he be committed to the jail of Elk county until such costs are paid, or until he executes a good and sufficient bond, with two or more sureties, in the sum of $2,500, to be approved by the sheriff of said county, conditioned that he pay all costs in said action within six months from the date of said judgment. At the time the judgment for costs was rendered and the various rulings of the trial court were made, the appellant saved exceptions. A bill of exceptions was duly signed by the court and attested, and an appeal taken to this court. Some of the questions discussed by the counsel for the appellant, both in his oral argument and his elaborate brief, have been decided adverse to his views.

He claims that both section 275 of the crimes act and section 326 of the Code of Criminal Procedure are unconstitutional and void for a variety of reasons.

1. We are met by a very serious question on the threshold of the consideration of this record, and that is whether this court can review the rulings and proceedings of the court below. We are asked to set aside the judgment of the court below against this appellant for costs for the reason that the lower court committed many grievous errors of law at the trial, and because the statutes authorizing such a judgment of costs are unconstitutional and void. In the case of State v. Zimmerman, 31 Kan. 85, 1 Pac. Rep. 257, which was a prosecution for criminal libel, the jury acquitted the defendant; found that the prosecution was instituted without probable cause and from malicious motives. On motion of the defendant the part of the verdict was set aside that found want of probable cause and malicious motives, and a judgment for costs was rendered against Leavenworth county. The state reserved the question of costs under section 283 of the Criminal Code, and appealed to this court. This court say: "In all prosecutions for libel, the jury have the right to determine, at their discretion, the law and the fact, and therefore the instructions of the court are not to bind the consciences of the jury, but only to inform their judgments. Under section 326 of the Criminal Code the jury trying the case exercised the right permitted by the statute of stating in their finding the name of the prosecutor, and that the prosecution was instituted without probable cause and from malicious motives. The court had no power to set aside a verdict in such a case, and it was equally powerless to set aside a part thereof. Therefore, in the absence of such power, the order of the court was erroneous and must be reversed." Counsel for plaintiff in error criticises this decision, and very earnestly inquires "why the trial court had no power to set aside a part of the verdict." The reason is an obvious one: it is because a statute of the state expressly gives the jury in such an action the right, power, and discretion to determine the law and the fact for themselves. Counsel attacks this provision of the statute and says it is unconstitutional and void, but he forgets that within his memory the practice in criminal cases in almost all, if not all, of the states was for the jury to pass upon the law and the facts. The force of another universal practice of courts everywhere ought to be adverted to, and that is, when a jury return a verdict of not guilty in a criminal case, the trial court has no power to set it aside or modify it in any respect. These findings against the prosecuting witness were a part of a verdict of a jury in a criminal case, wherein express power by statutory enactment is given a jury to determine both the law and the facts. The trial court has no power to interfere with that verdict in any prejudicial respect, and this court is as powerless as the court below.

2. The constitutionality of the other statute has been upheld by this court in the case of In re Ebenhack, 17 Kan. 618, (decided many years ago.)

3. It is not necessary for us to attempt a construction of sections 252 and 326 of the Criminal Code, as there was no motion to retax the costs filed in the court below, and the record discloses no ruling on that question. It is true that there is a statement made by the clerk, attached to the record, long after its filing in this court, showing that the full amount of costs accruing in the case is $1,585.90, and of this it is said that $1,181 are the costs of prosecution and $404.90 of the defense; but we are governed by the record, and that recites a judgment for costs against the prosecuting witness of $1,053.40. All that we can do in the present condition of the record on the question of costs is to recommend that the judgment for the amount of costs named therein be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

CITY OF ARGENTINE et al. v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. May 9, 1891.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — ERECTION OF CITY HALL — SALE OF REAL ESTATE — PURCHASE OF CITY HALL SITE — INJUNCTION.

1. A city of the second class is authorized to purchase a site and erect thereon a city hall necessary for the accommodation of its officers and the transaction of its business.

2. The expediency and wisdom of purchasing a site and constructing such a building are to be determined by the mayor and council, and as a general rule the courts cannot interfere with their discretion either in the selection of the site or the time when such a building shall be erected; and the fact that the city already owns a lot which was acquired as a site for a city hall, which may be unsuitable and inadequate, will not preclude it from purchasing another.

3. A city has express authority to sell its real property; and, when it is determined to be expedient and necessary to do so, the mayor and council may dispose of the same at such time and upon such terms of payment as they deem most conducive to the interests of the city.

4. A site for a city hall may be purchased by a city in pursuance of an ordinance passed for that purpose, although no ordinance has been enacted specifically providing for the construction of the building.

5. The mayor and council may purchase a site for a city hall without being instructed to do so by a vote of a majority of the electors, and may pay for the same out of any money provided specially for that purpose, or out of any unexpended money belonging to the general fund of the city.

6. In a petition filed in behalf of the state it is alleged that the mayor and council of the city of A. had provided by ordinances for the purchase of a site for a city hall and to pay for the same; that, professing to have been instructed by a vote of the people, they had issued, negotiated, and sold the bonds of the city in the sum of $10,000 to construct a building to be known as the "City Hall," and to furnish offices for the various officers of the city, and received for the bonds so negotiated and sold the sum of about $10,000, which amount was then in the hands of the city treasurer. The bonds are alleged to have been illegally issued; but what the defects were, or whether they were good in the hands of innocent holders, was not stated. It was further alleged that the mayor and council proposed to expend $1,600 of the proceeds of the sale of the bonds for the purchase of certain lots upon which to construct the city hall, and the state asked that the city and its officers be enjoined from expending the money for that purpose. Held, upon a demurrer, that the allegations of the petition do not disclose such an interest in the public as would authorize the state to maintain the action.

Error from district court, Wyandotte county; O. L. MILLER, Judge.

Action of injunction, brought in the name of the state by the county attorney of Wyandotte county, to enjoin the city of Argentine and the mayor and council thereof from appropriating or expending any portion of the proceeds of the sales of city bonds issued for the purpose of building a city hall in the city of Argentine in the purchase of lots upon which to erect such hall. The following is a copy of the amended petition filed by the state: "The plaintiff for cause of action against the defendants alleges and shows to the court: (1) That the defendant the city of Argentine is a public corporation organized under the laws of the state of Kansas as a city of the second class; that the defendant William McGeorge is the mayor of said city, and the other defendants [naming them] are the councilmen of said city. (2) That on the 24th day of November, 1890, the said mayor and councilmen of the said city of Argentine enacted two certain ordinances, numbered, respectively, '263' and '264,' copies of which said ordinances are hereto annexed, marked, respectively, Exhibits 'A' and 'B' and made a part of this petition. (3) That on or about the 1st day of May, 1890, the mayor and councilmen of said city of Argentine, pretending and professing to act under and pursuant to paragraph 792 of the General Statutes of Kansas of 1889, being section 35 of 'An act to incorporate cities of the second class and to repeal former acts,' approved February 28, 1872, and pretending and professing to have been instructed so to do by a majority of all the votes cast at an election held in said city for that purpose, did issue, negotiate, and sell the bonds of said city in the sum of ten thousand dollars for the purpose of constructing a building to be known as a 'City Hall,' and to furnish offices for the various officers of said city, and did receive for said bonds so negotiated and sold the sum of about ten thousand dollars, which sum of money is now in the hands of the treasurer of said city of Argentine. (4) That the said mayor and councilmen of the said city of Argentine have denominated said fund so received from the sale of said bonds as 'the City Hall Building Fund of the City of Argentine,' and by said ordinances Nos. 263 and 264 are attempting to and threaten to appropriate, use, and expend $1,600 of the proceeds of the sale of said bonds for the purchase of lots 1, 2, 3, and 4 in block 2, Meyer's addition to the city of Argentine, mentioned and described in said ordinances, and, unless restrained from so doing by this court, will immediately proceed to use, appropriate, and expend said money for the purpose of purchasing said lots. (5) That at the time of the issuing, negotiation, and sale of the aforesaid bonds the said city of Argentine was and now is the owner of a lot or tract of land theretofore acquired by it as a site for a city hall; that said mayor and councilmen have not been instructed by a majority of all the votes cast at any election held in said city of Argentine for that purpose to borrow any money, to issue any bonds, or to make any appropriation whatever for the purchase of a new site for a city hall, or to construct a city hall; and no ordinance or resolution providing for the construction of a city hall or making an appropriation therefor has been enacted by said city, nor has any estimate of the cost of such work or improvement been made by the city engineer and submitted to the council of said city; and said mayor and councilmen have no authority in fact or in law to use, appropriate, or expend any portion of the moneys received as the proceeds for the sale of said bonds in the purchase of said lots, or for any other purpose, or to make any expenditure for the purchase of a site for or for the construction of a city hall. Wherefore plaintiff prays that said defendants, and each and every of them, may be restrained and enjoined from appropriating, using, or expending any portion of the proceeds of the sale of said bonds so issued for the purpose of building said city hall, in the purchase of said lots hereinbefore described, or for any other purpose, and for such other and further relief as in equity it may be entitled to." The ordinances referred to in the petition were, —first, one authorizing the mayor, as the agent of the city of Argentine, to purchase four lots in the city as a site for the city hall at the price of $1,600, which was approved November 25, 1890, and duly published on November 27, 1890. The second ordinance referred to is one appropriating $1,600 in payment for the lots purchased as a site for the city hall. This ordinance was approved on November 25, 1890, and was duly published. A temporary injunction was granted after a hearing upon the amended petition, and immediately thereafter the city and its officers filed a general demurrer to the amended petition, which was argued and overruled. The defendants elected to stand upon the demurrer, and judgment was entered for the plaintiff granting a perpetual injunction. The defendants excepted, and bring the case here for review.

Thomas J. White, for plaintiffs in error.
J. M. Asher, T. A. Pollack, and Hutchings & Kephlinger, for the State.

JOHNSTON, J., (after stating the facts as above.) The question for determination is the sufficiency of the petition. Do the facts alleged authorize the interference of the state by a proceeding of injunction? It appears that the city of Argentine is proposing to purchase a site upon which to erect a city hall in order to provide office rooms for the various officers of the city. An ordinance has been enacted authorizing the mayor to purchase four certain lots for that purpose at the specified price of $1,600, and another ordinance was enacted appropriating that sum to pay for the site. A fund of about $10,000 has been provided for the construction of a city hall, and the mayor and council are proposing to use a portion of this fund to pay for the site. It is said that their action is unwarranted because the city is without power to purchase such a site, but there is no ground for this contention. Express authority is given a city of the second class to purchase and hold real estate for the use of the city, and to sell and convey any which it owns, and to make such orders respecting the same as may be conducive to the interests of the city. Gen. St. 1889, par. 759. Then there is the further provision empowering the council to purchase grounds for and to erect market-houses and all other necessary buildings. Gen. St. 1889, par. 813. It is proper for the city to provide a public building for the accommodation of its officers, and, as we have seen, abundant authority is expressly given to purchase real estate and to construct a public building thereon. The wisdom and expediency of purchasing a site and constructing a building are to be determined by the mayor and council, and, as a general rule, the court cannot interfere with their discretion either in the selection of the site or the time when such a building shall be constructed.

The objection that the city already owns a lot which was acquired as a site for a city hall is not good. Authority is vested in the city, as we have seen, to sell any real property which it owns. A site or building which is suitable and sufficient at one time may by the growth of the city become entirely unsuitable and inadequate. The expediency of selling the real estate which the city owns, and purchasing another location deemed to be more convenient and suitable, is to be determined by the mayor and council, and not by the court. When they determine that it is expedient and necessary to construct a city hall and to purchase a new site therefor there is no reason why they may not proceed to do so before the old one is sold and disposed of. The city is authorized in general terms to sell real property, without specification as to time or manner. It may therefore dispose of the same at such time and upon such terms of payment as may be deemed most conducive to the interests of the city. City of Wyandotte v. Zeitz, 21 Kan. 660. It is contended that if the statutory authority referred to carries the power to purchase a site for a city hall, then before a new site can be purchased it must appear that a new city hall is to be built, and an ordinance must be enacted for that purpose. In reply to this it may be said that the enactment of the ordinances providing for the purchase of and payment for the lots for a new site was practically a determination that a new city hall was to be erected. Even if it were not, the purchase of a site is a necessary preliminary before proceeding with the construction of the building; and, until the purchase is effected, an ordinance providing for the construction does not seem to be absolutely necessary. When the location is determined and the site procured, the mayor and council may thereafter exercise their discretion, and provide by ordinance the time and manner of constructing the building.

The objection that there has been no vote instructing the mayor and council to purchase a site or to construct a city hall is not material. The statute prescribes no such requirement. If bonds are to be issued or money borrowed for making an improvement of a general nature, a vote of a majority of the electors is necessary. Gen. St. 1889, par. 792. This provision, however, applies only where bonds are to be issued or money borrowed, but it is not absolutely essential to the purchase of a site or the determination to construct a necessary public building. For these purposes authority is given elsewhere; and, if there is sufficient money in the treasury belonging to the general fund, it may doubtless be appropriated to pay for the same. As has already been said, the purchase of necessary real estate and the construction of public buildings rests in the discretion of the city officers, and, in the absence of fraud or some statutory restriction, the courts cannot interfere.

According to the allegations of the petition, the city had on hand a city hall building fund of about $10,000, which appears to have been derived from the issue and negotiation of bonds issued in pursuance of an election; but it is averred that the officers have never been instructed by a majority of the votes cast to issue the bonds for the purchase of a site or the erection of a hall; and it is therefore contended that the city cannot appropriate or expend any portion of the proceeds of these bonds, either for the purchase of a site or the erection of the building. It is not alleged that the site which has been purchased is in an inconvenient location, nor that the price paid for the same was excessive, nor yet that there was any fraud connected with its purchase; neither is there any statement that the officers corruptly issued or negotiated the bonds, nor that they were sold for less than their value. From the allegations that are made, it must be taken that the bonds were illegally issued; but whether they were void on their face, or whether they had passed into and were good in the hands of innocent holders, is not alleged. Whatever may have been the defects in the election proceedings preliminary to the execution and sale of the bonds, it appears that they have been issued, negotiated, and sold, and the proceeds of the same are now in the hands of the city treasurer. No complaint is made of the proposed expenditure, either by the city or any tax-payer of the city, and why should the state or the county attorney in its behalf intervene? It is contended by the state that if the bonds that have been illegally issued are valid in the hands of bona fide purchasers, or if the bonds are held to be void, the funds derived from the same in either event belong to the city, and, as we have seen, the right of the city to expend money for the purchase of real estate and the construction of public buildings is undoubted. Under the allegations of the petition and the previous rulings of this court, the interference on the part of the county attorney in behalf of the state is unnecessary to prevent the perpetration of an irremediable wrong and unwarranted by law. In State v. McLaughlin, 15 Kan. 228, a school-district had issued bonds in excess of its powers, which were void in the hands of their holders, and a tax had been levied to pay them off, and it was held that an action to enjoin the collection of taxes to pay the bonds would not lie in the name of the state on the relation of the attorney general. City of Atchison v. State, 34 Kan. 379, 8 Pac. Rep. 367, was an action brought by the state in the name of the county attorney against the city of Atchison and others to enjoin the city of Atchison and certain officers from collecting taxes or paying out certain bridge funds which were in the hands of the treasurer. It was alleged that bonds issued to build certain bridges in the city were illegally issued, and that the tax levied for the payment of the bonds was illegal and void, and they asked the court to enjoin the disbursement of the money collected upon the levy; but it was held that as the bonds alleged to be unauthorized and illegal had long since been executed and delivered, and the bridges for the payment of which the bonds were issued had been built and paid for, the community at large had no such interest in the controversy as warranted the interference of the state. So here the bonds have been executed and issued without objection or interference by the state or any one else; they have passed into the hands of the purchaser, and their validity, as between the holders and the city, cannot be tried in this proceeding; nor, indeed, does it appear that the city, or any officer or tax-payer of the city, desires to question the validity of the bonds. The money derived from their sale is in the hands of the treasurer, and if it is treated as a special fund to provide a city hall, the expenditure of the same for the purchase of a site is not unauthorized; and if the bonds are void on their face, so that the proceeds cannot be recovered, then such proceeds would become a part of the general fund, and might be legally appropriated for the purchase of a site or the construction of the building. In either case the right of the state to interfere with the city in the appropriation of the fund is not apparent. From the argument of counsel it would seem that the principal objections to the appropriation have been the location of the site and the supposed want of power in the city to purchase the site, but neither of these objections can be sustained; and, so far as the question of expending the money which the city has provided for that purpose is concerned, we must hold, under the authorities, that the public has no such interest in the same as will warrant the interference of the county attorney. As the site is essential to the construction of the building, we think the money provided for the building may properly be used for the purchase of the site. We are also of opinion that an estimate of the cost of the site by the city engineer is not essential or required in advance of a contract or purchase by the city council. The judgment of the district court will be reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to sustain the demurrer of the city to the petition of the state. All the justices concurring.

STATE V. MORAN.

ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO KILL—EVIDENCE—TRIAL —PRESENCE OF ACCUSED.

1. Where a defendant is charged with an assault with a deadly weapon with intent to kill, under the provisions of paragraph 2159, Gen. St. 1889, and the evidence of the prosecution tends to establish that offense, and the evidence of the defendant tends to show that he shot off the deadly weapon (a pistol) into the ground with no intention to harm, hurt, or kill any one, and that no one was shot, struck, or hurt thereby, it is error for the district court to instruct the jury that they might convict the defendant of an assault with intent to commit manslaughter.

2. It is a violation of section 207 of the Criminal Code to try any person accused of felony unless he is personally present throughout the trial. State v. Myrick, 38 Kan. 238, 16 Pac. Rep. 830.

Appeal from district court, Bourbon county; STEPHEN ALLEN, Judge pro tem.
Keene & Campbell and J. B. Larimer, for appellant. J. N. Ives, Atty. Gen., and L. C. Boyle, for the State.

HORTON, C. J. Dennis Moran was informed against by the county attorney of Bourbon county for an assault with intent to kill Alexander Mason on the 16th day of November, 1888. He was tried and convicted "of an assault with intent to commit manslaughter." He was sentenced to confinement at hard labor in the penitentiary of the state for the term of 18 months. From the sentence and judgment rendered against him he appeals to this court. The evidence of Alexander Mason, the prosecuting witness, was as follows: "I live in Bourbon county, in this state, two miles south and one-half mile east of Fulton. I am acquainted with the defendant, Dennis Moran. On or about the 16th day of November, two years ago, in the evening, between five and six o'clock, in Bourbon county, in this state, I was doing up my chores and somebody called me, and I answered. I was in the barn putting in corn for the team, and I answered and asked who it was. I stepped out and saw it was Den Moran. I walked out towards him, and said, 'Den, go home. I don't want to talk to you.' He says, 'You God damn son of a bitch, I am going to kill you,' and shot. When I saw him draw his revolver, I hollowed to Mrs. Graham. She stepped to the door, and saw him shoot. I hollowed to her to get me my gun. He snapped his revolver twice, and then put spurs to his horse. I was about fifteen or sixteen steps from Moran when he shot at me. I heard the bullet whiz by me about a foot or two from my face. I had been shot at before, and had heard a bullet whiz by me once before. The bullet struck the ground after it passed me about twelve or fifteen feet. I looked for the bullet the next day, and dug it out of the ground. I have that bullet now in my pocket. Here is the bullet. I have kept it ever since in my possession. Moran, when he rode up, after he stopped, drew his revolver, held it in his right hand, and shot at me; and after he snapped his revolver twice, and it did not go off, went east up the road as far as I could see him. I afterwards went on, and done up the night's work, and then went over home, and they informed me that Dennis Moran had had trouble in town that afternoon with my brother Robert. Then I came to town, and got out the papers. I did not have any weapons on me at the time Dennis Moran shot at me. Had been plowing on the farm all day, and had just come in from work, and was putting up the team and feeding them. I looked at the clock when I went to the house to see what time it was. It was just about sunset, the time the shooting took place." The defendant, Dennis Moran, testified in his own behalf as follows: "On November 16, 1888, I was in Fulton. I had some trouble with Robert Mason. I had left town, and was going out home that night, along just before dark, and, as I was going by Alec Mason's, Mason came running out with a scoop shovel in his hand, and said to me, 'Come in, you son of a bitch. You licked my brother, but you can't lick me.' This was the first thing that was said between Alec Mason and myself. Then he called for his revolver, and started for the house to get it, and after he started for the house I pulled my revolver, and shot twice in the ground near the fence. I did not shoot at Alec Mason. I merely shot in the ground. I did not see anybody there. I did not see Mrs. Graham. I had known and heard of a great many threats made by Alec Mason. Several parties had told me he intended to kill me as soon as he got a chance; and when he made the threat that he did, and called for his revolver, on November 16th, I shot twice, as I said, into the ground to scare him, in order that I might have the opportunity to run my horse and get away from him before he could get his revolver and shoot me. That is the reason that I shot twice as I did. I expected him to kill me at that time if he could get his revolver. I have always shunned him if I could. I have always been afraid that he would shoot me, or that I would have trouble with him when I met him. Mrs. Foster had told me of his threats, and several others. I never made any threats against him in my life. I had had enough trouble with the Masons. They had sworn a bastard child on me, and I afterwards brought suit for malicious prosecution against them, and recovered a $700 judgment off of them, and I was tired of having anything more to do with them." The court charged the jury, among other things, as follows: "In order that you may convict the defendant of assault with intent to commit manslaughter, it is incumbent on the prosecution to prove to your satisfaction, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant, at the county of Bourbon, state of Kansas, on or about the 16th day of November, 1888, did shoot at the said Alexander Mason with a pistol loaded with gunpowder and ball, with the intent to kill said Mason. In order to convict the defendant of the crime of assault with intent to commit manslaughter, it is not necessary that the defendant should have had a settled and premeditated design, formed before the shooting, if he did shoot to kill said Mason, but he must have shot with the intent in his mind at the time of the shooting to kill said Mason. Within the charge are included the minor offenses of assault with intent to commit manslaughter and simple assault."

Upon the facts testified to by the prosecuting witness, the trial court committed error in charging the jury concerning manslaughter. If the assault was made as testified to by the prosecuting witness, the defendant was guilty of assault with intent to kill and murder. If Alexander Mason had been shot and killed by Dennis Moran at the time of the alleged shooting, Moran would have been guilty of murder in the first degree or murder in the second degree. Within the provisions of the statute, he would not have been guilty of manslaughter in any degree. Gen. St. 1889, pars. 2133-2151, 2159. Where an assault is made by a person with intent to take the life of another, and the killing is not lawful or excusable, if death should ensue the party would be guilty of murder. Excepting under certain circumstances, not embraced within the facts testified to in this case, a defendant could not be convicted of an assault with intent to commit manslaughter, where the facts show that he intended to commit murder. People v. Lilley, 43 Mich. 521, 5 N. W. Rep. 982; State v. White, 41 Iowa, 316; 5 Lawson, Def. Crime, p. 783. The use of the word "manslaughter" in the charge of the district court may have misled the jury, and therefore the charge was prejudicial. State v. Mize, 36 Kan. 187, 13 Pac. Rep. 1.

Further, it appears from the record that the defendant, Moran, was absent, with the consent of the court, while one of the witnesses upon the part of the state was testifying. This is fatal error. State v. Myrick, 38 Kan. 238, 16 Pac. Rep. 330. In that case it was said: "Section 207 of the Criminal Code prohibits the trial of any person accused of felony unless he is personally present throughout the trial; and it is therefore error for the court, in a prosecution for felony, to recall the jury and give further instructions while the defendant is absent and under confinement in jail. In such case the presence and consent of defendant's counsel did not waive or cure the illegality." The other questions presented need not be discussed. The judgment of the district court will be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

JOHNSTON, J., concurs.

VALENTINE, J. I concur in the reversal of the judgment of the district court, but I cannot say that I concur in all that is decided, or all that is said by the chief justice.

Appeal from district court, Pierce county. Carroll, Cain & Davis and Mr. Crawford, for appellant. Town & Likens, for appellee.

ANDERS, C. J. Appellee moves to dismiss this appeal, and to affirm the judgment of the court below, for the reasons—First, that appellant has failed to cause a transcript to be prepared, and to serve and file a brief, as provided by rule 6 of this court; and, second, that the original amount in controversy herein does not exceed the sum of $200, and the action does not involve the legality of a tax, impost, assessment, toll, municipal fine, or the validity of a statute. Judgment was rendered in the lower court on September 6, 1890, and on September 17, 1890, notice of appeal to the supreme court was duly given. This motion was filed on April 27, 1891, at which time no transcript had been prepared, and no briefs had been filed. No satisfactory reason or excuse is given for the failure to comply with rule 6 of this court, and, appellee having filed a certified copy of the judgment and notice of appeal, in accordance with the provisions of rule 9, the appeal will be dismissed, with costs to appellee. It is not necessary, under the circumstances, to consider the jurisdictional question attempted to be raised by this motion.

FINAL JUDGMENT—RIGHT TO APPEAL—OBJECTIONS TO JURISDICTION.

1. Upon the minutes of the court the following entry was made: "At this day, on motion of defendant's counsel, the court ordered this cause dismissed at plaintiffs' costs, taxed at $3.40." Held, this is not a final judgment.

2. When there is no final judgment no appeal can be taken.

3. When there is no judgment in the court below this court has no jurisdiction.

4. An objection to the jurisdiction may be made at any time.

Appeal from district court, Shoshone county.

By leave of the court an amended complaint was filed in the above-entitled action on May 29, 1890, and thereafter, on the 2d day of June, 1890, the said complaint was demurred to upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. Upon the hearing the demurrer was sustained. Thereafter, on March 9th, the court entered the following order: "At this day the court granted the plaintiffs until March 12, 1891, to elect whether to amend or stand upon their complaint." On March 11th the following entry appears in the record: "At this day the plaintiffs, by their counsel, announce that they have elected to stand by their amended complaint." Thereafter, on the 12th day of March, 1891, the court made the following entry on the record: "At this day, on motion of defendants' counsel, the court ordered this cause dismissed at plaintiffs' costs, taxed at $3.40." From this so-called judgment the plaintiffs take an appeal to this court, by filing and serving the following notice: (Title of the court and cause.) "Please take notice that the plaintiffs in the above-entitled action hereby appeal to the supreme court of this state from the judgment therein made and entered in the above-entitled district court sustaining the defendants' demurrer to the plaintiffs' complaint, and dismissing the above-entitled action at the cost of the plaintiffs, which judgment, made and entered as aforesaid, was in favor of the defendants and against the plaintiffs, and was entered on the 10th day of March, 1891, and appeal from the whole of said judgment. Dated this 18th day of March, 1891. [Signed,]" etc.

W. T. Stoll and McBride & Allen, for appellants. Woods & Hayburn, for respondents.

MORGAN, J. The first question to be considered is, is this a judgment from which an appeal can be taken? If there is no judgment no appeal can be taken, and this court has no jurisdiction. Gray v. Cederholm, (Idaho,) 3 Pac. Rep. 12; Meyers v. Chabrie, (Cal.) 7 Pac. Rep. 634; Stebbins v. Savage, (Mont.) 5 Pac. Rep. 278. Section 4907, Rev. St. Idaho, is as follows: "An appeal may be taken to the supreme court from a district court—First, from a final judgment in an action or special proceeding commenced in the court in which the same is rendered within one year after the entry of judgment." In McLaughlin v. Doherty, 54 Cal. 519, the court states as follows: "Section 939 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that an appeal may be taken from the final judgment within one year after the entry of judgment." It will be noticed that the wording is the same as our own statute. In Gray v. Palmer, 28 Cal. 416, this provision of the practice act was before the court for construction, and the court in its opinion defined with precision the distinction between the rendition and entry of a final judgment within the meaning of that act. The distinction which the court made was that a judgment is rendered when ordered by the court, and entered when actually entered in the judgment book. See, also, Trenouth v. Farrington, 54 Cal. 273. In the case of McNevin v. McNevin, 11 Pac. Coast Law J. 92, the journal entry was in the following language: "Ordered that plaintiff's prayer for a decree of divorce be denied, and that defendant have judgment for costs." The court held this to be an order for judgment only, and dismissed the appeal. The same was held in the case of Thomas v. Anderson, 55 Cal. 43. Both these cases were approved in Schroder v. Schmidt, 71 Cal. 399, 12 Pac. Rep. 302; also in Tyrrell v. Baldwin, 72 Cal. 192, 13 Pac. Rep. 475; Kimple v. Conway, 69 Cal. 71, 10 Pac. Rep. 189. Section 4454 of our statute requires the clerk to keep a judgment book, in which judgments must be entered. Section 4456 requires him immediately after entering the judgment to attach together and file certain papers, which shall constitute the judgment roll. It is from the judgment so entered in the judgment book that an appeal must be taken, and not from the order of the court directing such judgment. The language used in this case and recorded in the journal was simply an order directing the entry of judgment of dismissal and for costs. Black, Judgm. §§ 110, 115; Hayne, New Trials & App. 183, note 6. It is but just to the eminent counsel engaged in this cause to say that this conclusion was arrived at before the supplemental briefs were filed. Since they were filed the case cited by counsel for appellants has been examined, but has not changed the opinion of the court. In our opinion, an objection to the jurisdiction may be made at any time. If not made at all by counsel, and it appeared in the record, the court would be obliged to take notice of it. Appeal dismissed, without prejudice to another appeal; costs of appeal awarded to respondent.

HOMICIDE—SELF-DEFENSE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. An instruction that if defendant killed deceased in resisting an attempt on the part of deceased to "murder" defendant, or an attempt to do defendant great bodily harm, then the killing was justifiable, is not fatally erroneous, as it does not tend to lead the jury to understand that an attempt to kill defendant not constituting murder would not justify the killing by defendant.

2. An instruction that if defendant drew his pistol with a deliberate intent to kill deceased, and that deceased saw the pistol, and, believing himself in danger of defendant, ran away, and that defendant, with intent to willfully and deliberately kill deceased, followed for the purpose of overtaking or meeting and killing him, and did meet him, unarmed, and showing no disposition to kill defendant, and defendant then and there, without believing himself in danger of losing his own life, fired, and killed deceased, then the evidence showed no self-defense, cannot be objected to on the ground that it omits the hypothesis of defendant's being in danger, or believing himself in danger, of receiving great bodily harm. PATERSON, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; S. K. DOUGHERTY, Judge. J. C. Sims, for appellant. W. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. The defendant was convicted of murder in the first degree, and is under sentence of death. He appeals from the judgment rendered against him, and from an order refusing a new trial. He makes the point that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict. The jury had before them persons who witnessed the homicide, and all its attendant circumstances. There was certainly some evidence which tended to show the guilt of the defendant as charged; and, that being so, we are not warranted in saying that the jury gave it improper weight, and should not have returned the verdict which they did.

It is further claimed that the instruction of the court was erroneous, which was in this language: "If the jury believe from the evidence in this case that the defendant, Bruggy, killed the deceased by shooting him, and that the shooting was done by Bruggy in resenting an attack on the part of the deceased to murder him, Bruggy, or an attempt on the part of the deceased to do great bodily harm to him, Bruggy, then in such case I instruct you the killing by Bruggy was justifiable, and you should find the defendant not guilty. The rule in such a case is this: What would a reasonable person—a person with ordinary caution, judgment, and observation—in the position of the defendant, seeing what he saw, and knowing what he knew, suppose from his situation and his surroundings? If such reasonable person, so placed, would have been justified in believing himself in imminent danger, then the defendant would be justified in believing himself in such peril, and in acting on such appearances." The defendant contends that this instruction should not have confined his right to kill the deceased to a state of facts where the deceased was endeavoring to murder Bruggy, or to do him some great bodily harm, but that it should have stated further that an attempt to kill Bruggy by the deceased, either with or without malice aforethought, would have warranted the defendant in taking the life of the deceased, and that the word "murder" was misleading in the connection in which it was used. It must be borne in mind that this instruction was to the effect that, if the whole evidence showed a certain condition of affairs, the defendant was to be acquitted. If it had stated that Bruggy was not to be acquitted unless murder or some great bodily harm was then about to be accomplished by the deceased, then it is plain that the instruction would be misleading. But it is not manifest that as reasonable men the jury could have understood the instruction to mean what the defendant claims. Such a construction by them would not be harmonious in any degree with the language used by the court, and, although to be strictly accurate, the words, suggested, or some others appropriate to convey the idea, would have made the instruction clearer, the omission to do so did not, in our opinion, have or tend to have a misleading effect. The test in such a matter as this is not that a given instruction is erroneous, merely, but, if the court can see that it did not mislead the jury, the judgment will not be disturbed. Hayne, New Trials & App. § 122.

We do not perceive that the instructions of the court with reference to what constitutes murder in the first and second degrees were either misleading or erroneous. If appellant desired any further instructions on that subject he should have asked for them. People v. Franklin, 70 Cal. 642, 11 Pac. Rep. 797; People v. Northey, 77 Cal. 618, 19 Pac. Rep. 865, and 20 Pac. Rep. 129.

Another ground on which the appellant urges that the judgment and order should be reversed is that the jury were erroneously instructed and misled by the court in the following instruction: "If you believe from the evidence that the defendant, while upon the sidewalk, drew his pistol with a deliberate intent to kill and murder Dick Louison, and that Dick Louison saw the pistol, and, believing himself in danger of the defendant, ran away, and through the alley, and into the saloon, to avoid the defendant; and you further believe from the evidence that the defendant, with intent to willfully and deliberately kill and murder Louison, entered and passed through the saloon with the pistol in his hand, for the purpose of overtaking or meeting him and killing him; and you further believe from the evidence that he did meet the deceased coming into the saloon through one of the back doors of the saloon, unarmed, and showing no disposition to kill and murder the defendant, and that the defendant then and there, without believing himself in danger of losing his own life at the hands of Dick Louison, fired the fatal shot, and killed said Louison,—then I instruct you the evidence shows no self-defense." The objection to this instruction is that it is confined to a reasonable ground for belief by appellant that he was in danger of "losing his own life," and does not include the other proposition, that he was in danger, or believed himself in danger, of receiving great bodily injury. If the instruction had been intended as an abstract statement of the general doctrine of self-defense there might have been some force in the objection, although even in such case, if the court should give another instruction containing the element of fear of great bodily injury, (as was done in the case at bar,) it is difficult to see how error could be successfully assigned. But such was not the case with respect to the instruction in question. It was based upon a hypothesis (founded on the evidence) which excluded the notion of self-defense entirely. If a defendant pursues the deceased (who runs away) with a drawn pistol, intending to kill and murder the deceased, and does not make any endeavor to decline any further struggle, the fact that at the moment of the fatal act the deceased makes some effort to defend himself which may put the defendant in danger of either death or bodily injury, does not constitute self-defense. The instruction would not have been erroneous if it had not contained any allusion at all to the defendant's belief of danger to his own life. There was nothing in it of which defendant at least could complain. The law of self-defense was very correctly given to the jury in the general charge of the court, which was as favorable to defendant as he could reasonably expect; and we see no error that would warrant a reversal of the judgment.

The evidence discloses that the killing of the deceased was to some extent the result of a drunken brawl; and it would seem that a verdict by the jury of imprisonment for life would have satisfied the law, but that is not a question to be here considered. The law gives the power of fixing the punishment in such cases to the jury, and the only appeal from their decision as to that matter is to the executive. The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

PATERSON, J., (dissenting.) I think the instruction referred to in the opinion was erroneous. It ignores the fact that the defendant may have declined any further struggle immediately prior to the firing of the shot. Although he was the assailant, if he in good faith "endeavored to decline any further struggle before the homicide was committed, the homicide was justifiable." Pen. Code, § 197, subd. 3. Whether he did so decline further combat was a question of fact for the jury to determine on the evidence. It cannot be said that there was no evidence tending to show such a declination. The parties met right at the back door of the saloon, and the deceased immediately grabbed the defendant by the arms, and pushed him back several feet to the billiard table, and was pushing him over against it when the fatal shot was fired. What occurred beyond what has been stated, or what, if anything, was said by either party after they met at the rear door of the saloon, and before the shot was fired, does not appear in the evidence. If the defendant did decline further struggle, he was justified in shooting the deceased if he believed that he was in danger of receiving great bodily injury. This element was also omitted from the instruction.

The court instructed the jury that "to reduce a felonious homicide from the grade of murder to that of manslaughter, upon the ground of sudden quarrel, or heat of passion, the provocation must be of such a character as would be naturally calculated to excite and arouse the passions; and it must appear that the party acted under the smart of his sudden passion and resentment." Here the element of malice is entirely wanting in the charge, yet without malice there can be no murder. The instruction is erroneous because it in effect tells the jury that, although the defendant acted under a heat of passion, it could not be manslaughter unless the provocation was of such a character as would naturally excite and arouse the passions of an average man. The question is not whether some other person would probably have been excited and thrown into a passion by similar circumstances, but whether the defendant acted "upon a sudden quarrel or heat of passion." Pen. Code, § 192. What will excite and anger one man might simply amuse another. The court gave this instruction: "Upon the law of self-defense, I instruct you as follows: To justify the killing of another in self-defense it must appear that the danger was so urgent and pressing that, in order to save his own life, or to prevent his receiving great bodily harm, the killing of the other was absolutely necessary; and it must appear that the person killed was the assailant, or that the slayer had really and in good faith endeavored to decline further trouble before the fatal shot was fired. If the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant, George Bruggy, at the time he fired the fatal shot which killed the deceased, Dick Louison, (if he did fire such shot and kill him,) believed, and had good reason to believe, that his life was in imminent danger at the hands of said Dick Louison, then I charge you that the defendant was justifiable in firing said shot, and you should acquit him." This instruction is loaded down with errors of a glaringly prejudicial character. The first part of the instruction has been condemned here several times. People v. Flabave, 58 Cal. 250; People v. Gonzales, 71 Cal. 577, 12 Pac. Rep. 783; People v. Dye, 75 Cal. 113, 16 Pac. Rep. 537. The last part of the instruction in effect tells the jury—and no doubt they so understood it—that unless the defendant believed, and had good reason to believe, that his life was in imminent danger, he was not justifiable in firing the shot, thus ignoring the question of appearances, and fear of great bodily injury. People v. Flanagan, 60 Cal. 4; Pen. Code, § 197. If these instructions were erroneous, (and I think it must be conceded that they were,) they were not cured by other instructions on the same point, although the latter may have been correct. People v. Anderson, 44 Cal. 65. The court in another instruction used this language: "If the murder was deliberate and premeditated, it was murder of the first degree; otherwise it was murder of the second degree." In calling the attention of the jury to the fact that the defendant had been a witness in his own behalf, the court said: "It is proper for the jury to consider whether this position and interest [the defendant's] may not affect his credibility, or color his testimony." The peculiar terms employed here seem to indicate an intimation by the learned judge that the defendant's interest in the case had evidently caused him to "color his testimony." The defendant requested the court to give an instruction on the question of reasonable doubt, which has been several times approved here. It was refused on the ground that it had already been given in the charge of the court, and it is true that the substance of the instruction was given by the court in its own charge, but it was given in such an attenuated form that I think the defendant may justly complain, although standing alone, perhaps, it could not be held to be prejudicial. It is true some of the instructions I have referred to have not been criticised by counsel for the appellant in his brief, but they were all excepted to in the court below, and I think, considering the importance of the case, it is the duty of our court to notice them, whether defendant's counsel refers to them or not. The learned judge of the court below doubtless would have corrected the instructions if his attention had been called to the matters omitted therefrom, but I am unable to see how it can be claimed that other instructions given on the same subject cured the errors in those referred to.

(Supreme Court of California. May 21, 1891.)

Commissioners' decision. Department 1.
Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; F. E. SPENCER, Judge.
J. H. Campbell, for appellant. J. S. Gage, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an action to recover the sum of $300, the agreed price of 160 acres of land alleged to have been sold and conveyed by the plaintiff to the defendant. The defendant, by his answer, denies that the plaintiff ever sold or conveyed to him the premises mentioned in the complaint; denies that he agreed to pay the plaintiff for said premises the sum of $300 or any sum whatever; admits that negotiations for the sale or exchange of said premises for a horse and buggy of defendant's were at one time pending between the parties, but avers that no agreement for such sale or exchange, or any sale or exchange, of said premises was ever made between them. The court below found "that the defendant bought of the plaintiff 160 acres of land, * * * for which he agreed to pay the plaintiff therefor three hundred dollars; that the plaintiff made, executed, and delivered to the defendant a good and sufficient deed conveying the title thereto to the defendant; that the defendant has failed, neglected, and refused to pay the plaintiff the purchase price of said lands, or any part thereof; that there is now due and owing the plaintiff, J. S. Statler, from the defendant, Michael Broedel, three hundred dollars, the purchase price of said lands." Judgment was accordingly entered that the plaintiff recover from the defendant the sum of $300 and costs of suit. From this judgment the defendant appeals on a statement of the case. The only points made for a reversal are that the findings and judgment were not justified by the evidence. No good end would be subserved by setting forth the evidence here. It was partly written and partly oral. We have carefully read and considered all that is presented in the statement, and are of the opinion that it must be held sufficient to justify the findings. We advise, therefore, that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. FICK. (No. 20,745.)

KIDNAPPING—EVIDENCE—JUDGMENT.

1. On indictment for kidnapping, where it is shown that defendant, a constable, had a warrant authorizing him to arrest prosecutrix and bring her before a justice of the peace, and that he did not take her before the justice, but left her at a certain house, evidence is admissible that this was a house of ill fame, such evidence tending to show a motive for his failure to take her before the justice.

2. Evidence that at the same time another constable arrested the husband of prosecutrix on a charge of which he was innocent, and confined him in jail for two days, is immaterial, and its admission is harmless error.

3. It is a question for the jury whether "Choy Fong," the name of the prosecutrix, as alleged in the indictment, is idem sonans with "Toy Fong," which the evidence shows to be her true name.

4. Though the indictment alleges that defendant forcibly took the prosecutrix "for the purpose and with the intent to feloniously employ her for the unlawful use" of certain named persons, the intent is surplusage, and need not be proved.

5. It is no defense that the warrant under which defendant acted was regular on its face, since his arresting prosecutrix, his taking her into another county, and his leaving her at the house instead of taking her before the justice, as directed by his warrant, constitute a continuous act, which was not within his authority under the warrant.

6. A direction in the judgment that, in addition to being imprisoned, defendant shall pay the district attorney a certain fee, though it is unauthorized, is separable, and may be stricken out without remanding the case.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; J. H. BUDD, Judge. John M. Fulweller and Ben. D. Tabor, for appellant. W. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the People.

DE HAVEN, J. The defendant, H. L. Fick, was indicted by a grand jury of San Joaquin county for the crime of kidnapping. Upon his trial the jury found him guilty as charged. His motion for a new trial was denied, and judgment given that he be imprisoned in the state-prison for eight years, and that he pay the district attorney a fee of $25. From this judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial, the defendant appeals.

It was shown upon the trial that the defendant was at the date of the alleged commission of the offense charged a constable of township No. 3, Placer county, and that there was delivered to him on March 22, 1890, a warrant in due form, issued by a justice of the peace, within said county, commanding him to arrest one Toy Fong, and to bring her forth with before said justice at his office in said county, or, in case of his absence or inability to act, before the nearest and most accessible magistrate of the county. The defendant, armed with this process, proceeded to the county of San Joaquin, and on March 24, 1890, arrested a Chinawoman, whose name is given in the evidence as Toy Fong. This woman he took to the county of Placer, but did not at any time take her before the justice issuing the warrant, or any magistrate, but instead left her at the house of one China Molly, the person on whose complaint the warrant was issued. The appellant assigns as error various rulings of the court in the admission of testimony, and in giving and refusing instructions.

1. The court did not err in admitting evidence that the general reputation of the house in which China Molly lived was of ill fame. It was to this house that the defendant took the woman he was charged with kidnapping, and where he left her. This appearing, it was not improper to show that this house was of ill fame, and it was competent to prove the fact by evidence of general reputation. That appellant left the woman at a house of such a character, and did not thereafter take her before a magistrate, were matters proper for the jury to consider in passing upon his intent in making the arrest, and bringing her into the county of Placer. The evidence tended in some degree to furnish an explanation or motive for the act of appellant in failing to comply with the mandate of the warrant held by him.

2. In going to San Joaquin county the appellant was accompanied from Sacramento city by a constable of that city named Swift; and at the same time the woman was arrested Swift, who seems to have had a warrant therefor, legal upon its face, arrested her husband, Go Sam. Testimony was admitted, appellant objecting thereto, showing that Go Sam was taken to Sacramento city, kept in jail two nights, and then released on bail. The prosecution was further permitted to show by Go Sam that he was in fact innocent of the alleged crime for which he was arrested. If it should be conceded that by a strict application of the rule which requires evidence to be confined to the points in issue this testimony should have been excluded, still we cannot see how its admission prejudiced the case of appellant. So far as we can see from the record, this evidence had no tendency to show that appellant was guilty of the crime with which he was charged, and it must have been disregarded by the jury as immaterial. A mere technical error in the admission of immaterial evidence, which is of such a character that it is apparent it could have no tendency to excite a prejudice against a defendant on trial, is not cause for the reversal of a judgment.

3. The appellant was charged with kidnapping one Choy Fong. Upon the trial it appeared that the name of the woman actually taken is Toy Fong. The appellant requested the court to charge the jury "that testimony proving or tending to prove that one Toy Fong was * * * taken from said county of San Joaquin by the defendant into the county of Placer will not sustain a conviction under said indictment for so taking Choy Fong." The court refused to so charge. The question whether the name "Toy Fong" is idem sonans with "Choy Fong," and so both relate to the same person, was in this case one of fact for the jury, and not a question of law for the court to determine. In the case of Com. v. Donovan, 13 Allen 571, the defendant was charged with larceny from one John Mealy. At the trial this person was called, and testified that his name was spelled "Malay" or "Maley," but never "Mealy," and that he was called "Maley," but never "Mealy." The trial court declined to instruct the jury "that if they should find his name to be Maley or Malay, and not Mealy, then they should acquit the defendant," but left it to the jury to determine whether the name proved was idem sonans with that given in the indictment, and this ruling was approved on appeal to the supreme court, that court saying: "The question whether one name is idem sonans with another is not a question of spelling, but of pronunciation, depending less upon the rule than upon the usage, which, when it arises in evidence in the general issue, is for the jury, and not for the court, and was rightly submitted to the jury in this case." This rule applies with peculiar force here, where the question relates to the pronunciation of Chinese proper names. The court cannot say as a matter of law that the names mentioned in the instruction asked for, as usually spoken by that people, do not have the same sound. The instructions given, in the absence of a request from the defendant for more specific directions as to the right and duty of the jury to determine the particular question, were sufficiently definite, and we must presume that the jury passed upon the question, as it was their province to do, and found from the evidence that these names, "Choy Fong," and "Toy Fong," are pronounced alike.

4. The indictment charges that the woman Choy Fong was forcibly taken from San Joaquin county "for the purpose and with the intent to willfully and feloniously employ her, said Choy Fong, for the use unlawfully of the said Mow Lin Gut and Ah Young (alias China Molly.)" The court gave the following instruction to the jury: "If you believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant, H. L. Fick, did, on or about the 24th day of March, 1890, and before the finding of said indictment, willfully, unlawfully, feloniously, and forcibly take the woman named in the indictment, Choy Fong, against her free will or consent, from the county of San Joaquin in this state, and carry her into the county of Placer in this state, then you will say in your verdict: 'We, the jury, find the defendant, H. L. Fick, guilty.'" In giving this instruction the court committed no error. The words above quoted from the indictment as to the purpose and intent of defendant are surplusage. Under section 207 of the Penal Code "every person who forcibly steals, takes, or arrests any person in this state and carries him into another * * * county" is guilty of kidnapping. The language just quoted necessarily implies that the arrest and conveying to another county must be without the consent of the person injured, and without any lawful authority therefor; but the particular purpose intended to be accomplished by such unlawful act is immaterial. The crime consists of a false imprisonment, aggravated by a removal to another county, and these acts are sufficiently alleged when the indictment is in the language of the statute defining the offense. The allegation as to the purpose of defendant being surplusage, it was not necessary for the prosecution to prove such purpose, or for the jury to find it to exist, and the instruction just quoted was correct.

5. Appellant claims that in taking the woman from San Joaquin to Placer county he committed no crime, because he was acting under a warrant regular on its face, and that, such action being lawful, it did not become a crime by reason of his subsequent failure to take her before a magistrate in the latter county; and that not only did the court err in its instruction upon this point, but that the verdict is against the evidence. The error of this contention is in its assumption that in what appellant did he was acting in obedience to the warrant in his possession, and in its denial of the right to look at the entire transaction, for the purpose not only of determining whether the appellant did pursue the authority with which he was clothed, but also whether any departure from such authority was willful, and with the intention of disregarding the personal rights of the woman taken by him. It is a maxim of the law (and its correctness is shown by human experience) that acts indicate the intention, and in conformity with this the law in some cases judges of a man's previous intentions by his subsequent actions. Broom, Leg. Max. p. 271. In this case the arrest of the woman, and her conveyance into Placer county, and there placing her in the house of China Molly, constitute one continuous act, and for the purpose of determining the intention of defendant when he made the arrest, or at any other time while he had the woman in custody, it is proper to look at the entire transaction as one act, from its beginning to its consummation. Thus viewing it, it is not unreasonable to believe that appellant when he made the arrest intended to do with his prisoner just what the evidence shows that he did do, and that he had no other purpose; in other words, that her arrest was simply a means to the end he had in view; that he never intended to take her before a magistrate, but did intend to place her in the charge of China Molly. Such an act was unlawful, and, as the warrant under which appellant claims that he acted never authorized such a proceeding, the warrant cannot of itself afford any justification for the act now under consideration. If an officer desires the protection which the law always gives to one who acts under its authority, he must keep within the limits of its commands. If he arrests under a warrant he must follow its directions in dealing with his prisoner. The rule is that "one who arrests the person of another by legal process, or other equivalent authority conferred upon him by law, can only justify himself by a strict compliance with the requirements of such process or authority. If he fails to execute or return the process as thereby required, or to do what the law required him to do in making the arrest, his whole justification fails." Phillips v. Fadden, 125 Mass. 198. In Brock v. Stimson, 108 Mass. 521, referring to the principle which holds an officer to be a trespasser ab initio for an abuse in the execution of process, it is said: "The same rule holds good in the case of an officer who, after arresting a person on criminal process, omits to perform the duty required by the law of taking him before a court." The case here is unlike that of Ex parte Sternes, 82 Cal. 245, 23 Pac. Rep. 38. In that case it appeared that the officer acted under a lawful warrant, and did precisely what he was thereby commanded to do; and it was held that he had committed no crime in so doing. The instructions given by the court below upon the point we are now considering were full and complete, and the one given by the court of its own motion seems to have been prepared by the learned judge with unusual care, and states with precision the law applicable to the evidence before the jury. By this the jury were instructed that, if the appellant arrested the woman in good faith, under a warrant, intending to take her before a magistrate in Placer county in obedience to its commands, they should find him not guilty, even though they might find that, after reaching that county, he unlawfully placed her in an insecure place, and thereby allowed her to escape; but if they were satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that he did not make the arrest in good faith, and that he carried her into Placer county without any intention of taking her before the magistrate issuing the warrant, or other magistrate, and did not in fact take her before any magistrate, then they must find him guilty. The jury were also instructed that an officer is required to arrest any person named in a warrant which is delivered to him for that purpose, and that it must be presumed that his official duty was faithfully performed, unless the presumption was overcome by the evidence for the prosecution. Thus the question of the defendant's good faith in what he did was fairly submitted to the jury; and his conviction was not made to depend upon the mere fact that he had not followed the authority given him by law, and the evidence was amply sufficient to justify the verdict of the jury.

6. The attorney general concedes that he has found no law authorizing that portion of the judgment directing the appellant to pay a fee of $25 to the district attorney. This portion of the judgment may be separated from the other, and we can correct it here without remanding the case. Ordered that the judgment appealed from be, and the same is hereby, modified by striking therefrom the words: "And that he pay the district attorney a fee of twenty-five dollars;" and, being so modified, the judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. DUNN, (four cases.) (No. 13, 852.)

LIQUOR LICENSES—VALIDITY OF ORDINANCE.

In an action to recover unpaid liquor license taxes under an ordinance passed by a board of supervisors, Monday, October 1, 1883, it appeared that prior thereto, on August 6, 1883, the board, pursuant to County Government Act Cal. March 14, 1883, § 22, requiring the supervisors to provide for the holding of regular meetings, and which act repealed Pol. Code, § 4046, March 13, 1883, requiring the supervisors, on the first Monday of October, to fix rates of county licenses, passed an ordinance for the holding of regular meetings on the first Monday in February, May, August, and November, to continue in session until the business was disposed of. The ordinance was passed at a special meeting of the board held for the fixing of county taxes only. Held, that the ordinance passed October 1st is void.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Placer county; B. F. MYERS, Judge.

G. H. Colby and J. E. Prewett, for appellant. F. P. Tuttle, Dist. Atty., for the People.

VANCLIEF, C. This is a consolidation of four actions to recover from the defendant license taxes by virtue of an ordinance (No. 3) passed by the board of supervisors of Placer county on Monday, the 1st day of October, 1883, providing that persons selling spirituous liquors, etc., in said county, must procure from the tax collector a license, authorizing them to carry on that business, for which they must pay to the tax collector a tax of $24 per quarter and a fee of $1; and further providing that the tax collector may authorize suit, in the name of the people, to be brought against any person who has carried on such business without license, for the recovery of such tax, with $15 damages. The trial was by the court without a jury, and judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff "for the sum of one hundred and sixty dollars, together with plaintiff's costs and disbursements incurred in this action, amounting to the sum of one hundred and nine dollars." Defendant moved for a new trial on a bill of exceptions. A new trial was denied, and defendant appeals from the judgment, and from the order denying a new trial.

The appellant's principal point is that the ordinance passed by the board of supervisors on Monday, October 1, 1883, was void, because the meeting on that day was not a regular meeting of the board, nor a special meeting called for that purpose. Section 4045 of the Political Code, a new section, passed on March 13, 1883, provided, (subdivision 3:) "The board of supervisors of each county must, on the first Monday of October of each year, fix the rates of county licenses," (adding a proviso not material to the present purposes.) In San Luis Obispo Co. v. Hendricks, 71 Cal. 243, 11 Pac. Rep. 682, it was decided that this provision was repealed by section 22 of the county government act, passed March 14, 1883, which provides: "The board of supervisors must by ordinance provide for the holding of regular meetings of the board at their respective county-seats." And as a consequence of such repeal it was further held that after the board of supervisors has provided for holding regular meetings, as required by section 22 above quoted, it has no authority to fix the rate of county licenses at any other than at one of the regular meetings thus provided for, or at a special meeting called for that purpose according to section 23 of the county government act. It appears that prior to October 1, 1883, to-wit, on August 6, 1883, the board of supervisors of Placer county, by ordinance, provided that the regular meetings of that board should thereafter "be held at the office of the county clerk at Auburn, on the first Monday in February, May, August, and November of each year, and continue in session until the business before it is disposed of." And it further appears that the meeting at which the ordinance on which this action is brought was passed convened on October 1, 1883, and was not a continuance of any former meeting, nor a meeting specially called for the purpose of fixing the rate of county licenses. It was a special meeting held for the purpose of fixing the rate of county taxes in obedience to section 3714 of the Political Code, at which no other business could be done except on the conditions prescribed by section 23 of the county government act. It follows from these facts, and the decision in the case of San Luis Obispo Co. v. Hendricks, supra, and cases therein cited, that the board of supervisors of Placer county had no authority to enact the ordinance fixing county licenses on the 1st day of October, 1883, and consequently that the ordinance is void. I think the judgment and order should be reversed, and the cause remanded.

We concur: FITZGERALD, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded.

(No. 13,960.)

ACTION ON ACCIDENT POLICY—PLEADING.

1. Where, in an action on an accident policy, the complaint alleges that deceased sustained bodily injuries effected through external, violent, and accidental means, such a state of facts being provided against by the policy, an objection that the complaint does not state the particular circumstances under which the insured met his death is not maintainable under a general demurrer.

2. The policy provided that the money shall be paid within 90 days after proof that the insured received injuries which alone occasioned his death within 90 days from the happening thereof. The complaint alleged that "more than 90 days had elapsed prior to the commencement of this suit after sufficient proof that the insured at a time within the continuance of the said policy had sustained bodily injuries through external, violent, and accidental means, within the intent and meaning of said policy; that such injuries alone had occasioned death within ninety days from the happening of such injuries," and that deceased and plaintiff "have duly complied with all the terms and conditions of said policy and renewal by them or either of them, to be kept or performed." Held, it sufficiently alleged the notice and proof of death required by the policy.

3. Where the insured died from the effects of a blow struck by a person after an attempt to blackmail, such death is the result of accidental means within the general terms of a policy providing against injuries or death caused through "external, violent, and accidental means."

4. Where, in an action on an accident policy providing that the insurance shall not extend to any cause of death unless the claimant shall establish by positive proof that the death was not the result of design, either on the part of the insured or of any other person, it appearing that the insured died from the effects of a blow struck by another person, it is not error to charge that if the death of insured was caused by a blow dealt him, that would not prevent recovery if the person inflicting the blow did not mean to kill the insured.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county; J. M. WALLING, Judge.

T. M. Osmout, for appellant. Cross & Simmonds, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action upon an accident insurance policy. By the terms of the policy the insured, Philip Richards, was to have a sum of money paid him weekly in case of injury to him by accident, and his estate was to be paid

$5,000 in case of his death from such injury. During the life of the policy said Richards was killed. The jury returned a verdict in favor of plaintiffs, executors of said Richards, deceased, for $5,000; and defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial.

1. We think that the complaint is sufficient. There was no formal demurrer, but defendant objected to a jury being impaneled and to the introduction of any evidence upon the ground that "the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action." The first objection is that the complaint does not state the particular circumstances under which the death of the insured occurred,—that is, whether it was caused by lightning, drowning, railroad collision, etc. But the complaint avers that at a named date the deceased "sustained bodily injuries, effected through external, violent, and accidental means; and that on, to-wit, the 27th day of May, 1887, the said Philip Richards died at Nevada City, Nevada county, California; and that the said death was occasioned by said injuries alone." This language, which avers a state of facts expressly provided against by the covenants of the policy, is sufficient as against an attack which is no more specific than a general demurrer. The other objection to the complaint is that it does not aver notice and proofs of death, as required by the policy. But it is averred that "said Philip Richards and said plaintiffs have duly complied with all the terms and conditions of said policy and renewal by them, or either of them, to be kept or performed," and this was generally a sufficient pleading of conditions precedent. Code Civil Proc. § 457; Blaugame v. Insurance Co., 75 Cal. 633, 17 Pac. Rep. 925. It has been held in some cases that where money covered by an insurance policy is not to be paid until a certain time after the loss, or after notice and proofs of the same, there should be a special averment that such time had elapsed. In the case at bar there was a provision in the policy that the money should be paid "within ninety days" after proof that the insured received injuries which alone "occasioned his death within ninety days from the happening thereof;" and with respect to this matter it is alleged in the complaint that "more than 90 days had elapsed prior to the commencement of this suit after sufficient proof that the insured, at a time within the continuance of the said policy, had sustained bodily injuries, effected through external, violent, and accidental means, within the intent and meaning of said policy; that such injuries alone had occasioned death within ninety days from the happening of such injuries." This averment, together with the general averment above noticed, makes the complaint entirely sufficient as against a general demurrer.

2. Upon the merits appellant contends that the verdict was not justified by the evidence, and that the court erred in its instructions to the jury. The deceased lived at Nevada City, and was brought by one H. J. Dassonville to the drug-store and office of a physician in that city about 9 o'clock on the evening of April 22, 1887. He was suffering from a severe wound on the head and over the left eye, from the effect of which he died on the 27th of the next month, May, 1887. There was evidence tending to show that the wound was caused by a fall from an elevated sidewalk down onto Spring street, in which there were rocks and piles of old iron; but appellant contends that the evidence shows the wound to have been inflicted by said Dassonville, who, after a failure to blackmail the deceased, suddenly struck him a blow with some instrument or thing capable of producing the wound. The general terms of the policy provide against injuries or death caused through "external, violent, and accidental means." The means by which the death of the deceased was caused were certainly "external and violent;" and, while there was not much evidence to show that it was caused by a blow from Dassonville, still in that case the jury had the right, under the evidence, to find it "accidental," within the general covenants of the policy. It is impossible to give a precise definition of the word "accidental." As every effect has a cause, there is one sense in which nothing is accidental. Accident policies are of recent origin; and there have been only a few judicial decisions with respect to them; but the authorities to be found on the subject seem to be to the point that "accident" must be given its popular meaning,—that is, a casualty, something out of the usual course of events, and which happens suddenly and unexpectedly, and without any design on the part of the person injured. The fullest discussion of the subject is to be found in the opinion of the United States circuit court for the district of Michigan in the case of Ripley v. Railway Co. In that case the insured had been attacked by highwaymen and killed, and it was contended that, as the highwaymen intended violence, there was no accident. The learned judge, (WHEAT, J.,) in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "Perhaps, in a strict sense, any event which is brought about by design of any person is not an accident, because that which has accomplished the intention and design, and is expected, is a foreseen and foreknown result, and therefore not strictly accident. Yet I am persuaded this contract should not be interpreted so as thus to limit its meaning, for the event took place unexpectedly, and without design on Ripley's part. It was to him a casualty, and in the more popular and common acceptance 'accident,' if not in its precise meaning, includes any event which takes place without the foresight or expectation of the person acted upon or affected by the event. * * * I think in construing a policy of insurance against accident, issued to all sorts of people, a majority of whom do not, as the company well knew, nicely weigh the meaning of words and terms used in it, courts are called upon to interpret the contract as a large class, not versed in lexicology, are sure to regard its terms and scope. That which occurs to them unexpectedly is by them called 'accident.' The company fix the terms of the contract, and are to be held, in the absence of plain, unequivocal exceptions and provisions, to intend what, in popular acceptation, the insured party is likely to understand by its terms." 2 Bigelow, Ins. Cas. 738. In that case judgment went for defendant upon another point, and was affirmed by the United States supreme court, where the meaning of "accident" was not discussed, (16 Wall. 396;) but the language of Judge WITHEY seems to us to express correct views of the question. It is quoted approvingly in other authorities. Bliss, Life Ins. § 438; 7 Amer. Law Rev., 587; 1 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 87, § 3, and notes; Insurance, etc., Co. v. Martin, 32 Md. 315. We are of opinion, therefore, that, if it could be considered that, in the case at bar, the death of the deceased was caused by a blow from Dassonville, still it was caused by "accidental means" within the general terms of the policy. The policy, however, contains a special condition as follows: "This insurance shall not be held to extend to disappearances, or to any cause of death, or personal injury, unless the claimant under the policy shall establish by direct and positive proof that the said death or personal injury was caused by external violence and accidental means, and was not the result of design either on the part of the insured or of any other person." Respondents contend that this clause is a mere attempt to change the rules of evidence, and therefore entirely void,—that it is not a provision about anything except evidence. We do not think it necessary to examine this contention. Taking the provision as valid, it merely states as a condition, so far as it applies to the circumstances of this case, that the death shall not be the result of the design of any person; that is, that it must not be caused by the act of one whose design was to cause death by the act. The point was presented by the fifth instruction given by the court as follows: "If the death of Philip Richards was caused by a blow dealt him by H. J. Dassonville, or some other person, that would not prevent plaintiffs from recovering in this action, if you believe from the evidence that when Dassonville or such other person inflicted such blow he did not mean to kill said Philip Richards." We are of opinion that this instruction is not erroneous. There were circumstances in evidence tending to show that if Dassonville did give the blow which resulted afterwards in the death of deceased, he did not intend such result, and it would not be a correct construction of the clause of the policy under review to say that it includes every case where a blow not intended to kill unfortunately and undesignedly produces death, and particularly when we consider the rules of construction which apply to the makers of instruments.

The other instructions of the court seem to be unobjectionable, and to present the law of the case very fully. Those given at the request of the defendant presented that side of the case very favorably. Instructions No. 1 and No. 5, asked by defendant, were properly refused. Whatever was correct in them was given elsewhere. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

LANGAN v. LANGAN et al. (No. 13,610.)

ACTION ON NOTE—PAROL EVIDENCE OF CONSIDERATION—INCONSISTENT FINDINGS.

1. Where in an action on a note it appeared that said note was given in consideration of the balance due upon a prior note, such prior note being collateral to and described in a written agreement on the part of plaintiff to sell defendant certain property therein, and compliance therewith to be deemed full consideration for the note therein set out, oral evidence is inadmissible to show that certain land-warrants, not specified in said agreement, formed part of the consideration of the note in suit.

2. Where there was a conflict in the findings of the court below,—three findings that the consideration of the note was the sale of property described in the written agreement, and two findings that the consideration included certain land-warrants not referred to in said agreement,—a judgment based thereon is a decision against law, for which a new trial may be had.

McFARLAND, J., dissenting.

F. H. Gould, for appellant. J. K. Law, for respondents.

DE HAVEN, J. Action for the balance alleged to be due upon a promissory note executed by defendants to plaintiff on April 25, 1885, for the sum of $2,000. The answer of the defendants alleges that in December, 1884, the defendant Thomas F. Langan purchased from plaintiff an undivided one-fourth interest of all the copartnership property belonging to a firm of which plaintiff was a member for the sum of $3,000, and in payment thereof then executed to plaintiff his promissory note for said sum. That he afterwards paid $1,000 thereon, and then took up said note, and he and the other defendant, his wife, gave to plaintiff the note mentioned in the complaint, for the balance due on account of said purchase,—that is, as we construe the answer for the balance due upon the promissory note executed in December, 1884. The answer, then, in a separate defense, alleges that a part of the copartnership property purchased by defendant consisted of two land-warrants, and that said warrants were a part of the consideration for which the note referred to in the complaint was given, that plaintiff agreed to locate them upon lands, and convey said lands so located thereunder to defendant T. F. Langan; that plaintiff has located the same, and refuses to make a conveyance of the land so located to defendant, and by reason thereof defendant has been damaged in amount equal to the value of said land. There was another partial defense interposed, but this was found against the defendants, and needs no consideration. The court below found the allegations of defendants' answer in relation to the land-warrants to be true, and judgment was rendered in favor of defendants for their costs. The plaintiff appeals from this judgment, and also from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

1. It is apparent from the answer of defendants, and the court so finds, as we read findings Nos. 4, 5, and 6, that the note mentioned in the complaint was given in consideration of the balance due upon the note for $3,000, executed in December, 1884. It therefore became a material question upon the trial to determine what was the consideration for this original note. Upon the trial it appeared that this note of December, 1884, had a contract attached to it, written on the same sheet of paper, and was executed in duplicate, each of the parties retaining a copy. This note and agreement are in the following words:

"Merced Co., December 3, 1884. Sixty days after date, I promise to pay J. A. Langan the sum of three thousand ($3,000) dollars, gold coin of the United States, for value received. THOS. F. LANGAN."

"It is further agreed that if at the end of sixty days T. F. Langan gives collateral security to J. A. Langan, and pays one per cent. per month for the payment of two thousand dollars by a mortgage upon the homestead of Honora Langan and Heseekiah M. Martin tracts of land, and otherwise secures the payment of the same, then J. A. Langan agrees to take said security and grant further time, not to exceed two years from the date hereof, upon two thousand dollars of said note; and thereupon J. A. Langan agrees to give a bill of sale to T. F. Langan for one thousand sheep, the property of J. A. Langan, which are now in the possession of T. F. Langan, and a deed to all his (J. A. Langan's) rights in the homestead of Honora Langan, and one-fourth interest in the Heseekiah M. Martin tract of land, and the half interest in two express wagons, and all the improvements on said ranch, the title of said sheep and ranch to remain as they are at present until the performance of said agreement, to-wit, the payment of the foregoing note according to the tenor thereof, or the security of the payment as herein provided by mortgage, etc. This agreement has nothing to do with any former agreements made by said parties, but such other agreements are to be settled according to the tenor of themselves, namely, the three hundred dollars for rent of sheep, and the one thousand dollars balance due on sheep sold by J. A. Langan to T. F. Langan last year. J. A. LANGAN. THOS. F. LANGAN. Witness: W. J. STOCKTON."

This writing is to be construed as an agreement on the part of the plaintiff, J. A. Langan, to sell to the defendant T. F. Langan the property therein mentioned, for the price and upon the terms therein stated; and this agreement to sell said mentioned property and compliance with it is to be deemed full consideration for the note therein set out, precisely as if the agreement had so recited in words; and therefore the court erred in admitting oral evidence to show that the land-warrants referred to in the evidence were a part of the consideration of this note. This ruling of the court is not sustained by the rule which permits parol evidence of a consideration different from that named in the contract or deed, or the existence of a separate oral agreement, constituting a condition precedent to the taking effect of a written contract obligation. The effect of the oral evidence here was to add to and vary the terms of the written agreement by proving a contract to sell other and different property from that described in the agreement. The opinion of the court in Hubbard v. Marshall, 50 Wis. 327, 6 N. W. Rep. 497, is in point here: "The rule which allows the maker of a promissory note to show in an action upon it a failure or partial failure of consideration, is not sufficiently broad to cover this case. Here we have written instruments, which set out particularly the consideration of the notes in suit, to-wit, the assignment of notes and mortgages, and of a contract to convey lands and to sell timber upon other lands. The right to prove a failure of consideration would admit evidence of the failure of any consideration expressed in the writings, as that the title to any of the property thus sold or assigned had failed, but does not go to the extent of allowing proof of an additional consideration not expressed in the writings, and a failure thereof. To hold otherwise would be to destroy the rule which prohibits parol evidence to contradict or vary written instruments. The instrument signed by plaintiff and accepted by the defendant, and the notes signed by the latter and delivered to the former, constitute an agreement in writing. The terms of the agreement are clearly expressed, and the writings contain no clause from which it may be inferred that the parties did not intend to incorporate in them the contract just as it was made, and the whole of it."

2. In the bill of exceptions the plaintiff specifies that the decision of the court was against law, because certain findings are contradictory; and this is one of the grounds upon which a new trial was asked. The motion should have been granted for this reason: Findings 7 and 11, which are necessary to support the judgment in favor of defendants, are in conflict with findings 4, 5, and 6, as we construe them; those first named being to the effect that the consideration of the note referred to in the complaint is as stated in the answer of defendants, while findings 4, 5, and 6 are that its consideration is the balance due upon the note of December 3, 1884, and that the consideration of that note was the sale of the property described in the written agreement above set out. In this condition of the findings it cannot be said that they determine the issues of fact arising in the case, and a judgment based upon such findings is a decision against law, for which a new trial may be had. Knight v. Roche, 56 Cal. 15.

3. The appeal from the judgment in this case was taken more than one year after the date of its entry. The parties entered into a stipulation, thus extending the time for appealing from the judgment, and the respondent has not asked that the appeal be dismissed. The court, however, is not bound by this stipulation. The appeal from the judgment is dismissed. Order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial reversed.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; GAROUTTE, J.; HARRISON, J.

PATERSON, J. I concur in the order dismissing the appeal from the judgment. I also concur in the order reversing the order denying the motion for a new trial, on the ground that the findings are uncertain and conflicting.

McFARLAND, J. I dissent. I see no contradiction in the findings, and no error committed in the trial of action. I think the order should be affirmed.

PEOPLE V. ARRAS. (No. 20,875.)
(Supreme Court of California. May 26, 1891.)

LARCENY—INFORMATION—VARIANCE.

1. An information for larceny charged that defendant, "on or about the 17th day of November, 1889, did * * * steal * * * a certain bank-check, * * * which said check was then and there of the value of $95.50, and was the property of said P." Held, that this sufficiently alleges that the check was the property of P. at the time the offense was committed.¹

2. Though the information alleges that the check was drawn "in favor of one P." and the evidence shows that it was drawn in favor of "A. G. P. or bearer," the variance is immaterial.

DE HAVEN, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Yolo county; C. H. GAROUTTE, Judge.

Hurst & Hurst and Charles W. Thomas, for appellant. W. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. The defendant was convicted of grand larceny, and appeals from the judgment, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial. He relies upon two propositions to reverse the case: (1) That the demurrer to the information should have been sustained. (2) That there is a fatal variance between the information and the proof. The information charges the defendant with grand larceny in stealing a certain "bank check" drawn by one D. N. Hershey on the Bank of Yolo, in Woodland, Cal., "in favor of one Pennington, for the sum of ninety-five dollars and fifty cents, and which check was then and there of the value of $95.50, and was the property of said Pennington." The objections to the sufficiency of the information are extremely technical, and are, in our opinion, without merit. It is claimed, for instance, that the information does not allege that at the time the offense was committed the check was the property of the complaining witness, Pennington. The language of the information is that "on or about the 17th day of November, 1889, Calvin Arras did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously steal, take, and carry away certain personal property, to-wit, a certain bank-check, * * * which said check was then and there of the value of $95.50, and was the property of said Pennington." It would be overrefinement, not justified by the law or the language used, to hold the information defective in this respect. The variance relied upon by appellant consists in this: As appears by the information, the check was drawn in favor of "one Pennington;" the check when introduced in evidence disclosed the fact that it was drawn in favor of A. G. Pennington or bearer. If this be a variance, is it a material variance? A material variance between the proof and the information arises when an acquittal of the defendant under the information would be no bar to a further prosecution for the same offense. People v. Hughes, 41 Cal. 234. In this case the check described in the information and the check introduced in evidence have so many earmarks in common as to establish the identity of the two instruments as being one and the same beyond all doubt, and indicate conclusively that the misdescription could not have misled the defendant to his prejudice, and that a conviction or acquittal of the offense charged in this information would forever bar any further prosecution for the larceny of the check. This court has held that information charging the larceny of "fifty sheep," "one cow," "four cattle," "one horse," "a gold watch," etc., were sufficient as to the description of the property stolen, when taken in connection with an allegation of ownership. Surely, then, no greatly detailed description of the bank-check was necessary to be used in the information, especially when section 967 of the Penal Code provides: "In an indictment or information for the larceny of money, bank-notes, certificates of stock, or valuable securities, it is sufficient to allege the larceny to be of money, bank-notes, certificates of stock, or valuable securities, without specifying the coin, number, denomination, or kind thereof." If a defendant cannot object to being tried under an information measured by the foregoing section, how can this defendant complain that in this information he has been misled by a misdescription of the check, and that a fatal variance exists? In the case of People v. Edwards, 59 Cal. 360, the defendant was charged with the crime of burglary in entering a building known as the "store of one S. Loupe," etc. The evidence disclosed that the store belonged to S. Loupe, L. Loupe, and A. Haas, who were partners doing business there, but was known as "Loupe's Store." This court said: "It is true that the additional fact was elicited that other persons were interested with the party named in the information as owner of the store which had been broken into and entered; but, if that fact had been recited in the information, it would not have identified the offense with any ¹In an indictment for cutting timber from the land of another, the name of the owner is sufficiently charged by giving his surname and initials only. State v. Prince, (La.) 8 South. Rep. 591. greater certainty, or enabled the defendants to understand more clearly the offense with which they were charged. It only showed that there was a partially erroneous description or allegation of ownership of the store in which they had committed the offense. I dissent: DE HAVEN, J.

MECHANIC'S LIEN—NOTICE OF CLAIM.

1. Where, in an action to enforce certain liens of mechanics and others, plaintiffs' notice of lien stated that the labor and materials furnished were to be paid for at what they were reasonably worth, and the testimony showed that part of the materials were furnished upon a contract price, and the balance upon a basis of a quantum meruit, a finding that such notice was "in due form, as required by law," is error, under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1187, which requires the person to file his claim, stating the terms and conditions of his contract.

2. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1187, which requires a person to file a notice containing the name of the owner of the structure for which materials were furnished, and also the name of the person by whom he was employed, or to whom he furnished materials, a notice of lien stating that the materials were furnished to H., and that claimants were employed by both H. and N. to furnish the same, is a compliance therewith; it appearing that plaintiffs made the contract with N., the owner of the building, to furnish the materials, and that H., the contractor, gave sundry orders for payment, drawn on N., which he paid.

3. Where plaintiffs' notice of lien alleged that the price agreed upon was "the usual price, and what said materials were reasonably worth at their place of business," and that the goods were to be paid for on delivery, it sufficiently complies with the above section, requiring the notice to state the terms of the contract expressly agreed on, to entitle plaintiffs to recover on a quantum meruit; it appearing that the goods were furnished the architects of the defendant owner of the building, and that they were reasonably worth the amount sought to be recovered.

4. The notice of lien alleging that H., the contractor, purchased the goods both as contractor and as the agent of the owner of the building, an allegation in the complaint that he purchased only as agent is an immaterial variance.

5. A variance between the record and the evidence, as to the value of the materials furnished, and the way in which they were purchased and furnished, is immaterial.

6. An allegation in the complaint to enforce a mechanic's lien that "said firm sold and delivered N. certain hardware and building material, to be used in the erection and construction of said building, and affixed and attached thereto," warrants the finding that the materials were used in the building.

7. Plaintiff's notice of lien set out that his agreement with defendant N. was "that he was to be paid for said labor done and furnished at what it was reasonably worth, to be paid for when the work ceased." On the trial plaintiff testified: "My contract was to furnish all the material and do all the painting for $250." Held, that the variance between the actual contract and the statement in the notice is fatal.

8. Where M., whose contract for furnishing materials exceeded $1,000, failed to allege in his complaint that his contract was in writing, or filed for record, such omission does not contravene Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1183, which provides for the filing of a contract between the contractor and owner where the amount exceeds $1,000, it appearing that he was a subcontractor and material-man.

9. Where the memorandum of contract was filed at 10:30 o'clock A. M., and it appeared that the work was commenced no earlier than 8 or 8:30 A. M. of the same day, the evidence thereof being doubtful, and such work being of a trivial nature, a finding that the work commenced before said filing will not be sustained.

10. The contract providing that the owner should pay, upon the written order of the contractor, the material-men when the materials were used in the building, and also pay the mechanics and laborers at the end of every week for work performed, such payments are specific enough as to time and amounts to comply with Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1184, which requires the contract price to be made payable in installments at specified times after commencement of the work, or completion of specified portions, or of the whole work.

11. An objection to the failure to file, in the recorder's office, the plans and specifications of the building, is not well taken, where the contract was made after Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1183, was amended in 1887, and such amendment does not require the filing thereof.

12. The contract provided for the payment of $5,500 for all work and material, three-fourths payable in installments as the work progressed, the other fourth 35 days after completion, with an obligation to pay for materials when used, and work as it was rendered weekly. Held, that such contract was a substantial statement of "the amounts of all partial payments, together with the times when such payments shall be due and payable," required under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1183.

13. It appearing that defendant owner of the building against which liens were filed, had not retained for 35 days after the completion of the work, and paid over to those entitled thereto, 25 per cent. of the contract price, as provided in his contract, he is responsible to that extent.

Commissioners' decision. Department

2. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A. GREGG, Judge.

Graves, Turner & Graves and William Shipsey, for appellants. J. M. Wilcoxson, for respondents.

FOOTE, C. Eight actions were brought against the defendants here—the owner of a building, Thomas Norton, and his contractor, Thomas Helm—to enforce the liens of certain mechanics and material-men. Before trial they were all consolidated. The contractor, Helm, made default. Norton, the property owner, answered, denying all the allegations of the complaints, except as to his ownership of the property on which the liens were sought to be enforced. Judgment passed for the plaintiffs, it being stipulated that there should be priority in favor of one claim over another, and that all claims should be satisfied pro rata if the money arising from the sale of the property should be insufficient to pay all in full. From that judgment and an order denying a new trial the defendant Norton appeals.

One reason urged for a reversal of the judgment and order is that the finding as to the notice of lien filed by the plaintiffs Smith & Waite, that it was "in due form as required by law," is not sustained by the evidence. It is said in support of this contention that the notice of lien required to be filed under section 1187 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in order to preserve the lien, sets out that the materials to be furnished and labor to be performed were to be paid for on the basis of what they were reasonably worth, and that the proof shows that they were furnished at an agreed contract price, and that, therefore, the evidence disproves the contract set out in the notice, and, as the notice was fatally defective in this respect, no lien attached that could be enforced. The notice does state the contract as contended for by the defendant. The evidence as to the matter is that given by F. L. Smith, one of the lien claimants, as follows: "We contracted with defendant Helm to furnish this material. There was no special contract, except as to the price of the material. We gave him a list of what we would furnish a certain amount of material for. We furnished Helm with a list of the materials and prices, and most of the materials were furnished by us according to that list. Question. Did your firm agree to furnish all the material furnished in your line for $658? Answer. No, sir, we did not,—most emphatically. The list we furnished to Mr. Helm for that amount of material was taken from a portion of the plans from figures that Mr. Laird made on his plans that it would require so much,—so many feet of each kind of material,—and we gave him figures on that, and furnished it to him at the figures we gave him; but we didn't give him the figures for the whole amount of material and all other things; but, of course, we charged in the same proportion, as near as we could. The materials were reasonably worth the amount charged." From this it appears that a certain portion of the materials were furnished upon a special contract as to price, and that the balance were furnished on the basis of a quantum meruit. Inasmuch as this shows the finding to be wrong in stating that the notice of lien complied with section 1187, Code Civil Proc., giving the terms of the contract under which the materials were furnished, at least so far as a part of them are concerned, the contention of the defendants seems to be sound. Neither is the finding supported by the evidence that the materials furnished or work done by these plaintiffs were upon the agreement of the defendant Helm, with the knowledge of Norton, to pay for them all at what they were reasonably worth.

With reference to the claim of Schwartz, Beebe & Co., it is objected that the evidence shows that their notice of claim of lien was not in legal form as shown by their evidence, and therefore the finding that it is in due form is unsupported by evidence, as well as the finding that the contract was to furnish materials, etc., for what they were reasonably worth. It is further asserted that the claim of lien is at variance with the contract proved, in that the former states that the materials were furnished to Helm, and that claimants were employed by both Helm and Norton to furnish the same, while the evidence of one of the plaintiffs is: "I made a contract about this lumber with defendant Norton about June 20th. The contract was made in this way: I met defendant Norton, and we talked over the prices of lumber and the discount for cash, and that was the only time I ever had any conversation with him about it; and he said he was going to build a house, and wanted to know what the price of lumber would be. I had no conversation with defendant Helm about it. I never transacted any business with him about it. Wm. Evans came after the lumber. He brought the bill there. I gave no particular time for payment. It was to be a discount for cash. The amount charged in the notice of lien is the reasonable value of the lumber furnished; such as we sell it for in the market in our lumber-yard. About August 2d, I went to defendant Norton for payment. He said I must get an order from defendant Helm. I got an order for $1,100, and Norton paid it. I then talked with Norton about the balance of the bill. He said he and I would deal about that bill. I said I had nothing to do with Helm, and had said nothing to him about it, and he said he and I would arrange about the payment of that bill, and pay the bill up in full, and the percentage be fixed afterwards. Since we filed the lien he said he thought I had better take what I could legally get. When I was furnishing the material I heard that Helm had the contract." From this it seems that Norton did make a contract with the plaintiffs to furnish the material, that it went into the building that Helm, the contractor, was erecting for Norton, and for which he got it from the material-men, and that Helm gave orders to pay for it drawn on Norton, which were paid. Thus it would seem that practically the materials were furnished to Helm; that Norton originally contracted for them; and Helm, by giving an order for the payment, admitted his liability to pay for them. How any injury could result to Norton from this kind of a variance we do not perceive, and therefore the statement of claim, so far as it mentions the name of the person by whom the plaintiff was employed, or to whom he furnished the materials, was substantially the same as shown in evidence. As to the terms and conditions of the contract, we think there is no substantial variance between the statement in the notice of claim of lien and the evidence.

As to the Reed, Smith & Co. claim, it is said by appellant that the contract as set out in the claim of lien is different from what the proof shows it to be, and as a consequence the findings as to the nature of the contract, and that it was in due form, are unsupported by the evidence. In the notice the contract as to price is that it was "the usual price, and what said materials were reasonably worth at their place of business,"—that is, at the place of business of the plaintiffs. In that connection his counsel argues as follows: "In the notice of lien it is alleged that the price agreed upon was 'the usual price, and what said materials were reasonably worth at their place of business.' There is not a word in the testimony to support the allegation that there was such an agreement. The testimony is simply silent upon this point. Nor is there any testimony as to what the materials were reasonably worth at the place of business of Reed, Smith & Co. The Code of Civil Procedure, § 1187, requires the notice of lien to state the terms, time given, and conditions of the contract. This means the terms, time, and condition expressly agreed upon. Jewell v. McKay, (Cal.) 28 Pac. Rep. 139. If no terms, time, or conditions were agreed upon, the notice need state none. Jewell v. McKay, supra. But, when the notice states that terms, time, or conditions were agreed upon, then the proof must come up to the statement. The notice of lien states that it was agreed that payments should be at the time of delivery; no testimony that there was such an agreement." The statement in the claim appears to be nothing more than that the materials were bought and furnished on the basis that they were to be paid for on delivery at what they were reasonably worth. This would be, in effect, giving the plaintiffs a right to recover on a quantum meruit. And while it may have been unnecessary to set out such a contract in the notice of claim of lien under the decision just cited, we do not think that such decision announces the principle that where such a course is pursued the party shall not be held to have filed a notice of claim based upon a quantum meruit. The evidence being that such materials as were asked to be furnished were furnished and delivered upon the order of Helm and Norton and Laird, the architects for Norton, that they were used in the building of Norton and that they were reasonably worth $939.90, and no part of that sum has been paid, we can see no force in the defendants' contention on the point.

It is further argued in reference to this claim that there is a variance of a fatal nature between the notice of claim and the complaint; that the notice treats the contract between the contractor and the owner as valid; that it does not allege that the contract or a memorandum thereof was not filed, and in this respect it differs from all the other notices of lien; that the complaint treats the contract as void for want of filing; that in the notice of lien it is alleged that Helm, the contractor, purchased the materials both as contractor and agent of Norton; that in the complaint it is alleged that he purchased as agent only. The point made seems to have been decided adversely to the contention made here, in Lumber Co. v. Gottschalk, 81 Cal. 641-646, 22 Pac. Rep. 860.

We perceive no merit in the points made of the same tenor as to the C. H. Reed & Co. claim, looking at the record and the evidence, particularly as to the value of the materials furnished, and the way in which they were purchased and furnished.

As to the L. H. Simmons case, it is said that the complaint does not state a cause of action; that it does not state that the materials were used in the building. There was no special demurrer filed to this complaint, and the court found that the materials were used in the building, and the complaint set out that "said firm sold and delivered to said Norton certain hardware and building material to be used in the erection and construction of said building, and affixed and attached thereto." If this hardware and building materials were affixed and attached to the building, they must be said to have been used in the erection and construction of it. Under the circumstances, we think the complaint was sufficient. There is nothing in the cases cited by the appellants to sustain their contention. California Powder-Works v. Blue Tent, etc., Mines, (Cal.) 22 Pac. Rep. 391; Silvester v. Mine Co., Id. 217. There is no substantial variance between the notice of lien and the evidence as to the contract in this case.

It is contended, further, that the J. M. Huyck complaint does not state a cause of action, in that it omits to state that the building was completed. There is nothing in the point, as it is fairly inferable from the language of the complaint at folio 94 that the building was completed when the notice of lien was filed.

As to the point made of the variance between the actual contract made with Knight and the statement of the same in the notice of lien, it appears that it is well taken. The notice sets out: "That the agreement between him and said Norton was that he was to be paid for said labor done and material furnished at what it was reasonably worth, to be paid for when the work ceased." The evidence is, on the part of Knight, that he had an express contract with Norton to do painting for $250; that he did a portion of it, and stopped because Norton refused to pay him. He says: "My contract was to furnish all the material and do all the painting for $250." The other points made, that there is a variance between the notice and the contract proved, as to the name of his employer, and that the complaint does not show that the building was completed when the notice of lien was filed, are without force.

The point seems to be made upon the Mitchell complaint that it is not alleged therein that the contract for furnishing the materials, etc., was in writing or filed for record, and that as it was over $1,000 it was void. Mitchell was a mere subcontractor and material-man, and there is nothing in section 1183, Code Civil Proc., requiring a contract of the kind he had to be in writing or recorded; and, even if the contract between Norton and Helm had been void, there was no necessity for Mitchell to have had any written contract or to have recorded it.

The defendants argue that the findings are conflicting as to the completion of the building at the time the notices of lien claims were filed, and that the evidence shows that they were prematurely filed. We do not think either point well taken. The contractor had ceased to work upon the building for 30 days on December 10, 1889, before the lien claims were filed, and this is held to entitle such claimants as are here involved to file their notices of lien as they did. Lumber Co. v. Olmstead, 85 Cal. 84, 24 Pac. Rep. 648.

But we do not think that the finding of the court that the work was commenced before the contract, or a memorandum thereof, was filed in the recorder's office of the proper county, is sustained by the evidence. The memorandum was filed on the 25th of June, at 10:30 o'clock A. M. While even admitting the plaintiff's view of the testimony to be correct, which is doubtful, that any work at all was commenced before this filing, it was of the most trivial nature, and was not commenced until, at the earliest, 8 or 8:30 A. M. of the same day. It should be held, under the evidence, that the filing of the memorandum was before the work was actually commenced.

The objection urged that the contract as made is defective, in that the time specified for payments thereunder is not in accordance with section 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which reads thus: "No part of the contract price shall, by the terms of any such contract, be made payable, nor shall the same or any part thereof be paid in advance of the commencement of the work; but the contract price shall, by the terms of the contract, be made payable in installments at specified times after the commencement of the work, or on the completion of specified portions of the work, or on the completion of the whole work; provided, that at least 25 per cent. of the whole contract price shall be made payable at least thirty-five days after the final completion of the contract. * * * In case such contracts * * * do not conform substantially to the provisions of this section, the labor done and the materials furnished by all persons except the contractor shall be deemed to have been done and furnished at the personal instance and request of the person who contracted with the contractor, and they shall have a lien for the value thereof." The contract provided: "For all the material, and for the construction of said building, as herein provided, said Norton agrees to pay said Helm the aforesaid sum of $5,500, as follows: (1) Upon the written order of said Helm, he [Norton] will pay the material-man for materials furnished as soon as the same is actually worked into the building, and whether the same be furnished directly to said Helm or to his subcontractors. (2) Upon the written order of said Helm he [Norton] will pay the mechanics and laborers upon said building at the end of every week for work actually done, and whether such laborers and mechanics be hired directly by said Helm or by his subcontractors. (3) When all the material and labor is paid for, as aforesaid, then said Norton will pay said Helm the balance of said contract price: (4) provided, that said Norton may retain 25 per cent. ($1,375) of said contract price until thirty-five days shall have expired after final completion of said contract." We think these payments, to be made through Norton to the material-men when their material was used in the building, and to the mechanics and laborers weekly, were specific enough as to time and amounts to comply substantially with the statute.

In their opening brief the respondents claim that, in order for the memorandum to be valid, there must have been filed in the recorder's office the plans and specifications for the building. But this contract was made after the amendment of 1887 to section 1183, Code Civil Proc., and in that amendment it is not specified that any plans or specifications shall be filed, nor is it necessary to a proper memorandum that they should be.

In their reply brief they press this point no further, but claim that the memorandum filed is insufficient because it does not specify the time mentioned in the contract for making payments, and is not a memorandum of the contract as to payments. The memorandum, among other things, contains this: "Said Helm to be paid $5,500 for all work, labor, and material; three-fourths thereof payable in installments as work progressed. (Said Norton to pay the material-men, laborers, and mechanics upon the written order of said Helm; laborers and mechanics to be paid weekly during the progress of the work, until said three-fourths is exhausted.) The other one-fourth payable in thirty-five days after the final completion of the contract." We do not see but what this is a substantial statement of "the amounts of all partial payments, together with the times when such payments shall be due and payable," as set out in the contract, and required to be in the memorandum, under section 1183, Code Civil Proc. The point is also made that certain of the verifications to some of the claims of lien are insufficient. But we see no merit in it; it is only required that the verification should state that the claim is true, without setting out the particulars which the law requires to be contained in the body of the claim. Arata v. Mine Co., 65 Cal. 342, 4 Pac. Rep. 195.

This disposes of all the material questions argued on the appeal, and it appears that the defendant Norton did not retain for 35 days after the final completion of the work and contract, and pay it over to those entitled thereto, 25 per cent. of the contract price of $5,500, and that he is responsible to that extent, but no further, to those who make good their claim to it; but the judgments rendered are for more than that amount. For the reasons heretofore stated we advise that the judgment and order be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

GREER V. HEISER.

WATER-RIGHTS—IRRIGATION—PRIOR APPROPRIATION—WAIVER—DITCHES—VARIANCE.

1. Gen. St. Colo. § 1763, provides that "every person * * * owning or claiming any interest in any ditch * * * within any water district shall, on or before the 1st day of June, 1881, file with the clerk of the district court having jurisdiction of priority of right to the use of water for irrigation in such water district a statement of claim under oath." Section 1738 provides that no review of a decree entered under the provisions of this act shall be ordered, unless applied for within two years from the time of entering such decree. But section 1796 provides that "nothing in this act * * * shall prevent any person * * * from bringing * * * any suit * * * whatever, hitherto allowed in any court having jurisdiction, * * * at any time within four years." Held, that a party who failed to file such claim within the requisite time, or to apply for a review within two years after a decree, but brought an action within four years thereafter, is neither presumed to have had no rights, nor to have waived them.

2. In an action for priority of right to water for irrigation, it was alleged that the ditch in controversy was constructed in 1875, that it was 89 rods long, $1\frac{1}{4}$ feet wide at the bottom, and 2 feet wide at the top, and 8 inches deep, and that it watered from 30 to 35 acres. The proof showed it was 2 feet deep, and a foot and a half wide at the bottom, but that it was not constructed until 1887, and that a much smaller ditch was constructed in 1874 or 1875, which did not water more than 15 to 20 acres. Held, that a decree fixing the time of priority April 30, 1874, and allowing plaintiff the right to all the water necessary to fill his ditch, describing it as 87 rods long, $1\frac{1}{4}$ feet wide at the bottom, 2 feet wide at the top, and 8 inches deep, was erroneous for variance.

3. The facts that a party has changed the head of a ditch to a point higher up stream, or that he built a new ditch in which to carry the water of a former appropriation, do not affect his right to such water.

4. The fact that for several years a party has obtained his water exclusively through a neighbor's ditch, by agreement, will not affect his right to receive water through his own ditch, as against the neighbor's grantee.

Commissioners' decision. Appeal from district court, Douglas county.

W. T. Rogers and D. C. Webber, for appellant. Wm. Dillon and John Hipp, for appellee.

REED, C. This was a suit instituted in November, 1887, by appellee filing a bill or petition asking that a general decree made and entered of record on the 10th day of December, 1883, establishing the priorities and appropriations of water in the different irrigating ditches in water district No. 8, be amended, and that the irrigating ditch of plaintiff (appellee) be decreed entitled to priority over the ditch of appellant, known as "Ditch No. 82," and the "McCracken Ditch," and ditch No. 83, known as the "Smith Ditch." It appears that at the time the respective rights of the different ditches were adjudicated appellee allowed the matter to go by default, making no appearance and no claim, and offering no testimony in regard to any ditch or water-right whatever, the reason given in the petition being that he had only recently, and within the year, learned that the respective rights had been adjudicated and a decree entered; that he "never had any actual notice of any such proceedings, and was not aware that such proceedings were being had." It is alleged in the petition that appellee was the owner of a ditch having its head at East Cherry creek, on the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 33, in township 9 S.; that the ditch had a width of $1\frac{1}{4}$ feet on the bottom, and 2 feet on the top, and a depth of 8 inches, with a fall of 30 inches to the half mile; that it was 89 rods long, irrigating 30 or 35 acres; that the work of constructing the ditch was commenced in April, 1875, by building a dam across the creek; and that the work was continued from that date with diligence, and without intermission, until it was finished. No date is given of the time of the completion of the work, and nothing by which the court can judge in regard to diligence, nor is there anything in the testimony showing when the appropriation of such water was concluded. It is stated that 49 rods in length of the ditch is on the west side of the creek, and 40 rods on the east side. It is alleged that the construction of the McCracken and Smith ditches was not commenced until after the commencement of his ditch, but no date is given as to when the construction of such ditches commenced. It is further alleged that the two ditches had been decreed priority over his ditch, and asking that the decree be so amended as to establish the priority of his ditch over the ditches mentioned. The court found for plaintiff, (appellee,) and a decree was entered giving the ditch priority over the ditch of appellant, a portion of such decree being as follows: "A ditch constructed for the purposes of irrigation, to take its supply of water from East Cherry creek, in said water district No. 8, and having its head-gate on the north-east quarter of the north-east quarter of section 4, in tp. 10 S., said ditch being 87 rods in length, and having a width of $1\frac{1}{4}$ feet on the bottom, and two feet on the top, and a depth of 8 inches, on a grade of 30 inches to the half mile, and to be held to have appropriated as much water as will flow in a ditch of the size aforesaid. * * * Such appropriation to date from the 30th day of April, 1874."

There is a very grave question lying at the foundation of this proceeding, viz., whether, in a proceeding of this kind, against two ditches or individuals, an adjudication could be had modifying the general decree regulating the distribution of water in the entire district. But we are of the opinion that the action is warranted by section 1796, p. 583, Gen. St., when, as appears to be conceded in this case, no interests are involved or affected, save those of persons who are parties to the adjudication. This section does not appear to be in harmony with other portions of the statute. By section 1763, p. 572, Id., it is provided that "every person * * * owning or claiming any interest in any ditch, canal, or reservoir within any water district shall, on or before the 1st day of June, 1881, file with the clerk of the district court having jurisdiction of priority of right to the use of water for irrigation in such water district, a statement of claim under oath." Section 1768, p. 575, Id., provides that the clerk of the court having jurisdiction shall cause a notice to be published four consecutive weeks in a newspaper, which "shall notify all persons * * * interested as owners in any ditch, canal, or reservoir in such water district to appear at said court at the time so appointed, and file a statement of claim under oath, in case no statement has been before filed by him." Section 1772 provides for the appointment of a referee to take the testimony. Section 1773 prescribes the notice to be given by the referee. Section 1774 requires proof of said notice to be made by affidavit of referee. The statute also provides that, unless suit be brought to modify such decree within two years, the party shall be barred.

Nothing having been shown by evidence to the contrary, it is a legal presumption that proper proceedings were had by notice to give the court jurisdiction under the statute; hence the allegation in the petition that appellee never had any actual notice, etc., can be of no avail; and appellee, having filed no claim or asserted any right whatever to water, and having allowed the matter to go by default, might be held concluded by the decree as res adjudicata, as in other cases, unless the decree could be successfully attacked for fraud or irregularity, were it not for the language of the subsequent section, (1796:) "Nothing in this act, or in any decree rendered under the provisions thereof, shall prevent any person, etc., * * * from bringing and maintaining any suit or action at law whatever, hitherto allowed in any court having jurisdiction to determine any claim of priority of right to water by appropriation thereof, for irrigation or other purposes, at any time within four years." This would seem to take cases like the one at bar out of the general rule, and allow the prosecution thereof within the statutory limit of time. This being the case, failure to file claim for water, as required by the statute, would not raise the legal presumption that the party failing to file had no rights, or that he intended to waive any rights he may have had.

We do not think the decree entered in this case can be sustained.

1. There is a fatal variance between the allegations and the proof, and the decree follows neither.

2. There is no sufficient proof of material allegations or of material facts to support the decree. The allegation in the petition in regard to the ditch is: "Said ditch has its head on said Cherry creek, on the south-east quarter of the south-east quarter of section 33, tp. 9," etc. It is shown by the proof that in either 1874 or 1875 appellee constructed a dam across the stream at the point designated in the petition. The allegation in the complaint is that the same was done in 1875. The decree of priority fixes it April 30, 1874. At such dam, the evidence shows, water was taken out on both sides of the stream. A short ditch, some 40 rods in length, on the west side, was constructed by plowing three furrows, two of which were turned out by the plow and the third removed in some other manner. This ditch discharged into and ended at a gulch through which the water returned to the stream. In regard to the ditch on the east side, the testimony is very indefinite and unsatisfactory, but seems to establish the fact that there was a small ditch or single furrow that carried water. This is the most liberal extent to which the testimony of appellee can be carried, while testimony of the appellant would show no application of water, or of hardly any. The testimony of Mr. McCracken, a witness for appellee, shows great familiarity with the subject and great fairness. He says: "Heiser's ditch, before I built my ditch, would probably cover 15 or 20 acres." This estimate is the only one we have of the extent of land under the ditch, and must be held to include all the land that could be irrigated from it. He is the only witness who testifies to the existence of a ditch on the east side of the stream capable of carrying water. He says: "I do not remember definitely; I know that it was a ditch that carried water." This was the condition of affairs prior to and at the time of the construction of the McCracken ditch in 1876. The fact that upon an allegation of priority attaching April, 1875, a decree was entered establishing a priority dating April 30, 1874, is one of such importance that it should not be overlooked in discussing the variance between the allegations, proof, and decree, but is unimportant on the merits of the controversy, as either date is prior to the appropriation by the McCracken ditch. It is shown by the testimony, and not disputed, that after the construction of the McCracken ditch, by a parol agreement with McCracken, the owner, appellee took his water from that ditch, and was entitled to the use of the water of that ditch two days in each week; that at some date, not definitely fixed, by a freshet, the dam of appellee was carried away, and "a large hole washed out," so that water could not be discharged into the ditches. From that time, or the time of the construction of the McCracken ditch, no water was carried or used on the east side until the year 1887; and the testimony of witnesses shows that no water was taken from the creek by the ditches of appellee, and used on the land, for 10 or 12 years previous to the trial, until the year 1887. The short ditch on the west side was only available by discharging the water into it from the McCracken ditch. The use by appellee of water from the McCracken ditch continued until the year 1882, when appellant became the owner, and refused to recognize the pre-existing arrangement between McCracken and appellee. In 1887 appellee constructed an entirely new ditch, starting from near the head of the McCracken ditch, on the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 4, in township 10, running below the McCracken ditch some 40 rods; then by a flume crossing the creek to the east side to cover and irrigate land on that side,—the aggregate area covered by the ditch being, as testified, 30 or 35 acres. There is no proof or pretense that the ditch described in the petition, 49 rods long on the west side, and 40 rods long on the east side, 15 inches in width on the bottom, 2 feet wide on the top, and 8 inches deep, had any existence prior to the year 1887, nor that the construction of any such ditch was commenced in either 1874 or 1875, "and continued with diligence and without intermission until the same was accomplished." Nor was there in the petition any allegation in regard to a ditch commencing on section 4, in township 10, yet the decree established a ditch starting at that point, and awards it a priority, dating April 30, 1874, while the proof establishes a different appropriation in extent, at another place, of water carried in other ditches, and covering only 15 or 20 acres of land. The allegations of the petition were denied in the answer. The issues thus formed were the questions of fact to be tried. Not a material allegation was established by the evidence, and the decree is at variance with both the evidence and the allegations of the petition. In Miller v. Hallock, 9 Colo. 553, 13 Pac. Rep. 541, it was said: "There was a fatal variance between the allegation of the complaint and the proofs. In such a case it is not enough that the evidence of the plaintiff show a case that calls for some relief; to entitle him to judgment, he must show himself entitled to the relief called for by the facts stated in his complaint." "The allegations of the complaint, the evidence, and the findings should correspond in legal intent." Tucker v. Parks, 7 Colo. 62, 1 Pac. Rep. 427; Gregory v. Haworth, 25 Cal. 656; Mondran v. Goux, 51 Cal. 151. The pleadings should have been reformed, or the proceeding dismissed.

We do not deem the fact material that appellee changed the head of the ditch to a point higher up the stream, nor that he built a new ditch in which to carry the water of a former appropriation, if such appropriation had been properly made. The questions to be determined were: (1) The appropriation of water, and the date of such appropriation; (2) the extent of such appropriation. The allegations of the petition were in regard to the rights claimed and asserted, based upon an appropriation of water and construction of a ditch shown to have been in 1887. The evidence given was in regard to both the condition of affairs as they existed at the time of the original appropriation and the condition of affairs after the construction of the ditch in 1887, while the decree was based, not upon the original appropriation, but the claim and appropriation of 1887, and in one notable particular followed the allegations in the complaint, and entirely disregarded the evidence. It is said in the decree, in describing the ditch: "The said ditch being 87 rods long, [instead of 89, as testified,] and having a width of $1\frac{1}{4}$ feet on the bottom, and two feet on the top, and a depth of eight inches." The only testimony given in regard to the size of the ditch was that given by appellee, in which he says: "I believe it is about two feet deep, and a foot and a half wide on the bottom."

It is evident from the facts established that the petitioner would have been, upon proper allegations and issues, entitled to some decree establishing his prior right to some water from the stream. It is contended that, by reason of his abandonment of the ditches by him constructed prior to the construction of the McCracken ditch, he abandoned his rights of priority. This contention cannot prevail. The change in the method of carrying the water could not affect his right to a priority. It appears that by parol agreement made with McCracken his prior right to an undefined quantity of water was conceded by that agreement, and it was agreed to be the two-sevenths of the water carried in the McCracken ditch, or the use of all the water carried by the ditch two days in each week. The failure of appellant to recognize the McCracken agreement to carry the water could not affect the right of appellee, but, at most, could only compel him to find some other method of conveying it. See Thomas v. Guiraud, 6 Colo. 533. In section 6, art. 16, of the state constitution, it is declared: "The right to divert unappropriated waters of any natural stream, for beneficial uses, shall never be denied. Priority of appropriation shall give the better right, as between those using the water for the same purpose." "To constitute a legal appropriation, the water must be applied within a reasonable time to some beneficial use. * * * The diversion ripens into a valid appropriation only when the water is utilized by the consumer." Wheeler v. Irrigation Co., 10 Colo. 582, 17 Pac. Rep. 487; Sieber v. Frink, 7 Colo. 154, 2 Pac. Rep. 901; Platte Water Co. v. Northern C. Irrigation Co., 12 Colo. 531, 21 Pac. Rep. 711; Reservoir Co. v. Southworth, 13 Colo. 115, 21 Pac. Rep. 1028. From April, 1874, until 1876 must be deemed ample time in which to have constructed the cheap and limited ditches of appellee. And the water then applied, viz., sufficient for 15 or 20 acres, must be taken as the extent of the appropriation; consequently the extent of appellee's priority should have been deemed to be water sufficient for 15 or 20 acres, or the equivalent of two-sevenths of the water carried by the McCracken ditch. No testimony was introduced to establish the quantity of either. The arbitrary decree allowing appellee at all times sufficient water to fill a ditch of the capacity named in the decree, regardless of the amount of the appropriation, was erroneous. The amount actually appropriated in 1874 or 1875, and not the capacity of the ditch in 1887, should have been the basis of the decree on proper issues. A ditch of the size and with the fall as described in the decree is capable of carrying nearly water enough for 160 acres, certainly enough for 100 acres. Its capacity may be greater than that of the McCracken ditch, and may be greater than the amount of water ordinarily carried in the stream at that point. The prior right of appellee should have been limited in the decree to either the proved quantity requisite for 15 or 20 acres, or the quantity agreed upon with McCracken. We advise that the decree be reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial in conformity with the views here expressed.

TRAVELERS' INS. CO. OF HARTFORD V.
MURRAY.

EVIDENCE.

1. Where, in a trial to the court, testimony is received subject to a decision as to its competency on final hearing, and on a motion to strike out, and no further objection to its admission is made, and no exception reserved, the appellate court cannot pass on its admissibility.

2. In an action on an accident insurance policy for the death of the insured from hernia, caused by an accident while in performance of his duty as a railroad fireman, where the defense is that he was for years before afflicted with chronic hernia, testimony of the engineer that he had been continuously at work prior to the accident is admissible.

3. In such action, deceased's physician testified that, after the accident alleged to have resulted in hernia, deceased told him that he had never before, to his knowledge, had a rupture or any such trouble, but that he had noticed a little lump there for eight years back. The testimony of several physicians was against the possibility of there having been hernia, and deceased's mother and brother, with whom he lived, and who frequently saw his person, and a number of intimate friends, testified to his good health and vigor. Held, that the existence of hernia previous to the accident was not established.

4. Where a person, injured in an accident resulting in hernia, dies after a dangerous and unsuccessful surgical operation resulting in peritonitis, performed when death seemed inevitable without it, the accident is the proximate cause of his death.

5. An accident insurance policy, insuring against death "from bodily injuries effected through external, violent, and accidental means," but excepting death from hernia, does not relieve the insurer from liability where death results from hernia caused by "external, violent, and accidental means."

BISSELL, C., dissenting.

Commissioners' decision. Appeal from Lake county court.

On the 17th of August, 1886, appellant issued and delivered to M. J. McDonald, at Leadville, a policy of insurance, called an "accident policy," on his life, for $1,500, payable, in case of his death, to his mother, Margaret Murray, (appellee.) McDonald, at the time of securing such policy, and for a long time previous thereto, and for some time subsequently, up to the time of the injury resulting in death, was employed as fireman on an engine of the Denver & Rio Grande Railway. On the 28th day of January, 1887, McDonald, while in the discharge of his duties upon the engine, received an injury, supposed to be from slipping and falling, striking his bowels upon some part of the machinery, causing rupture and inguinal hernia. An attempt to reduce it, and keep the protruding portion of the bowels in place by ordinary and artificial methods, proving unsuccessful, and the hernia becoming strangulated, in order to save his life a surgical operation was performed, which failed to accomplish that result, and on the 14th of February following he died. The appellant refused to pay the sum insured, and the mother, beneficiary under the policy, brought suit. The policy of insurance is copied entire in the complaint, the only portion of which necessary to a discussion and proper understanding of the case is as follows: "This insurance does not cover disappearance; nor injuries of which there are no visible mark upon the body; nor accident nor death or disability resulting wholly or partly, directly or indirectly, from any of the following causes, or while so engaged or so afflicted: * * * Medical or surgical treatment; * * * disease or bodily infirmity; hernia, fits, vertigo, sleep-walking." The written application of the deceased for insurance was put in evidence by appellant, in which occurs the following paragraph, which is all that is considered necessary to be copied: "I have never had, nor am I subject to, fits, disorders of the brain, or any bodily or mental infirmity, except as herein stated." The special defenses pleaded in the answer, and relied upon by the appellant, after general traverses of the allegations in the complaint, were, in substance—First, that by the terms of the contract of insurance it was agreed that the policy of insurance should not cover death resulting wholly or partly, directly or indirectly, from hernia, and that the death was the direct result of hernia; second, that it was agreed that the policy of insurance should not cover death resulting wholly or partly, directly or indirectly, from medical or surgical treatment, and that the cause of death was medical and surgical treatment, and no other cause; third, (in the amended answer,) that the application of deceased contained a warranty that he never had been, prior to such application, subject to any bodily infirmity, that the warranty was not true, and that deceased had hernia for a long time prior to making such application, and was at the time of the application subject to hernia,—to which replications were filed putting in issue the allegations of the answer. A jury having been waived, the cause was tried to the court, resulting in a judgment for appellee for $1,500 and costs.

REED, C., (after stating the facts as above.) Nearly all the errors assigned are based upon the admission and rejection of evidence; the first six being directed to the supposed error of the court in allowing Dr. Heron, the attending physician, and Patrick Harvey, the locomotive engineer under whom the deceased was employed, to testify to the statements made by the deceased immediately after the injury was received, in regard to the manner and character of the accident by which the injury was received. It appears from the evidence that no one saw the accident, or knew of its occurrence or the injury, until nearly half an hour after its occurrence; and that deceased was not conscious of having received serious injury, and continued to perform his duties for about that length of time, when the engineer observed the changed appearance and apparent suffering of his fireman, and made inquiries in regard to its cause. The statements made to the engineer, and testified to by him, and those made to the physician, and testified to by him, being all the evidence in regard to the character of the accident, and the manner in which it occurred, it is insisted were hearsay, and incompetent, and erroneously admitted. It appears from the record that objections were made to the admission of such testimony by appellant's counsel, on the grounds above stated, and the court admitted the physician's testimony "subject to the objection to be decided upon the final hearing," and afterwards admitted the engineer's testimony "subject to the motion to strike out." The record does not show that any further objection or motion was made, or that the ruling of the court was afterwards or otherwise expressed, and no exception appears to have been taken at any time. The exception at the close of the trial was in these words: "To which ruling of the court in finding the issues in favor of said plaintiff, and against said defendant, and in rendering judgment upon said finding in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant, the said defendant, by his counsel, then and there excepted." This cannot, in any sense, be construed as an exception to the admission of the testimony of the physician, the engineer, or any other witness. Hence, under the well-established rule of this court, we are relieved from the necessity of passing upon the admissibility of the testimony. The cause having been voluntarily submitted by both parties to a trial by the court without a jury, the testimony having been received by the court subject to a decision as to the competency thereof upon final hearing and upon a motion to strike out, and no further challenge to the testimony having been interposed, and no exception whatever having been reserved, we cannot properly sustain the assignments of error based upon the admission of said testimony. We may reasonably presume that counsel supposed at the trial, as we do now, that the court of its own motion disregarded all improper testimony, and based its finding and judgment upon competent evidence only. Rollins v. Board, 15 Colo. —, 25 Pac. Rep. 319.

The questions to be determined upon the trial were—First. Did the deceased, while following his avocation and performing his duties, receive an injury which caused his death? Second. Was such injury one against which he was insured by the appellant? Third. Was the policy of insurance void by having been obtained through fraudulent misrepresentations of the insured?

The proof of an injury having been received by the deceased was not dependent upon his declarations to the engineer or to his physician. If it had been, the admission of the testimony would probably have been more strenuously resisted at the trial. That there had been serious injury was obvious; its physical effects were patent and apparent. A brother of the deceased testified to seeing a bruise and discoloration upon the bowels of the deceased shortly after the alleged accident. The fact of the injury was at once established by the examination of the physician, and his testimony in regard to it, and supported by that of all the physicians who made an examination. The fact of the injury having been received by the deceased while attending to his duties was established by the evidence of Harvey, the engineer. These being the facts necessary to be proved, and they not having been dependent upon the statements of the deceased, the peculiar attendant circumstances of the accident that caused the injury were incidental and secondary.

The seventh assignment of error is to the effect that the court allowed the witness Harvey to testify that the deceased had been continually at work for a long time previous to the injury, etc. We do not think this was error. The defense relied upon and sought to be established was that the deceased had for years been afflicted with chronic hernia, and any and all proper testimony to show his habits, health, vigor, and ability to perform continued hard labor, up to the time of the injury, was competent as refuting that supposition. McCarthy v. Insurance Co., 8 Biss. 362.

The other objections urged in regard to the admission of testimony appear to be far more technical than substantial. The special defense that the policy of insurance was fraudulently obtained by misrepresentations of his physical condition in the application for insurance, and that the deceased had been suffering from or subject to a hernia for several years previous, is not sustained by the evidence. It is based entirely upon the statements of the deceased to the physician after he received the injury. Dr. Heron's testimony was: "The first day he was injured he told me he never knew he had a rupture. * * * He told me he never knew he was ruptured, or had any trouble or had any hernia or a rupture there at all. He said he noticed a little lump there, and I quizzed him. I asked him how far back he remembered it, and he said there was a lump there at times; he did not know, but about eight years back." This was substantially all upon which to base the defense, and, taken as a whole, is no admission whatever of the existence of hernia. He says he never knew he was ruptured, or had any trouble. This is almost conclusive evidence that no such trouble had existed, and that he had no definite idea of what a hernia was. It seems physically impossible that it could have existed that length of time, and he have no trouble or knowledge of it. A large number of physicians were examined as experts, and the weight of the evidence was clearly against the possibility of his having been afflicted with hernia previous to the injury. The mother, with whom he had always resided, and with whom he resided at the time of his death, testified to having seen frequently his person exposed at the point of the supposed hernia, and that none existed, and if, as supposed, a hernia was developed at an early age, she must have during all these years learned of its existence. The brother, who had during all the years associated and slept with him, who had frequently seen his person exposed, said: "If there had been anything there, I would have seen it." That he saw nothing, and his brother never complained. Several witnesses who knew him intimately, and had for a long period, testified to his continued good health, bodily vigor, and a condition absolutely incompatible with the supposed disability. In order to make the supposed defense available, the previous existence of the hernia must have been established affirmatively by competent testimony, like any other material fact. It could not be established by supposition or presumption. "Neither party is bound to prove negatives. Upon each rests the burden of proving the affirmative matter which he alleges, and upon which issue is taken." McCarthy v. Insurance Co., supra. The statements to his physician in regard to the "lump" could, under no circumstances, be regarded as an admission for the purposes of this suit. The subject of the policy of insurance was not under consideration, probably not thought of, by either party to the conversation. There is no testimony that during treatment, including the incision at the surgical operation, any evidence was found of the existence of a case of chronic hernia. If, as supposed by counsel of appellant, the admission by the court of the statements of the deceased in regard to the manner in which the injury was received was error, the statements of deceased to his physician in regard to the former existence of a lump, being of the same character, was a very weak basis upon which to build a defense to defeat the action. It is apparent that the trial court found, as a fact, that deceased had not been afflicted with hernia previous to the injury, and that the injury received was the proximate and sole cause of death. By "proximate cause" is meant that cause which directly precedes and produces the effect, as distinguished from a remote cause. "Whether a cause is proximate or remote does not depend alone upon the closeness in the way of time in which certain things occur." Cunningham v. Lyness, 22 Wis. 245. "An efficient, adequate cause, being found, must be deemed the true cause, unless some other cause not incidental to it, but independent of it, is shown to have intervened between it and the result." Kellogg v. Railroad Co., 26 Wis. 223; McCarthy v. Insurance Co., supra; Insurance Co. v. Crandal, 120 U.S. 527, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 685; Mallory v. Insurance Co., 47 N. Y. 52. After a careful examination of the evidence, we think it was ample to sustain the finding.

There is no evidence whatever to establish the defense that the insured "died of medical and surgical treatment, and no other cause." All the physicians who saw the case seem to have conceded that death was inevitable without a surgical operation. No charge of unskillfulness in performing the operation is made or suggested. That life was prolonged for quite a period by the operation is shown by the evidence. That the insured died of peritonitis resulting from the surgical operation is unimportant, when the fact is established that death was inevitable without the operation, and that, after a consultation of skilled physicians, the operation was resolved upon—necessarily dangerous—as the only possible means of preserving life.

It is ably urged in argument that deceased died of hernia, a cause of death excepted by the policy. Although appellant in its third special defense, which is verified, averred "that the cause of said death was medical and surgical treatment, and no other cause," which seems to be greatly at variance with the theory of the argument, counsel, perhaps, was not precluded by it. We cannot adopt the construction of the exception in the contract of insurance so ably urged. The hernia must be regarded as the result of the accident that caused the death; the cause of death; the force of the blow received; the consequent injury arising from the concussion, and the hernia as resulting. Deceased was insured against the accident by the terms of the body of the policy. Had he died of ordinary hernia not produced by a serious and violent injury, appellant would probably have been released from payment; but, when the hernia is the accidental result of the force of the blow, it cannot be regarded as excepted. In this view, both the contract of insurance and the exception can be allowed to stand without doing violence to either,—a rule always adopted when practicable. If not so construed, the exception must yield in this instance. It is "the fundamental rule of interpretation that policies of insurance are to be construed most strongly against the insurers who frame them." Insurance Co. v. Crandal, supra; Burkhard v. Insurance Co., 102 Pa. St. 262. It is now well recognized as a general rule that, where an exception to a policy of insurance, emanating from the insurance company, is capable of two meanings, the one is to be adopted which is most favorable to the insured. Insurance Co. v. Horner, 14 Colo. 391, 23 Pac. Rep. 788; May, Ins. §§ 172-179; Wood, Ins. §§ 141-146; Allen v. Insurance Co., 85 N. Y. 473; Insurance Co. v. Cropper, 32 Pa. St. 351. The business of the company is to insure against accident. The object of the insured in making the contract was to secure compensation and support in case of injury or disability arising from accident, and, in case of accidental death, to furnish a fund for the benefit of the mother. The contract in the policy for and on which he paid the consideration was to pay the mother $1,500, "if death shall result * * * from bodily injuries effected during the term of this insurance through external, violent, and accidental means." That the contingency against which he insured did happen, and death ensued, is uncontradicted; that the bodily injuries resulting in death were received "through external, violent, and accidental means" was established beyond controversy. Such construction must be given to contracts of this kind as was evidently contemplated by the parties, and, while so construing them as to protect the insurer against fraud, deception, and misrepresentation, give the insured the benefit of his contract and consideration for the premium paid. Where, as in this case, there was no evidence of fraud or intentional imposition, the defense must fail. We advise that the judgment be affirmed.

RICHMOND, C., concurs. BISSELL, C., dissents.

FIRST NAT. BANK OF COLORADO SPRINGS
v. WILBUR.

CHATTEL MORTGAGES—RIGHTS OF MORTGAGOR—TROVER.

1. The common-law rule that trover will not lie in favor of the mortgagor against the mortgagee who has taken possession of the goods for condition broken is not changed by the Colorado Code of Civil Procedure, which abolishes the forms of action, and hence, in the absence of fraud, the mortgagor cannot recover of the mortgagee the difference between the value of the goods taken possession of by him and the price for which he sold them.

2. The mortgagee in possession after condition broken has a title which falls short of being absolute, to the extent that he is bound to exercise reasonable care and diligence in disposing of the goods, and to account for any surplus after payment of his debt.

Appeal from district court, Arapahoe county.

In October, 1882, Matthew C. Wilbur brought this suit against the First National Bank of Colorado Springs to recover the difference between the price at which certain personal property was sold under mortgage by the bank and its value in the market at the date of sale; and also to recover the difference between the actual value of certain assigned book-accounts and the price at which the same were sold. The complaint in form is analogous to one in the old action of trover, and contains all its essential elements. It set up the ownership of the plaintiff in the goods, the possession and conversion by the bank and Halthusen, and prayed a money judgment. The value of the chattels is stated to be $12,600 in this pleading, and the book-accounts at $1,300. The answer admits the indebtedness of plaintiff in the sum of $4,000 on the 1st of August, 1882, and alleges that said indebtedness was secured by three several mortgages upon the livery stock of plaintiff, and by an assignment to it of certain book-accounts. It admits that the property described in the complaint was a correct list of the property taken possession of by plaintiff on August 1, 1882, under the several mortgages; it denies that the property was of the value of $12,675, as alleged in the complaint; states its true value to have been no greater than $7,400; and the book-accounts transferred of no greater value than $400. It is alleged also in the answer that said mortgages "given to secure said indebtedness as aforesaid were given subject to a prior chattel mortgage held by Ruth A. Newton upon the same property to secure her in the payment of $4,000, and interest thereon at 10% per annum from April 20, 1881, no part of which has been paid." And this is not denied in the replication. The sales to the defendant Halthusen upon the 8th day of August, 1882, are admitted in the answer, but all collusion and bad faith is denied. It is expressly alleged that said transfers were made subject to said prior mortgage to Ruth Ann Newton, aforesaid, and this also is not denied. It alleges violations by appellee of the provisions of the chattel mortgages, and justifies the taking possession of the property. Without objection, the cause was tried to a jury, and under oral instructions, resulting in a verdict for the plaintiff, Wilbur, of $8,188.82, with interest amounting to $2,708.41. The interest was subsequently remitted. No specific objection was taken to the charge. One in the general form of an "exception in favor of the defendant" was saved.

At the trial it appeared that in the spring of 1881 plaintiff, Wilbur, and one J. E. Newton formed a copartnership for the carrying on of the livery business at Colorado Springs. On the 12th day of October, 1881, the firm was indebted to the defendant bank in about the sum of $3,300. It appeared that at this date one Humphrey, who was connected with the institution, had signed an appeal-bond for the benefit of the firm. To secure both the indebtedness and the contingent liability, the firm, on the day named, executed a chattel mortgage upon all the livery stock owned by it, which is specifically set out both in the instrument and in the complaint. Later, the liability upon the bond was apparently extinguished, and the mortgage stood as security for the loan. By its terms and the tenor of the note it was due one year after its date. It contained all the usual grinding provisions of that class of securities as taken by financial institutions, but was expressly made subject to the prior mortgage of Mrs. Newton. In case of default in payment of the principal, or of the interest, which was to be paid monthly, or in the event of an attachment against the firm, or in case the mortgagee should feel "insecure or unsafe in his security," the mortgagee was authorized to take "immediate and full possession," and to "proceed to sell the said property at public or private sale, on such terms, and for such price or prices, in such manner, and to such persons, as he might see fit." The debt was not diminished by the payment of any part of the principal, and was increased by a failure to pay the accrued and accruing interest. Later, and in May and July, 1882, the security was somewhat increased by mortgages on other property which had been added by purchase to the stock. These later mortgages were given to secure the identical paper and indebtedness protected by the original instrument. The course of dealing had resulted in the creation of other debts between the parties which appeared to exist in the shape of overdrafts, and a general bank balance against the firm. In July, 1882, as a further security to cover all existing debts, the firm, by assignment, transferred to the bank all its bills receivable and book-accounts, amounting in value to something like a thousand dollars. Wilbur was left in charge of the collections, and continued to run the business until about the 1st of August, when he voluntarily turned over all the property covered by the mortgages to the bank which held the securities. At the time of the formation of the copartnership between Wilbur and Newton, the firm executed a mortgage to Newton's mother, Ruth Newton, to secure her for the $4,000 which she had loaned her son to put into the business. The defendant offered this mortgage in evidence, as also the indorsement on its margin showing its satisfaction on the day following the sale to Halthusen. Neither the instrument nor the indorsement were admitted in evidence, and defendants saved an exception to the ruling of the court upon that question. The bank took possession, as the record shows, under the several mortgages executed by the firm covering the property described in the instruments. It was conceded on the trial, and for all its purposes, that the bank had a right, by the terms of the securities, to take possession as and when it did. On the 9th of August, 1882, after the bank had gotten the property under its control, it sold the entire stock at private sale, in a lump, together with the assigned book accounts, to Halthusen, and put him in possession. The price for which both the stock and accounts were sold was $3,500. With the proceeds the bank canceled the original note of $3,221.17, and surrendered it to Mr. Newton, formerly one of the concern. The balance was credited to the unsecured account, which amounted to about $470. This left a balance unpaid, which was charged to profit and loss, but it still stood as a claim against the concern. It was clearly established on the trial that the price which Halthusen paid was far below the actual value of the property, unless he took subject to, and was compelled to pay, the Newton mortgage. After the verdict a motion for a new trial was filed and overruled. From the judgment entered upon the verdict in favor of the plaintiff, Wilbur, the bank appeals.

L. S. Dixon and A. E. Pattison, for appellant. M. B. Carpenter, for appellee.

HAYT, J., (after stating the facts as above.) To hold that an action in the nature of trover can be maintained, under the circumstances of this case, would be contrary to the uniform current of both American and English authority. To support such an action, the plaintiff must allege and prove a right of possession in himself, and a conversion of the property by the defendant. The right of possession being in the mortgagee, the mortgagor cannot, after default, maintain trover against him for a refusal to surrender the property or for selling it. It is no answer to say that the forms of action have been abolished by our Civil Code. The legal and equitable rights of the parties must still be determined by the same principles that measured the rights and liabilities under the former practice. Jones, Mortg. §§ 435, 436; Landon v. Emmons, 97 Mass. 37; Horn v.

Reitler, 12 Colo. 315, 21 Pac. Rep. 186; Bank v. Ford, 7 Colo. 314, 3 Pac. Rep. 449. "A mortgagor, after condition broken, while the chattels remain in the hands of the mortgagee, may, under proper circumstances, maintain a bill in equity to redeem, or a bill for an accounting after they are disposed of, and perhaps an action for damages, when the conduct of the mortgagee has been negligent or oppressive; but these actions proceed upon principles quite different from an action of replevin." Horn v. Reitler, supra. The complaint proceeds upon the theory that the property was unlawfully converted by the defendants, while admitting that the mortgagee took possession of the property after condition broken. No facts are alleged going to show that the defendants, or either of them, were properly chargeable with fraud, negligence, or oppression. From this brief statement it will be seen that the pleading is so radically defective that it could not have been sustained if a proper demurrer had been directed against it. Instead of demurring, however, appellant answered, taking issue upon the allegations of the complaint, and alleging a bona fide sale of the property to Halthusen, and the due application of the proceeds of such sale to the extinguishment of the secured indebtedness. Should it be conceded that the issues were by the answer and replication broadened sufficiently to admit proof of fraud had such evidence been tendered, none was offered except as the inadequacy of price may have tended to establish such fraud. The cause seems to have been tried upon a mistaken theory throughout. The scope and nature of the issues, as understood by counsel at the trial, are made plain by the charge of the court to the jury. They were told that the principal things to be determined were the amount of plaintiff's indebtedness to the bank and the value of the property taken by it. If the value of the property exceeded the indebtedness, the jury were plainly told that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the balance. These were the only questions left by the charge for the jury to determine. No question was submitted to the jury as to the bona fides of the sale of the mortgaged property. This should not be considered a matter of surprise, in view of the entire omission of evidence specially directed to this point. The proof is not sufficient to support any cause of action that can be maintained by a mortgagor against a mortgagee in possession after condition broken. Appellee seeks to charge the defendant bank upon the assumption that it had taken property to which the plaintiff had a legal title, and, having disposed of it by sale, it was responsible to him for the difference between the price realized and the market value of the property at the time. It is clear, upon the authorities, that the bank was not responsible upon any such hypothesis, and that the sale, as disclosed by the record, was not a conversion for which it could be held liable. Landon v. Emmons, supra; Atchison v. Graham, 14 Colo. 217, 23 Pac. Rep. 876; Metzler v. James, 12 Colo. 322, 19 Pac. Rep. 885; Heyland v. Badger, 35 Cal.

404; Stamps v. Gilman, 43 Miss. 456; Bragelman v. Daue, 69 N. Y. 69. Aside from this, the judgment rendered is excessive, and cannot for this reason be allowed to stand. The chattels at the date of the sale to Halthusen are alleged in the complaint to have been of the value of $12,600, and the book-account $1,300, making a total of $13,900 as the greatest possible value of the property. As against this, the record discloses that Mrs. Newton held a mortgage upon the property for $4,000 and accrued interest, amounting at the time of the trial to the sum of $400. To this total of $4,400 should be added the sum of $3,500, received from Halthusen, and we have a total of $7,900 as the consideration for the sale. If the proof had supported the allegations of the complaint as to the value of the property, and had been otherwise sufficient, appellees would have been entitled only to a judgment for the difference between these two amounts, or $6,000, while the judgment rendered is for $8,138.33. The proof, however, fell short of sustaining the allegations of the complaint in reference to value. As we have seen, it is admitted by the pleadings that the sale was made subject to the Newton mortgage for $4,400; and although it does not appear that the attention of the court below was called to this state of the pleadings at the trial, nevertheless the parties to the litigation and their attorneys must be held to have understood that such title as Halthusen acquired was subject to the Newton mortgage. This money was due Mrs. Newton. It was never paid to the bank, and it was neither liable to Mrs. Newton nor to the plaintiff for it. Such rights as she may have had by reason of her mortgage upon the property were neither extinguished nor in any way impaired by the sale to Halthusen. If any person was entitled to recover this amount, it was Mrs. Newton, and not the plaintiff, and she is not a party to this action.

In view of a retrial of the case, we deem it necessary to notice briefly the contention of appellants that the title of a mortgagee in possession after condition broken is absolute. While his title is sometimes stated to be absolute, this is only true at law, and the use of the word, even in this connection, is misleading, in view of the reserved rights of the mortgagor as defined by the modern decisions. It is now well established that he will be held to the exercise of reasonable care and diligence in the disposition of the property, and also to account for any surplus remaining after his debt is fully discharged. Bird v. Davis, 14 N. J. Eq. 474; Stromberg v. Lindberg, 25 Minn. 513; Webber v. Emmerson, 3 Colo. 248; Metzler v. James, supra; Wygall v. Bigelow, 42 Kan. 479, 22 Pac. Rep. 612; Leach v. Kimball, 34 N. H. 568; McConnell v. People, 84 Ill. 583; Hungate v. Reynolds, 72 Ill. 425. The judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded, with direction to the district court to allow the parties to amend the pleadings as they may be advised.

DENVER & R. G. R. CO. v. STARK.

EMINENT DOMAIN—VERDICT—BENEFITS.

The eminent domain act of Colorado (Code Civil Proc. § 254) provides that the verdict of the jury awarding damages shall state a description of the land taken, with its value; the damages, if any, to the residue; and the amount and value of the benefit. Held, that where the court refuses to instruct that the verdict must be in the language and form of the statute, and the verdict fails to show any finding as to the benefit, the judgment will be reversed.

Commissioners' decision. Appeal from district court, Montrose county.

Wolcott & Valle and Bell & Goudy, for appellant. Simmons & Wilson, for appellee.

RICHMOND, C. This was a proceeding instituted by appellant herein for the purpose of condemning a right of way through a tract of land owned by the appellee, H. M. Stark, and situate in the county of Montrose, Colo. To the petition answer was filed, and thereafter a jury selected for the purpose of determining the compensation to be awarded. To the manner of selecting the jury appellant objected, and also to the instruction of the court. The trial resulted in a judgment for appellee for the sum of $1,368. Motion to set aside the verdict and for a new trial duly made and overruled. Many errors are assigned, but we think the only one to be considered is the error of the court in its instructions to the jury, and its refusal to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial. The eminent domain act (Code Civil Proc. § 254) provides that the report of the commissioners or the verdict of the jury in every case shall state: First, an accurate description of the land taken; second, the value of the land or property actually taken; third, the damages, if any, to the residue of such land or property; and, fourth, the amount and value of the benefit. The judge, although requested to instruct the jury that their verdict should be in the language and form as provided by statute, declined to do so, and the verdict of the jury fails to state the amount and value of the benefit, if any, as provided by this act. The record discloses that the jury in person inspected and reviewed the premises, besides hearing much testimony, and the statute contemplates that they should pass upon the question of whether or not the land of the defendant would be in any manner benefited by the construction of the road as contemplated by the petition. It is very evident from the record that the jury did not pass upon this question. This court in the case of Railroad Co. v. Rudd, 5 Colo. 270, has settled the question here under consideration. In that case it is decided that the matter of benefits must be considered, and that the statute must be strictly pursued. Accepting that decision as conclusive of the question here, we are compelled to recommend that the judgment of the court below be reversed, and the case remanded for further proceedings.

BISSELL and REED, CC., concur.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons stated in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed.

AGREEMENT FOR MINING LEASE — SUFFICIENCY — SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE.

1. A mining company advertised for bids for the lease of its property, in answer to which plaintiff offered "to take lease on the whole property at 35 per cent. royalty at eighteen months, and agree to expend at least $5,000 every month in development work; I to have 30 days to begin work, in order to make examination of property, and put machinery in place. Lease to date from time of commencing work. Settlement as usual." At a meeting of the officers of the mining company it was moved and carried that plaintiff's bid be accepted, and the president empowered to draw up a lease in conjunction with plaintiff, and present it to the board of directors for their consideration. The president thereupon telegraphed to plaintiff that the lease had been awarded to him. Held, that this constituted a binding and concluded agreement for a lease.

2. The time for the beginning of the term, as fixed by plaintiff's offer, is sufficiently definite to support a decree of specific performance.

3. The words "settlement as usual," in connection with the specified royalty, are sufficiently definite as to the matter of compensation where they may refer either to the custom of the district or to the terms of settlement under a prior lease that plaintiff had of the same property.

4. It is no defense to a suit for specific performance that the company had already leased a part of the property, and could not make a lease of the whole, especially where plaintiff had offered to take the residue.

5. Plaintiff is not bound under this contract to accept a lease which requires him to do certain work on the property regardless of its productiveness, and gives the lessor the privilege under certain contingencies to dispose of the ore mined.

BISSELL, C., and HATT, J., dissenting.

Commissioners' decision. Error to district court, Lake county.

T. J. O'Donnell and L. S. Dixon, for plaintiff in error. Rucker & Titcomb, for defendants in error.

READ, C. This was a suit in equity, brought by plaintiff in error against the defendants, to compel the specific performance of an alleged contract to lease certain mining property in the county of Pitkin. Upon the hearing a decree was entered dismissing the suit. The pleadings were very lengthy, and a large mass of testimony was taken. The issues made by the pleadings, and the facts established by the testimony, deemed necessary for an understanding of the case, are, to save repetition, embraced in the opinion instead of in a statement of the case. There are numerous assignments of error, many upon minor and unimportant points. The only one necessary to be considered is the general one, — the twelfth: "That the court erred in its finding, judgment, and decree in favor of the defendant and against the plaintiff." There being no serious controversy in regard to the facts and premises, the determination of the case depends upon the solution of the following questions or propositions: First. Did what transpired between the parties constitute a binding and concluded agreement for the lease of the property; and, if so, was it sufficiently definite to be enforced in a proceeding to compel specific performance? Second. Was the failure to consummate the agreement by a written contract of lease attributable to the plaintiff or defendants? The advertisement for bids to lease the property of defendants was as follows: "Bids will be received at the office of the Justice Mining Co., up to noon on March 18, 1889, for lease or leases on the properties of the Justice Mining Co., consisting of the Justice, Marlin, Monte Cristo, and Western Union, situated in Tourtelotte park, and consisting of 26.8 acres. Bids to be addressed to Peter Lux, President J. M. Co." In response to this, plaintiff, who had formerly with others a lease upon and worked the same property, as alleged, at great pecuniary loss, made three proposals or bids, — two for a portion of the property, which we need not consider, and the third for the entire property, as follows: "I will take lease on the whole property at thirty-five per cent. royalty at eighteen months, and agree to expend, under the best management obtainable, at least five thousand ($5,000) dollars each and every month during life of lease in development work, I to have thirty (30) days to begin work, in order to make examination of property, and put machinery in place. Lease to date from time of commencing work. Settlement as usual." At a corporate meeting of the officers of the defendant the third proposition or bid of plaintiff was accepted, and evidenced by the following entry made in the minutes of the corporate proceedings: "After some deliberation it was moved and carried that F. T. Cochrane & Co.'s proposition for lease on the three sections of the Justice Mining Co.'s property, according to paragraph 3, be accepted. (Date of proposition, Denver, Colorado, March 18, 1889.) Moved and carried that all other bids be rejected." And as appears in the minutes of the same meeting, the following corporate action was taken: "Moved and carried that the president be empowered to draw up the lease in conjunction with Mr. Cochrane, or his agent, and present it to the board of directors for their consideration. Moved and carried we now adjourn subject to the call of the president." On the same day the defendant, by Peter Lux, its president, sent the following telegram to plaintiff at Denver: "F. T. Cochrane, Senate Chamber: Lease awarded to you on last proposition. PETER LUX." The advertisement or offer to lease was definite in regard to the property to be leased, naming the respective claims constituting the property, and giving the aggregate area in acres and fractions of an acre. The bid of plaintiff was, as to extent of property, length of term, percentage or rental to be paid, and amount to be expended monthly in development, and manner of expenditure, equally definite. The corporate acceptance by defendants entered of record, was a general and unqualified acceptance of the plaintiff's bid as made, and the notification of the acceptance general and unqualified. Under the authorities, to create a valid contract of lease but few points of mutual agreement are necessary: First, there must be a definite agreement as to the extent and bounds of the property leased; second, a definite and agreed term; and, third, a definite and agreed price of rental, and the time and manner of payment. These appear to be the only essentials; the others, such as the covenant for the peaceful possession on the part of the lessor, diligent, proper, workman-like and continuous working with a view to best results, both present and prospective, on the part of the lessee; and where, as in this case, the rental is a share or percentage of the proceeds, the disposition of the ore to the best advantage, the keeping of accurate and honest accounts and making honest returns, are secondary and implied covenants, growing out of the principal agreement.

It is contended by counsel for defendants that the above-recited acts of the parties did not constitute a concluded agreement; that they in certain respects lacked the necessary definiteness, and could only be regarded as inconclusive negotiations in regard to a specific contract to be afterwards agreed upon and executed by the parties. It is contended, first, that there was no definite time designated for the beginning of the term. With this, we cannot agree. The language of the bid is: "I to have thirty days to begin work. * * * Lease to date from time of commencing work." If the offer was accepted, and plaintiff notified of its acceptance, the agreement for lease would be concluded as of that date, and the 30 days would commence to run, and the term would commence at the expiration of the 30 days. It is also contended that there was a want of definiteness in regard to the basis upon which the rental of 35 per cent. was to be computed, as to what expenses of production the gross proceeds from ore were to be subject before calculating the percentage, and the offer of plaintiff, containing in regard to payment only the words, "settlement as usual." It is contended that there would be no concluded contract until the terms of payment were definitely settled, specified, and defined. The plaintiff had for a long time been a lessee of the same property. The clause "settlement as usual" evidently relates to one of two well-understood premises, either—First, to the former method of computation and time and manner of payments existing between the parties; or, second, a well-known and established custom of the district; either one of which was sufficiently definite to constitute a part of the contract. It is immaterial to which it referred. It is evident from the action of the board of officers that it was properly understood at the time of the acceptance. No objection was made to it on account of uncertainty or indefiniteness. Nothing more definite was required or asked. The acceptance was complete and unqualified. Had the indefiniteness now relied upon in argument suggested itself to the officers at that time, it would necessarily have resulted in the rejection of the bid, or in requiring a better defined offer. In Van Ness v. Pacard, 2 Pet. 148, it is said: "Every demise between landlord and tenant in respect to matters in which the parties are silent may be fairly open to explanation by the general usage and custom of the country or of the district where the land lies. Every person, under such circumstances, is supposed to be conversant of the custom, and to contract with a tacit reference to it." This is the universal doctrine, and further authority is considered unnecessary. From this it will be apparent that all the essentials necessary to constitute a concluded agreement of lease were contained in the advertisement, bid, and acceptance, and that the element of indefiniteness was such that it was capable of being made definite by reference to former course of dealing, or the customs of the district. In Bish. Cont. § 322, it is said: "If one makes to another an offer, verbal or written direct, by letter or by telegram, of a sort implying nothing to be done except to assent or decline, and the latter accepts it, adding no qualification, there is thus constituted a mutual consent of the same thing at the same time,—in other words, a contract." In support of this elementary proposition, see Smith v. Colby, 138 Mass. 562; Cheney v. Transportation Line, 59 Md. 557; Highland Co. v. Rhoades, 26 Ohio St. 411; Wells v. Railroad Co., 30 Wis. 606; Abbott v. Shepard, 48 N. H. 14. It is contended on the part of defendants that there was no concluded agreement, for the reason that, at the same corporate meeting at which the bid of plaintiff was accepted, there was a subsequent motion passed and entered of record, in which the president was "empowered to draw up the lease, in conjunction with Mr. Cochrane or his agent, and present it to the board of directors for their consideration." This contention cannot prevail: First, the language used—"the lease"—presupposes a contract already in existence; second, it in no way attempts to modify, qualify, or restrict the contract as made and accepted; third, the proceeding was ex parte, was not communicated to the plaintiff or brought to his notice, appears to have been simply a designation of a party who should represent the defendants in reducing the contract to writing and attending to its execution as the agent of the corporation. Had it been embraced in the resolution of acceptance, and communicated to the plaintiff, it could in no way have modified the contract, or had the effect claimed by counsel for defendants. The rule is well settled that, where the agreement is made by written communications, it must appear from them, or some of them, and be known to both parties, that the execution of the formal lease was to be a condition precedent to the agreement becoming obligatory. In Bunnewell v. Jenkins, 8 Ch. Div. 74, decided in 1878, in the court of last resort in England, the same question was presented, but under circumstances far more favorable for the contention of the defendant than those in this, in that the letter of acceptance contained the following: "We are instructed to accept your offer of 800 pounds for these premises, and have asked Mr. Jenkins' solicitor to prepare a contract." In discussing the question, Fry, J., said: "Now, if the matter were not covered by decision, it is very probable that I should feel myself drawn to the conclusion that wherever there is a reference to a future contract the letters themselves do not constitute a contract, and for this very obvious reason: that a reference to a contract as a future thing seems to negative the notion of the existence of a contract as a present thing. But it is too late for that argument to be used before me successfully when a long series of cases has established this proposition: that the mere reference to a future contract is not enough to negative the existence of a present one." BAGGALLAY, L. J., said: "But the letter must be expressed in such a way as to show clearly that such a condition is intended." THESIGER, L. J., said: "The mere reference to the preparation of an agreement by which the terms agreed upon would be put into a more formal shape, does not prevent the existence of a binding contract." JAMES, L. J., said: "Whether there is a binding contract or not depends on the construction of two letters. It is settled law that a contract may be made by letters, and that the mere reference in them to a future formal contract will not prevent their constituting a binding bargain." In that case, COOKSON, Q. C., cited and relied upon the same cases cited and relied upon by the defendants in this case, viz.: Ridgway v. Wharton, 6 H. L. Cas. 238, and Honeyman v. Marryat, Id. 112. But they were distinguished and disregarded by the court, and a decree for specific performance entered.

The question as to whether the contract was sufficiently definite to be enforced in a suit for specific performance is answered in disposing of the first question, viz., whether there was a concluded contract for lease. The general rule, as above shown, is: "An offer or proposal made by one party, and the acceptance thereof by the other, constitutes a contract; in other words, a contract is thereby concluded so that it may be enforced." Pom. Spec. Perf. § 59. And whenever it is shown that there was a definite and concluded legal contract, it may be enforced by suit for specific performance. There appears no conflict of authority on this point. The leading English cases in support of the positions here taken are: Kennedy v. Lee, 8 Mer. 441; Fowle v. Freeman, 9 Ves. 351; Bonnewell v. Jenkins, supra. See, also, the following cases in England: Crossley v. Maycock, L. R. 18 Eq. 180; Thomas v. Dering, 1 Keen, 729; Gibbins v. Board, 11 Beav. 1; Skinner v. McDouall, 2 De Gex & S. 265; Jaques v. Millar, 6 Ch. Div. 153. And in the United States, Pratt v. Railroad Co., 21 N. Y. 305, in which it was said by SELDEN, J.: "If two parties negotiate for a lease of certain premises, and they agree upon the terms and conditions of the lease, and that a written lease shall be drawn and executed embracing those terms, this is not a lease, but it is a contract, which, whenever the statute of frauds does not interfere to prevent, can be enforced, and which the courts will compel the parties specifically to perform."

The books are full of such cases, and it can hardly be necessary to refer to them at length." See, also, Mackey v. Mackey, 29 Grat. 158; Cheney v. Transportation Line, supra; Wharton v. Stoutenburgh, 35 N. J. Eq. 266; Blaney v. Hoke, 14 Ohio St. 292; Clark v. Clark, 49 Cal. 586. Our conclusion is that the acts of the parties in the premises constituted a definite and concluded agreement for a lease, and that there was nothing that could not have been made definite and certain by means of knowledge and data in the possession of the parties, and that it was so considered by the defendants at the time of the corporate acceptance of the offer. It is true, as contended by counsel, that there is a material difference between an unaccepted proposal and a binding agreement, between negotiations preparatory to an agreement and the agreement itself; but counsel seem to confound the concluded agreement or contract of lease with the written document to be drawn subsequently and executed by the parties, which paper in this case could only be evidence of the contract concluded at the time of the corporate acceptance. Counsel have briefed and argued the case of defendants with great care and ability, have collected and cited a large number of authorities, which we have carefully examined, and we fully agree with counsel when they frankly say: "It may be that none of the cases cited above are exactly parallel to the present case, but they are the nearest that we have been able to find." There was no want of diligence. The trouble is, when applied to the premises in this case, the great weight of authority is overwhelmingly against the position sought to be sustained.

The remaining question is whether the plaintiff or defendants was in fault; in other words, has plaintiff shown himself entitled to the relief asked? The question is comparatively free from embarrassment. The offer of defendants to lease by its terms contained the entire mining property; the respective claims were named, and their aggregate are given as 26.8 acres. The offer of plaintiff was for the entire property. No lease of the entire mining property was ever tendered; the "Crowe shaft" with surface ground was excepted and reserved for a part of the term. It is conceded that it had at the time of the contract been leased to other parties. It is claimed by defendants that the fact was known to plaintiff at the time of making the contract. This fact cannot prevail as a defense. The knowledge on the part of plaintiff, if it existed, would not relieve defendants from the necessity of complying with their contract. It is also contended that the suit could not be maintained because of the inability of defendants to perform by reason of having leased the Crowe shaft previous to the contract with plaintiff. It appears that, between the date of the advertisement for bids and the awarding of the lease to plaintiff, defendants had leased part of the property to other parties, and had also leased the boarding-house used with the property. It would be sufficient answer to this contention to say that, having already leased to other parties, the exception and reservation of those portions should have been made at the time of making the contract with the plaintiff. Another sufficient reason why it cannot prevail lies in the fact that plaintiff offered to adjust the matter by receiving the rent which was to be paid to the defendants, which offer was refused. The law is well settled that a lessor who cannot fully comply with his contract will not be allowed to set up his own inability to perform as a defense when the lessee is willing to take what can be demised, and compensation for the balance. See Pom. Spec. Perf. § 388, and cases cited. It is obvious that under the agreement plaintiff was entitled to the entire mining property, including the Crowe shaft, or the income from the portions leased. We leave the question of the boarding-house out of the discussion, for, although claimed by plaintiff as a part of the property to which he was entitled, it was not specifically mentioned in the papers constituting the agreement. The offer of plaintiff, as accepted by defendants, as before shown, contained the following: "And agrees to expend under the best management obtainable at least $5,000 each and every month during life of lease in development work." The lease tendered by defendants and refused by plaintiff contained the following: "To sink a shaft upon the Justice or Monte Cristo claims aforesaid, from the surface, at or near the east end line of said Justice claim, and near the west side line of the Last Dollar lode claim, adjoining said Justice, upon the easterly side line of said Justice. Said Justice and Monte Cristo claims overlap each other at or about the place said shaft is to be sunk, and the location of same is to be mutually agreed upon by the president, vice-president, and secretary of the Justice Mining Co. and the lessee herein." And after elaborate specifications in regard to size and construction of shaft, timbering of the same, etc., proceeds: "Said shaft to be sunk no less than six hundred (600) feet in depth from the surface: provided, however, that mineral in place and in paying quantities be not discovered before said depth shall have been reached, in which event said lessee may drift on the same in any direction within the boundaries of the premises leased: provided, however, that the lessee shall sink said shaft to the depth aforesaid,—that is, six hundred (600) feet,—even if mineral be discovered before said depth is reached." The offer of plaintiff must be construed to mean the expenditure of the money in development in such a manner as to produce ore during the existence of the lease, and thus benefit both parties. He cannot be reasonably understood as offering to expend his money in a way that would only inure to the benefit of the lessor. The provision for the expenditure of a large amount of money in sinking a shaft at a point designated by the lessor, and to a given depth, regardless of its utility in the production of ore, was arbitrary, and certainly not contemplated in the offer. The sinking of the shaft at the point designated to the "contact" or ore body might be proper and mutually beneficial, but the same cannot be said of its extension an indefinite distance in barren rock, which could not add to the ore product during the lease, and could only add to the value of the property of the lessor. The lease tendered also contained the following: "Shall use his best ability and endeavors to obtain the best price for all ores mined under this lease, and to handle and dispose of the same to the best possible advantage of both parties hereto, and the lessor shall have the right to co-operate with the lessee for the purposes aforesaid; and whenever the lessor can procure better terms as to treatment and sale of the ores mined than the lessee, the lessor shall have the right to dispose of the ore so as to realize greater profit to the lessor and lessee." Such a provision was certainly not contemplated,—the reservation of a power certainly unusual, if not unheard of, in that class of leases; a provision incompatible with the relations of the parties to the property, and as destructive of the rights of the lessee as would have been a covenant allowing the lessor to take possession of the property and work it whenever in the judgment of its officers it could do so to better advantage than the lessee. It is claimed, and not without reason, that the provisions allowing no deduction for expense of delivering the ore from the mines to Aspen, the requiring the lessee to pay 65 per cent. of the taxes upon the property, and some other provisions contained, were harsh, arbitrary, and oppressive, not contemplated in the contract, and unusual in mining leases; but a discussion of them seems unnecessary. The lease drawn and tendered by defendants was refused by plaintiff. One was drawn and tendered by plaintiff, in which, as shown by the evidence and a perusal of the lease, many concessions on the part of plaintiff were made with a view to closing the matter, and the lease was rejected by the defendants. In the letter of plaintiff transmitting the draft of the lease, after saying in regard to the lease sent him by the defendants to be executed: "It has many clauses in it that I never agreed to, and which are unreasonable and unfair,"—he proceeds to say: "I have had a lease drawn which covers my offer, which you accepted. I believe it is fair to both sides. If it does not comply with my offer it is a mistake, and I am ready to correct it, to agree in every respect with my offer." This was written on March 29th. No notice of it appears to have been taken on the part of defendants, no attempt to arrive at a proper determination of the matter. On April 12th the following was sent by defendants to plaintiff: "To Frank T. Cochrane: You are hereby notified that, owing to your failure to execute and return to this company the lease heretofore sent you on or about the 21st day of March, and to be executed by you and returned to this company on or before the 1st day of April, 1889, the undersigned, the Justice Mining Company, hereby withdraws and rescinds said lease tendered for your acceptance, and rescinds and holds for naught all negotiations and offers heretofore conducted and made concerning the leasing of the property of said company to you, and holds and declares itself free from any and all obligations to you in the premises. Witness the seal of the company and the signatures of its president and secretary this 9th day of April A. D. 1889. PETER LUX, President. J. W. RICHARDS, Secretary. [Justice Mining Co. Seal. Aspen, Colo.]” Comment upon this document is unnecessary. The failure to execute the lease sent by defendants to plaintiff is made the basis for abrogating and rescinding the contract, and the closing of all negotiations concerning it. It will be apparent that no effort was made on the part of the defendants to comply with their contract; and if it does not show an intention to avoid the agreement, it certainly shows no attempt or desire to comply with it. We think the court erred in dismissing the suit, and that a decree for specific performance should have been allowed, and advise that the judgment be reversed.

BISSELL, C.: I dissent.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons stated in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed.

HAYT, J., (dissenting.) A decree for the specific performance of a contract is sought in this action. The contract is alleged to have been entered into between appellant and appellees upon March 18, 1889. The controversy turns almost entirely upon a bid made by plaintiff in error, Cochrane, for a lease upon a certain mining property, and the action of the board of directors of the Justice Mining Company taken thereon. The bid is as follows: “(3) I will take lease on the whole property at 35 per cent. royalty at eighteen (18) months, and agree to expend, under the best management obtainable, at least $5,000 each and every month during life of lease in development work, I to have thirty (30) days to begin work, in order to make an examination of property, and put machinery in place. Lease to date from time of commencing work. Settlements as usual. [Signed] FRANK T. COCHRANE & Co.” The action of the board of directors relied upon to bind the company was taken upon March 18, 1889, and is evidenced by the following entry upon records of the company: “Moved and carried that Frank T. Cochrane and Company’s proposition for lease on three sections of the Justice property, according to the terms of paragraph 3, be accepted. Moved and carried that all other bids be rejected. Moved and carried that the president be empowered to draw up the lease, in conjunction with Mr. Cochrane or his agent, and present it to the board of directors for their consideration.” Shortly thereafter a lease was prepared, satisfactory to the company, and forwarded to plaintiff in error for his acceptance. This lease Mr. Cochrane would not accept. He in turn prepared a lease, which the company refused to sign, and, the parties not being able to agree upon the terms of the lease, Mr. Cochrane brought this suit to enforce the specific performance of the alleged contract, and compel the company to execute a lease to him in accordance therewith. About the time of the meeting of the board of directors at which the foregoing resolutions were adopted, and before plaintiff in error was notified of the action taken by the company, he caused to be sent to the president of the Justice Mining Company, then at Aspen, the following telegram: “Peter Lux: Hold my bids for leases until arrival of John Beach, Tuesday. F. T. COCHRANE.” This telegram, which was delivered before appellant received notice of the action of the board of directors, was immediately supplemented by the following letter: “Denver, March 18, 1889. Peter Lux, Esq., Aspen—Dear Sir: Please allow Mr. John Beach to correct my bids for leases, and add to them as he sees fit, as I have now some information that I did not have when I made them. He will return to you at once. Yours, truly, F. T. COCHRANE.” The language of the concluding clause of the resolutions of the board of directors relied upon as binding the company shows quite plainly that further action was contemplated by the board before any contract was to be entered into. The president of the company was not authorized to execute the lease with Mr. Cochrane. He was only authorized to draw up the lease in conjunction with Mr. Cochrane or his agent, and submit the same “to the board of directors for their consideration.” It is unreasonable to suppose that it was to be submitted to the consideration of the board of directors with no power reserved in that body to change its terms. It is more reasonable and natural to conclude from the language employed that further action was to be taken by the company before it should be definitely and irrevocably bound. In view of this resolution, and the telegram and letter from Cochrane, it may well be doubted if the court below was not right in holding that there was no contract concluded between the parties. But, should we concede the contrary, this would not, in my opinion, change the result; the bid and its acceptance not being sufficiently definite and certain to admit of a decree for specific performance. Take, for instance, the item of 35 per cent. royalty. Is this percentage to be based upon the gross output of the mines, after deducting transportation and smelting charges, or transportation charges only, or was the lessee to pay both? These are matters of considerable magnitude, and they are left in uncertainty, with no data by which they may be determined. So also in the matter relied upon as constituting an agreement there is nothing fixed as to the place where the development work is to be expended, and nothing whatever as to the nature or character of such work. In reference to the item of royalty the learned judge who tried the case below well said: “This is always a matter of convention between the parties. Settlement on smelter returns in the mining camp where the property is situated, so far as our observation has gone, is always the subject of convention between the parties. In some instances the lessee pays the cost of transportation from the mine to the railroad and from the railroad to the smelter. Sometimes he is only required to pay transportation from the mine to the railroad." In this connection it should be added that the words "settlements as usual" evidently refer to the time only at which settlements were to be made. Upon the items mentioned, and many others, there is a wide, and apparently an honest, disagreement between appellant and appellees. There are some 18 points of difference between the two leases,—the one submitted by the company, and the one prepared by Mr. Cochrane. It should not be a matter of surprise, under the circumstances, that the court below, after patiently listening to the evidence, reached the conclusion that a decree for specific performance was not warranted. The evidence offered is not sufficient, in my judgment, to establish the terms of a contract with anything like the definiteness and certainty required to warrant a decree for specific performance, and the judgment of the trial court should therefore be affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. May 26, 1891.)

BOARDS OF EDUCATION — INSPECTING TEACHERS — INJUNCTION.

1. The board of education of the city and county of San Francisco, under the authority given it by Act Cal. April 1, 1872, to employ teachers, and fix, allow, and order paid their salaries, cannot appoint and employ "inspecting teachers" to perform duties imposed by the act on the board itself, and on the superintendent, consisting of visiting the schools, ascertaining their condition by oral examinations, observing the methods of the teachers, and giving them advice and instructions in the methods of teaching.

2. A tax-payer may maintain an action to enjoin the board from drawing drafts on the school fund in favor of such inspecting teachers, without showing that he will sustain any special injury different from that of the public at large.

In bank. Appeal from superior court of city and county of San Francisco; N. HAMILTON, Judge.

Otto Tum Suden and Horace W. Philbrook, for appellant. Jos. Rothschild, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff, a resident and tax-payer of the city and county of San Francisco, brought this action for the purpose of restraining the board of education of said city and county from drawing any draft upon the school fund in favor of the defendants, Kennedy and Fowler, in compensation for services rendered and to be rendered under an appointment from said board, upon the ground that such appointment was unauthorized by law. In their answer to the complaint the defendants set forth the order under which they allege that the said Kennedy and Fowler were employed, in which is specified in detail the duties required of them. Upon the trial of the cause the court made the following findings of fact: "(1) That the allegations in plaintiff's complaint are not sufficient in law to entitle plaintiff to any relief or any judgment; (2) that all the affirmative allegations in defendants' answer are true;" and thereupon rendered judgment in favor of the defendants. The board of education of the city and county of San Francisco is a creature of the legislature, and has only such powers as have been conferred upon it. It has no authority to divert the moneys of the school fund to any purposes other than such as have been expressly authorized by law. By Act April 1, 1872, (St. 1872, p. 846,) defining the powers and duties of the board, it is declared: "Section 1. The board of education of the city and county of San Francisco shall have power: * * * Third, to employ and dismiss teachers, janitors, and school census marshals, and to fix, alter, allow, and order paid their salaries or compensation." The board is also authorized "to employ and pay such mechanics and laborers as may be necessary to carry into effect the powers and duties of the board;" and "to employ and pay counsel" for the purpose of prosecuting and defending actions relating to the property of the school department. St. 1864, p. 162. Section 15 of the act of April 27, 1863, (St. 1863, p. 605,) declares that the school fund of the city and county of San Francisco "shall be kept separate and distinct from all other moneys, and shall only be used for school purposes under the provisions of this act;" and section 16 of the same act declares: "The said school fund shall be used and applied by said board of education for the following purposes, to-wit: First, for the payment of the salaries or wages of teachers, janitors, school census marshals, and other persons who may be employed by said board." The "other persons" herein referred to are "mechanics and laborers," and the "counsel" authorized by section 2 of the same act, as amended in 1864. St. 1864, p. 162. Aside from these provisions, we have not been cited to any statute which authorizes the board to employ any person in any capacity other than those above mentioned, or to direct payment out of the school fund for any services other than such as may be rendered under the above-named employments. It is alleged by the defendants in their answer herein that on or about the 20th day of March, 1883, the board of education of the city and county of San Francisco adopted a resolution to appoint and employ, and did appoint and employ, the defendant Laura T. Fowler inspecting teacher; and in said resolution it was provided that the special duty of such inspecting teacher should be to "visit schools, and ascertain by frequent oral examinations the condition of the classes; to observe carefully the methods of teaching and discipline pursued by the teachers; to give advice and assistance to teachers and principals when necessary, and in their presence and before their classes exemplify the best method of teaching; that the inspecting teacher shall be subject to the direction of the superintendent and deputy superintendent of public schools for the accomplishment of a careful, efficient, and thorough inspection of the schools, under such further direction or instructions as may from time to time be given by the committee of classification and credential and qualification of teachers, subject to the approval of the board, at a salary of $175 a month;" and that this was the only order under which the defendant Fowler was employed by said board; that on or about the 5th of January, 1887, it appointed and employed the defendant Kennedy as head inspecting teacher of the public schools of said city and county, at a compensation of $200 per month; and that said defendants Kennedy and Fowler have ever since been engaged in the performance of their duties under said employment. This averment by the defendants of the resolution or order under which the defendants Kennedy and Fowler are employed by the board of education is substantially the same as that alleged in the complaint, and is treated in the briefs upon both sides as expressing the duties required of said defendants under their employment by the board.

It is contended by the respondents that under its power to employ "teachers" for the public schools, the board had authority to employ Kennedy and Fowler as "inspecting teachers" to perform the duties provided by the resolution under which they were appointed; and that these duties are peculiarly such as appertain to the functions of a teacher. On the other hand, it is claimed by the appellant that the duties required of these "inspecting teachers" are precisely such as the statute has imposed upon the superintendent of schools and the board of education itself, and that the board cannot, by merely giving its appointees the title of "inspecting teachers," transfer to them the duties which the statute has imposed upon itself or upon the superintendent. Section 3 of the act of April 1, 1872, (St. 1872, p. 848,) declares that "it shall be the duty of the superintendent of common schools of the city and county of San Francisco—First, to visit and examine every school under the board of education as often as once in every six months; to inquire into all matters relating to the government, course of instruction, books, studies, discipline, and conduct of such schools; * * * and to counsel with and advise the teachers in relation to their duties, the proper studies, discipline, and conduct of the pupils, the course of instruction to be pursued, and the books of elementary instruction to be used; * * * and to make a monthly report to the board of education, stating which schools have been visited by him, and adding such comments in respect to the matters here specified as he may deem advisable;" and by the first section of said act the board of education is authorized "to establish and regulate the grade of schools, and determine the course of studies, and the mode of instruction to be used in said schools." It is apparent, upon a comparison of the provisions of these statutes with the resolution defining the duties of inspecting teachers under which the defendants Kennedy and Fowler were employed, that the special duties which these inspecting teachers are to perform are such, and such only, as the statute has prescribed as a portion of the duties of the superintendent and of the board of education. Aside from the normal schools, which it is the duty of the board to provide "for the instruction of those who desire to become teachers," the only "teachers" which it has the power to employ are those whose duties are to instruct the children (between the ages of six and twenty-one) for whose benefit the public schools are maintained. The duties, however, which under the resolution authorizing their appointment are required of the inspecting teachers, in no respect pertain to instruction, but are simply those which would pertain to a superintendent or inspector of the several schools to which their attention is directed. The action of the board cannot be upheld upon the ground that its appointees are termed "inspecting teachers," if, in fact, their duties are those of "inspectors" rather than of "teachers." The character of the appointees must be determined from the functions which they are to discharge, and not from the name by which they are called. As is conceded by counsel for respondents in his brief, "it is by the resolution appointing them, and defining their duties, their status must be determined." If the duties which they are to perform are those of a superintendent, it is immaterial whether they are styled "superintendent" or "inspector" or "inspecting teacher." It needs no argument to show that the board cannot transfer to its own appointees the duties that the statute has devolved upon another officer, or appropriate any portion of the school fund to a payment for services that the legislature has declared shall be rendered by the board itself without compensation, or be performed by the superintendent as a part of the duties for which he was elected. This statute allows to the superintendent only one deputy, and his compensation cannot be paid out of the school fund. Pol. Code, § 1549. If the board can appoint persons under the name of "inspecting teachers" to perform the duties which appertain to the office of the superintendent, or of his deputy, and cause their compensation to be paid out of the school fund, it would thus indirectly do that which is forbidden by statute.

We fully recognize the force of the argument on behalf of the respondents, that great advantage would accrue to the public schools from the services of competent persons appointed to discharge the duties specified in this resolution of appointment, and we readily concede that the board in making the appointment was prompted solely by its desire to increase the efficiency of the school department. It is also easily perceived that the services of capable persons in the discharge of the duties required under this resolution would be of great aid to the board in remedying any defects that might be found to exist in the conduct of the schools, and in increasing the efficiency of the teachers in giving instruction to their pupils. The board of education is, however, in the exercise of a public trust, limited by the act under which it was created, and with only such powers as the legislature has seen fit to confer. If by experience it has found that these limitations are too great, or that the powers conferred are insufficient to enable it to properly discharge its trust, the board is not at liberty to disregard the limitations, or to exercise powers not conferred upon it. The remedy for these defects must be sought from the legislature. The objection that the plaintiff cannot maintain this action, for the reason that he does not show that he will sustain any special injury different from that of the public at large, is untenable. Winn v. Shaw, (Cal.) 25 Pac. Rep. 968. The judgment of the superior court is reversed, and that court is directed to enter judgment for the plaintiff in accordance with the prayer of his complaint.

EJECTMENT—TENANCY IN COMMON—JUDGMENT.

Where, in ejectment, it appeared that the land had been the community property of the plaintiffs' father and mother; that the father died, and plaintiffs inherited one-half of the land, and their mother the other half; that the mother subsequently married the defendant, and afterwards died, whereupon plaintiffs inherited from her two-thirds of her half, and the defendant the other third,—a judgment that plaintiffs recover an undivided five-sixths of the land, instead of merely that plaintiffs were tenants in common of an undivided five-sixths of the land with the defendant, and should be let into possession thereof as such, is error, as being against evidence.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; W. C. VAN FLEET, Judge.

MCFARLAND, J. This is an action of ejectment, the complaint being in the usual form. Defendant, in his answer, denies that plaintiffs were either the owners or entitled to the possession of the demanded premises. The court found that the plaintiffs were the owners and entitled to the possession of the undivided five-sixths of the tract of land described in the complaint, as tenants in common with defendant, who is found to be the owner and entitled to the possession of one undivided sixth; and judgment was rendered that plaintiffs recover such undivided five-sixths. Defendant moved for a new trial, the motion was denied, and from the order denying the motion defendant appeals. There is a short statement on the motion for a new trial which summarily states that there was evidence which "proved" certain facts. (There is some contention by respondents that this statement is not sufficiently authenticated; but, as the record shows that the statement was settled and allowed by the presiding judge, we must take it to be genuine, and sufficiently certified.) Among other facts shown by this statement to have been "proved" are these: The land in contest was owned by Charles H. Burgel, the father of plaintiffs, and was the community property of said Charles and his wife, Mary, who was the mother of plaintiffs. Charles, the father, died in 1884, and the land went, by operation of law, one-half to the widow, and the other half to the plaintiffs. In February, 1886, the defendant, Prisser, married the mother, Mary, and was her husband until February, 1887, when she died. The defendant was appointed her administrator in March, 1887, and was such administrator at the time of the commencement of this action, and at the time of the judgment; the administration not yet having been closed. The proof of these facts was admissible under the denials in the answer. Under these facts, plaintiffs are the owners and entitled to the possession of the undivided one-half of the land which descended to them from their father. They are also heirs to the undivided two-thirds of their mother's half, to which they will be entitled on final distribution. If no part thereof be necessary to pay debts, etc.; but, pending administration, the defendant, as administrator of their mother, is entitled to possession of the undivided half which came from the mother. If the judgment had merely determined that plaintiffs were tenants in common, and should be let into possession with defendant, there could have been no objection to it. It has been decided, however, that in an action like the one at bar, on account of meane profits and other matters that may arise, "it is proper for the court before which the ejectment suit is tried to ascertain and settle the respective interests of the parties." Freem. Co.-Ten.; Mahoney v. Middleton, 41 Cal. 54. The finding, therefore, that plaintiffs "are entitled to the possession of an undivided five-sixths interest in the tract of land described in their complaint," is against the evidence; and for this reason the order denying a new trial must be reversed. The order appealed from is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

APPEAL—DEFECTIVE RECORD—DISMISSAL.

Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 950, provides that on appeal from a final judgment the court must be furnished with a copy of the judgment roll; and Id. § 954, provides that, "if the appellant fails to furnish the requisite papers, the appeal may be dismissed." Held that, where the whole judgment roll is not "requisite" to the full determination of the appeal, it will not be dismissed because of the omission of an unessential part.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN F. FINN, Judge.

Pillsbury & Blanding, for appellants.
Rosenbaum & Scheellne, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This cause is before us on a motion of respondents to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that the transcript filed by appellants does not contain a copy of the judgment roll. Section 950 of the Code of Civil Procedure directs that on an appeal from a final judgment the court must be furnished with a copy of the judgment roll; and section 954 provides that, "if the appellant fails to furnish the requisite papers, the appeal may be dismissed." This power to dismiss might, perhaps, be properly exercised in extreme cases; but it frequently happens that the whole of a judgment roll is not "requisite" to the full determination of an appeal. And it would be unjust to dismiss an appeal merely because some part of the roll had been—inadvertently, perhaps—omitted from the transcript. If the omission be deemed material by respondents, they can easily remedy the supposed defect by suggestion of a diminution of the record. In the case at bar the asserted defects in the copy of the judgment roll—which do not very clearly appear from the certificate of the clerk—are not important enough to authorize a dismissal of the appeal. The motion to dismiss the appeal is denied.

(Supreme Court of California. May 13, 1891.)

LEASE—DELIVERY—WATER-RIGHTS—ESTOPPEL.

1. The fact that a lease has always been in the possession of the lessor is not conclusive evidence that there has been no delivery, since the lessor has as much interest in it as the lessee, and as much occasion for its possession, and the fact that the tenant has entered under it is sufficient to sustain a presumption that it has been duly delivered.

2. Where of two parties in possession of certain water-rights it appeared that one had been the original appropriator, and that, after his ditch and flume had fallen into decay, he arranged with the grantor of the other that they should together repair and renew the ditch and flume, appropriating a quantity of new water from a different spring, and share the total flow equally, the subsequent acceptance by the grantee of the other party of a lease from the original appropriator will be held, in the absence of any other showing, to be a compromise of the respective rights, and the lessee, after enjoying the fruits of the compromise during the term of the lease, cannot afterwards repudiate it, and claim to have held the water adversely to the lessor.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tuolumne county; J. F. ROONEY, Judge.

F. W. Street and A. L. Hart, for appellant. F. D. & G. W. Nicol, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This is the second appeal in this case. The former appeal, like this, was taken by the plaintiff from a judgment in favor of defendant, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The judgment was reversed on the ground that the court failed to find that the use of the water by the defendant and his grantors had been adverse. 78 Cal. 374, 20 Pac. Rep. 743. After the case had been remitted to the trial court the defendant was allowed to amend his answer so as to aver that for more than five years last past he has been using the water adversely to plaintiff and his grantors. There is no other claim in the answer of title on the ground that the use was adverse, unless such defense is involved in the simple allegation of ownership. In fact, the theory of the defense seems to be that Bache, plaintiff's grantor, was the owner of a spring from which he had conducted water to his premises in the city of Sonora; that by agreement with the Antoninis, through whom defendant derives his title, Bache and the Antoninis some years afterwards constructed a new ditch and flume, and took in other waters; that it was understood that the Antoninis and Bache should then share the water equally. The new water taken in was defendant claims, just about equal to that which had previously been carried by the Bache ditch from the spring which belonged to him. So that by the arrangement with the Antoninis, Bache was able to secure a new ditch and flume in place of one which had become dilapidated and unserviceable, and still practically retain all the water he had before. And the court finds that it was agreed, when they arranged to rebuild, that the water of said spring (the new water to be taken in) to be thereafter appropriated, together with the Bache spring, should belong to them in common, and to share equally in the use of the water each alternate day for irrigating their respective gardens, and for culinary, domestic, and other useful purposes. It is also found as a fact that they did open up another spring, constructed the ditch and flume as agreed, and caused the waters of both springs to flow into it; and it is found that from that time—1867—Bache and the Antoninis and their respective grantors have used the water on alternate days for irrigating their respective gardens, and for culinary and other useful purposes, continuously, peaceably, and uninterruptedly; that the new spring had not previously been owned, claimed, or appropriated by any person. This state of things continued until May 1, 1877,—some 10 years,—when Lorenzo Antonini, who had become sole owner, sold to David Sanguinetti. At that time Bache and Sanguinetti made and executed an agreement in writing, whereby Bache, in consideration of one dollar, did rent, lease, and demise to Sanguinetti, for the term of 10 years, one-half of the water flowing in his ditch every alternated day. Sanguinetti agreed to keep the ditch in repair on his premises, and to pay one-half the expense of repairing the ditch and flume above his premises, and of a new flume if it should be necessary; and, should the flume and ditch be flooded, both agreed to repair the same at their joint expense. The parties continued to use the water after the lease as before, taking the whole of it each alternate day, and accordingly on the former appeal it was held this lease was for one-half of the water, to be measured by using every other day. In short, the lease covered the very water-right in controversy.

Sanguinetti was a witness at the trial, and testified that he could not read or write, that he never had or heard of a lease, and that he always claimed the use of the water in his own right, and had so informed Mr. Bache. The court finds, however, the due execution of the lease, but also that it was retained by Bache, and never had been in the possession of Sanguinetti. The finding that the agreement was executed must be held to include delivery, for otherwise there is no finding upon this important point, and the word has been held to include all that is necessary to make an instrument complete and operative. There is evidence which tends to show that the parties believed they had executed the instrument, and that Sanguinetti so understood it. In regard to a lease, the mere fact that the instrument has always been in the possession of the lessor is not conclusive evidence that it has not been delivered so as to become operative. An ordinary deed is usually of value only to the grantee. The maker has no further interest in it. But an indenture of lease is a very different thing. It continues to be of fully as much interest to the landlord as to the tenant, and he has fully as much occasion for its possession. Such agreements are usually executed in duplicate. But where it is retained by either party with consent of the other it must be considered as delivered. If both understand that it has been executed, and is in operation. Where the tenant enters under it, there can usually be very little question about it. The due execution of the lease being found, the question arises as to its effect. It will be seen from the above statements that, according to the findings of the court, at the time of the execution of the lease the parties were equally entitled to the use of the water, although some question might be made as to whether their interest was joint. So long as the water of the two springs was carried in the common flume they were equally entitled to use the water; and so the parties had been continuously using it for more than 10 years, and were so using it at the time the lease was made. Sanguinetti, then, was in possession at the time of the demise. The evidence upon which the court bases its finding is conflicting, confused, and contradictory. A. Antonini, upon whose testimony both parties chiefly rely, seems uncertain as to the ownership of the property. The facts apparently shown by the evidence do not seem very conclusive upon that point, although, after a careful study of the transcript, we are satisfied there is evidence sufficient to justify every material finding. Still, as there was much room for grave doubts upon the subject of ownership, it is altogether probable that the lease was executed after a claim made by Bache and a consideration of the matter by Sanguinetti. In fact, it was most likely a compromise of threatened litigation. Bache conceded the free use of the water for 10 years in consideration of the acknowledgment of his title by Sanguinetti. If it were a new question, we should say he could not now, having enjoyed the fruits of this compromise, go back upon it. But the rule is too thoroughly established to be open to question in this state. Tewksbury v. Macgraff, 33 Cal. 237; Franklin v. Merida, 85 Cal. 558; Holloway v. Galliac, 47 Cal. 474; Peralta v. Ginochio, Id. 460; Insurance Co. v. Stroup, 63 Cal. 150; Davis v. McGrew, 82 Cal. 138, 23 Pac. Rep. 41. The lease had expired by its terms before this litigation was commenced, and, under the rule established by the above decisions, it constituted no estoppel as against the defendant. Under the circumstances it becomes unnecessary to pass upon the questions raised in regard to the verbal sale, and the claim that the defendant held the property adversely for five years since such alleged sale. It follows that the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

VENDOR'S LIEN—ASSIGNMENT—ATTACHMENT.

Where the owner of land contracts to convey it upon the payment of a certain price, for which he accepts notes, but the title is not to pass until the notes are paid, the land is, by express contract, held in pledge for such payment, and the notes and contract are in the nature of a mortgage, and the lien will pass to the assignee of such a note, who, under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 538, requiring a plaintiff in attachment to state that his claim is without security, cannot maintain action by attachment therefor. McFarland, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; A. W. HUTTON, Judge.

Winslow P. Hyatt, for appellant. Del Valle & Munday, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is an appeal from an order denying a motion to dissolve an attachment. The motion was made on the ground that the note upon which the action was brought was given to Webster, plaintiff's assignor, in part payment for certain land purchased from him by defendant; that Webster had a vendor's lien as security for the payment of the note; that the lien passed to plaintiff by the assignment of the note, and, being thus secured, an attachment was improper. The affidavit filed in support of the motion states that the defendant purchased certain land from Webster under a contract which provided for payment of the purchase price by installments, and that at the time and place of making said contract for the sale and purchase of said lot of land, and as part of the said contract, the defendant executed and delivered to Webster the promissory note sued on, and that Webster still holds, against the defendant, the contract giving him the right to purchase. There is, perhaps, no subject of equity jurisprudence discussed in the books upon which there is a greater diversity of opinion than exists in relation to the origin, nature, and effect of a vendor's lien, against whom and in whose favor it avails, and how it may be discharged or waived. Hammond v. Peyton, 34 Minn. 531, 27 N. W. Rep. 72. The various definitions given and principles applied to it by the courts, are hopelessly irreconcilable; and, if we take the expressions found in decisions and text-books, without observing the distinction between the lien implied by law in favor of a vendor who has parted with the legal title and taken no security for the purchase money, and the security which the vendor has while he holds the legal title under an unexecuted contract for the conveyance of lands upon payment of the purchase money, there will appear to be great confusion and inconsistency. The former, the implied lien, is properly known as a "vendor's lien." It is the creature of courts of equity, founded upon the equitable presumption that where the vendor has parted with his title and taken no security for the payment of the purchase money, the parties intended that the property itself should remain as a pledge for the payment of the purchase price of the land. The lien thus created by implication is not a specific, absolute charge upon the property; it is personal to the vendor, and does not pass by a transfer of his claim for the purchase money. The fee is in the purchaser, and he may defeat the lien by a conveyance to a bona fide purchaser for value. Sparks v. Hess, 15 Cal. 186; Baum v. Grigsby, 21 Cal. 172; Lehndorf v. Cope, 122 Ill. 338, 13 N. E. Rep. 505. The latter is improperly designated as a vendor's lien. Where the vendor holds the legal title under an unexecuted contract for the conveyance of the land upon payment of the purchase money, the transaction shows upon its face that he holds it as security. The vendee cannot prejudice that title, or in any way divest it, except by performance of the act for which the vendor holds it. The vendor's security is something stronger than a mortgage, because the legal title is retained as security. Stevens v. Chadwick, 10 Kan. 413. It has been called an "imperfect" or "equitable" mortgage, which is a more appropriate term than "vendor's lien." Moore v. Lackey, 53 Miss. 85. In many of the best-considered cases, including Sparks v. Hess, supra, it is treated as if it had the similitude of a mortgage, subject to foreclosure in the same way a mortgage is foreclosed. There is no necessity for any lien by implication. Where the title is not to pass until the vendee pays the purchase price, the land is by express contract held in pledge for such payment, and the notes and contract may be considered as an instrument in the nature of a mortgage. It is a lien by contract, is an incident to the debt, and the assignee of notes given for the purchase money, like the assignee of a note secured by mortgage, is entitled to the benefit of the security. Avery v. Clark, (Cal.) 25 Pac. Rep. 919, (filed February 6, 1891; Wright v. Troutman, 81 Ill. 374; Adams v. Cowherd, 30 Mo. 460; Lowery v. Peterson, 75 Ala. 109; Bradley v. Curtis, 79 Ky. 327; McClintic v. Wise, 25 Grat. 448; Lagow v. Badollet, 1 Blackf. 419; Dingley v. Bank, 57 Cal. 471. There are a few decisions to the contrary, some of which inveigh against the rule, and, emanating, as they do, from highly respectable authority, are entitled to careful consideration; but they bear evidence of a departure from sound legal rules, and will be found generally to have been influenced by decisions in cases where the legal title had passed to the vendee, thus overlooking the distinction we have attempted to point out, and which is paramount always in determining questions of this kind. The authorities preponderate very decidedly in favor of the view we have expressed. 2 Jones, Liens, § 1119, note.

The provisions of our Civil Code, §§ 3046, 3047, apply to the vendor's lien proper, and not to the security held by a vendor under an unexecuted contract for the sale of land. There has been, and still exists, a great conflict of decision among the American courts, not only as to the nature of the security of the implied lien, but as to whether it could be assigned, and what act of the vendor would amount to a waiver of the lien. Perry, Trusts, (4th Ed.) § 328, note 4. The notes of the code commissioners, and cases cited by them under the sections above referred to, show that it was intended to settle this conflict by express enactment. Ann. Civil Code, §§ 3045, 3046, notes; Avery v. Clark, supra.

We are not called upon in this case to say whether the purchaser of a negotiable note for value, without notice of the security held by a vendor of real estate under an unexecuted contract, would have the right to a writ of attachment. The affidavit, on motion to discharge the writ herein, stated that plaintiff "purchased the note sued upon in this action with full knowledge that the same was given as collateral to and identical with the debt secured by said contract and the lien on said real estate." The note having been secured originally by the vendor's lien, and plaintiff having taken it with notice of that fact, it was his duty to state in his affidavit for the writ "that such security has without any act of the plaintiff, or the person to whom the security was given, become valueless." Such is the requirement of the statute. Section 538, Code Civil Proc. The affidavit upon which the attachment was issued states that the payment of the sum claimed "has not been secured by any mortgage or lien upon real or personal property." The affidavit filed by defendant in support of his motion to discharge the writ states facts showing that the note was originally secured. No counter-affidavit was filed by plaintiff. The attachment was improperly issued, and therefore the motion should have been granted. The order is reversed, with directions to discharge the attachment.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; DE HAVEN, J.; GAROUTTE, J.; HARRISON, J.

McFARLAND, J. I dissent, and adhere to the views expressed in the former opinion. 24 Pac. Rep. 608. I cannot subscribe to the doctrine that the owner in fee of land, who simply agrees to convey it upon the payment to him of certain money evidenced by a promissory note, is in the same position as one who conveys the land and takes back a mortgage; or that if, in the former case, he merely assigns the promissory note, the assignee of the note has a lien on the land. If the latter can enforce such a lien, he must be able to release it. But how could he release it? It could be released only by conveying the land to the vendee, but how could he convey that which he hath not? If, after the assignment of the note, the vendor should convey the land to the vendee, what then would be the condition of the supposed lien of the assignee of the note? The whole doctrine must rest on the untenable proposition that the assignment of a negotiable promissory note is a conveyance in fee of land.

I know that some of the recent text-writers speak of such a case as bearing "a strong similitude to that of mortgagee and mortgagor," and say that, although it "is often spoken of in the cases as a vendor's lien," yet, in their opinion, such language is "a misuse of terms;" and that, although "it has been said, in English and American decisions, that the vendor's lien may arise before conveyance as well as after," yet that this saying "confounds legal notions which are essentially different." But, in my opinion, those "English and American decisions" correctly state the law, and tend to prevent confusion. In this state Sparks v. Hess, 15 Cal. 194, is the leading case on the subject. In that case the court say: "This is not a suit to enforce a vendor's lien after conveyance executed, but to enforce such lien when the contract of sale remains unexecuted;" and that, while the position of the vendor is "in some respects" like that of a mortgagee, it is in other respects different. "The vendor is at liberty to ask either a decree directing performance, and in case of refusal a sale of the premises, or a decree barring the right of the vendee to claim a conveyance under the contract." Throughout the whole case the right of the plaintiff is treated as and called a "vendor's lien;" and there is no doctrine better established than that a vendor's lien is not assignable. In the case at bar there was no conveyance of the legal title from the owner of the land (Webster) to the assignee of the note; and, in my opinion, the mere assignment of the note carried no title to the land, and no vendor's lien, or any lien at all. But, in my opinion, a vendor's right is too shadowy to be a lien, within the meaning of the attachment law.

NATURALIZATION—EVIDENCE.

Garber, Boulton & Bishop, for appellant, Belcher. W. B. Wallace, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This is a contest over the right to purchase swamp and overflowed lands from the state. There are three applicants. Farren's application was filed before the segregation, and under the recent decision of Buchanan v. Nagle, (Cal.) ante, 512, the judgment denying his right to purchase must be affirmed. Belcher's application was made after the survey and segregation, but he is not an actual settler, and the court finds that the land is suitable for cultivation, and on the authority of Fulton v. Brannan, ante, 506, (Cal. No. 13,603,) the judgment must be affirmed as to him, unless it appears that there was error at the trial such as will necessitate a reversal. We find no such error. The facts, we think, show, independently of the opinion evidence complained of, that the land is suitable for cultivation. The land is level, free from serious obstruction to plowing; the soil a rich, sandy loam. It is near Lake Tulare, but has been dry for some years; and there is evidence that the lake is steadily receding year by year. If in such a soil crops sometimes or often fail through drought, it cannot be said, in this state, that the land is therefore unsuitable for cultivation. The defendant Ford is found to be an actual settler on the east half of the section. Her residence seems from the evidence to be somewhat ideal. The purchaser is required to be an actual settler. He must show something more than that he has eaten and slept on the place, besides having a cabin there, and that he has made some fanciful attempts at planting trees and cultivation. The section means real settlers on the land, and not occasional visitors. It does not contemplate casual acts, done not in good faith to make a home, but simply to secure cheap land; although, if a home is actually established, motives cannot be further questioned. At the trial it appeared that defendant Ford was a widow, born in Ireland. Her parents never came to this country, and she was never naturalized. After she came to the United States she married, as she says, a naturalized citizen. If she did so, under the law of congress she became a citizen. She had no record evidence, however, to prove the naturalization of her husband. Objection was made to the parol proof, and counsel asked to have her application stricken out. We are constrained to hold under the decisions that the evidence was incompetent. Miller v. Prentice, 82 Cal. 104, 23 Pac. Rep. 8; Bode v. Trimmer, 82 Cal. 513, 23 Pac. Rep. 187; Prentice v. Miller, 82 Cal. 575, 23 Pac. Rep. 189. In the last case it is said: "And, like any other judicial record, must be proved by the record itself, or a properly exemplified copy thereof, or by proof of its loss or destruction. Charles Green's Sons v. Salas, 31 Fed. Rep. 107. There are, however, certain limitations to this rule, for after proper proof of the naturalization of the parents of alien children, who were under 21 years of age and residents of the United States at the time their parents were naturalized, parol evidence may be received to prove the minority and residence of the children in order to show that they are citizens, (Rev. St. U. S. § 2172;) and proof of naturalization may also be by the parol evidence of the party, in the form of an affidavit, in proceedings concerning mining claims, by virtue of section 2321 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; but the appellant does not come within either of these limitations." This quotation is made because it intimates that in case of the children they must also prove the naturalization of their parents by the record,—a case parallel to the present. The other facts which it is said they may prove by parol constitute no exception to the rule, which is simply that an ordinary naturalization is effected by a judgment, and it must be proven as other judgments are. So the cases cited by the respondent, if they are properly called "naturalizations," are not by judgment, and the practice in such cases throws no light upon the point involved here. We think the judgment, so far as it adjudges that plaintiff and defendant Farren are not entitled to purchase the land in question, should be affirmed, as also the motion denying defendant Farren new trial; and that as to defendant Ford the judgment should be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment as to plaintiff and defendant Farren, and the order denying defendant Farren's motion for a new trial, are affirmed, and the judgment as to defendant Ford is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

TRIAL—FINDING BY THE COURT.

In an action by the vendee of land against the vendor for damages caused by misrepresentations in selling it the court found that the value of the land without any prospect of a college or street-car line being built as represented was at the time of the sale $3,000; that, if the contract for building the street-car line had been let as represented, the market value of the land would have been $6,000; that with a good prospect that both the college and street-car line would be built the land would have been worth $8,000, which was the sum the vendee paid for it; that as it was with the prospect of the building of the college then existing the value was $5,000. Held, that a judgment for $3,000, based on the third and fourth branches of the finding, was not inconsistent with the finding as a whole, and would be sustained.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2.

Wells, Guthrie & Lee and J. A. Donnell, for appellants. C. W. Pendleton and Anderson, Fitzgerald & Anderson, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. On July 8, 1887, the plaintiff and defendants entered into an agreement in writing, whereby the plaintiff agreed to sell to defendants a certain tract of land, situate in the town-site or projected town of Whittier, in the county of Los Angeles, for the sum of $8,000, $3,000 of which had been paid before the commencement of this action. For the residue ($5,000) the defendants made their promissory note of even date with the contract, payable on or before June 7, 1888, with interest at 10 per cent. per annum, to be compounded semi-annually. This action was brought to recover the amount due on the note, and to foreclose the vendor's lien upon the land. The defense is that the defendants were induced to purchase the land by false and fraudulent representations of the plaintiff to the damage of the defendants. The court found that plaintiff made the representations charged, and that the greater portion of them were false and fraudulent, to the damage of defendants in the sum of $3,000, and deducted this sum from the note, and rendered judgment for the plaintiff for the residue and interest, amounting to $2,595. The defendants appeal from the judgment on the judgment roll, and contend that the finding of only $3,000 damages is inconsistent with the twelfth finding, by which, they say, it appears that the damages were $5,000. This is the only point made, and to dispose of it in favor of the respondent I think it is only necessary to read the twelfth finding in connection with the eighth and thirteenth findings. The twelfth finding is as follows: "That the value of said land, without any prospect of a college or street-car line being built as represented by the plaintiff, and without any contract being let for the same or either of them, was at the time of the purchase the sum of $3,000; that, if the contract for the building of said street-car line along Hadley street to the south-west corner of said land to Painter avenue had been let, as represented by plaintiff, said land would have been at the time of the purchase of the market value of $6,000; that, if said plaintiff had in good faith intended to build said college, and the Quakers had agreed or determined to build said college, and the contract for building said street-car line had been let at the time of making said contract, as represented by plaintiff, said land would then have been of the market value of $8,000; and that said land as it was, and with the prospect of the building of said college then existing, was of the market value of $5,000." The court here finds what would have been the value of the land at the time of purchase under four different conditions of facts: (1) In case all the representations of the plaintiff had been entirely false; (2) in case the representation as to the contract for building the street-car line alone had been true; (3) in case all the representations made by plaintiff had been true; and (4) the value of the land "as it was, with the prospect of the building of the college then existing," as appears in the eighth finding, wherein it is found: "There were general rumors afloat, and a prospect that said college would be built as stated by plaintiff." The value of the property in the first two supposed cases is immaterial, even according to the rule of damages claimed by counsel for appellant, viz.: "The measure of damage is the difference between the actual value of the property at the time of purchase and its value if the property had been what it was represented or warranted to be." In order to estimate the damages by this rule only the third and fourth branches of the twelfth finding are necessary. The third finds that if the property had been what it was represented to be, its value would have been $3,000. The fourth finds that the actual value of the property as it was at the time of purchase (one part of plaintiff's representations then being true) was $5,000. Thereupon the court estimated defendants' damages to be $3,000, the difference between these two valuations. Counsel for appellants are mistaken in assuming that the court found the representations of plaintiff to have been entirely false. The court found that a part of plaintiff's representations as to the college was true, and considered this in estimating the actual value of the property at the time of the purchase, but excluded it from the estimate. (1.) whereby the value was found to be $3,000. I think the judgment accords with the findings of fact, and that it should be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; HAYNE, C.

ROSENBERG v. DURFREE et al. (No. 13,842.)

NEGLIGENCE—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE.

1. In an action for personal injuries it appeared that plaintiff, a child of eight years, was invited by one of the defendants, in the presence of the other, to ride on a narrow pole drawn by a horse to propel machinery, which in its circuit passed near to portions of the machinery then in motion; that she lost her hat, and told defendant in charge of the sweep to stop the horse and let her get it; that he told her to pick it up next round; that she tried to do so, lost her balance, and threw out her arm to regain it, when her hand was caught in the cog-wheel, and crushed. Held, that a verdict for plaintiff was supported by the evidence.

2. An instruction that a child of such tender years and immature judgment as to be incapable of comprehending the danger to which it is exposed, and of exercising the necessary precaution in guarding against it, cannot be charged with negligence in exposing itself to threatened danger, and that in determining this proposition the jury must consider the age, sex, and all the conditions surrounding plaintiff at the time of the injury, is not erroneous as misleading, or as instructing the jury that the machinery was dangerous.

3. It was not error to charge that if the jury should find that the sweep was a dangerous place for plaintiff to ride, and that defendants, having reason to know that it was dangerous, permitted her to ride upon it in dangerous proximity to the machinery, and that because of her tender years and immature judgment she was incapable of comprehending and guarding against the danger, and under such circumstances was injured, it would be evidence of negligence.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge.

Chapman & Hendrick, for appellants. Galbreth & Morrison, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This action is to recover damages caused to the plaintiff, a child eight years of age, alleged to have resulted from the carelessness of the defendants in negligently inducing and permitting her "to sit upon a sweep or narrow pole drawn by a horse to propel the machinery for pumping water, then being propelled by and under the control and for the use and benefit of defendants." It is alleged further in the complaint that the "sweep in its circuit passed above and near to cog-wheels and other portions of said machinery then in motion, thereby exposing plaintiff to the danger of being crushed and mangled therein if she accidentally fell or in any manner was dislodged from the sweep, and was precipitated upon the machinery; that the defendants well knew of the danger to which the child of tender years was thus exposed, yet they knowingly, carelessly, and negligently suffered her to remain alone on said sweep with no person to guard her, exposed to the danger aforesaid; and that by reason thereof plaintiff fell or was precipitated upon said machinery then in motion, and her left hand was caught, mangled, and lacerated therein, causing the loss of three fingers therefrom, thereby maiming and crippling the plaintiff permanently." The defendants demurred to the complaint. The demurrer was overruled, an answer filed, and upon the trial a jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, and assessed her damages at $1,750 and costs. Judgment was rendered upon the verdict, from which this appeal is taken, and an order denying defendants' motion for a new trial. There is no dispute but that the child was injured, and suffered the loss of her fingers while on the sweep and falling upon the machinery. The defendants' counsel states that the child was seated upon the lever or sweep, and while riding around upon it she lost her balance, and, endeavoring to recover herself, threw her left hand into the cog-wheel, "and, unfortunately, just at that moment it was passing under the smaller wheel, when it was caught, and three of her fingers crushed, so that they had to be removed." The defendant Charles Durfree, the son of the other defendant, was in charge of the machinery at the time of the injury. This the father knew, and also that the child was riding around upon the sweep.

A part of the testimony of the child is that: "I was sitting on the sweep. I was going around, and lost my balance, and my hand got in the wheel. I was at the cow corral before I went on the sweep." "Question. How far away was that from the sweep? Answer. About half an acre; not as much as that. Charley [meaning young Durfree] called me, and said, 'Come and take a ride.' First I didn't hear him, and said, 'What?' Then he said it again, 'Come and ride, Hannah;' and I went over to the sweep, and I saw Mr. Durfree, [meaning the father, the other defendant,] and he had a shovel in his hand. He was standing there watching me go over. When I was getting on the sweep he said, 'Hannah, look out; there might be some danger to your hands and your arms;' and I said, 'Oh, no; there won't.' He was in the corn when he said that, and then I went on, and had gone round several times, and I made the horse go when I was on there, and then I lost my balance. First I dropped my hat, and then I said, 'Charley, stop the horse; I want to get my hat.' And he said, 'Pick it up the next time round.' I tried to pick it up, and I lost my balance, and my hand caught in the wheel of the cog. I first got on the sweep near the horse, and Charley said, 'Move up towards the big wheel and machinery.' The way I happened to lose my hat was the wind blew it off. When I came round, and went to pick up my hat, Charley made some motion, and the horse jerked, and that is the way I lost my balance. The horse's name is Doc. My hand got caught in the wheel. I didn't fall off the sweep, and Charley took me off, and carried me to the house. Some of the fingers were cut, and the ends of the fingers dropped. Charley took me to the house. He didn't say anything that I remember. Mamma hollered, and said, 'Charley, you have crippled my little girl for life.'" The child is the daughter of a domestic servant of the defendants.

It is claimed by the defendants that the evidence is utterly insufficient to prove that the machinery is at all dangerous; that there is no proof that the defendants were guilty of any negligence. In this connection it is further said that the evidence of the child is contradictory, since upon a former trial she testified as to a material matter differently from what she did on this trial; and that, therefore, her testimony is to be disregarded, and that of the defendants, in contradiction of it, received, in which event it is contended the verdict is unsupported by evidence. We do not perceive any conflict in the child's evidence, as contended for. Her testimony on the last trial was somewhat fuller than upon the first, but there was no contradiction by one of anything in the other, and nothing to show any unreliability on her part; in fact, she was in many respects sustained by the evidence of the defendants. It does appear from the evidence that the child was a favorite, both with the father and son, defendants, and that the want of care which they exercised in permitting a young child like this little girl to get upon the sweep and ride around upon it, involving a risk of her getting injured, was the result more than anything else of a desire to have the child's society by the son, and of a disposition by both father and son to be indulgent to her; but these motives, commendable as they may be in the abstract, cannot excuse them from exercising such care as the law requires to prevent the little girl from placing herself in danger, and getting maimed for life. We do not, therefore, think the verdict unsupported by evidence.

It is further claimed that the instructions asked for and granted were erroneous. One of them is: "The court instructs you that a child of such tender years and immature judgment as to be incapable of knowing, comprehending, and measuring the danger to which it is exposed, and of exercising the necessary precaution in guarding against it, cannot be charged with negligence in exposing itself to the threatened danger. In determining this proposition in connection with this case, you must consider the age, sex, and all the conditions surrounding the plaintiff at the date of the injury, as disclosed to you by the evidence." We do not understand this instruction to say to the jury, as defendants contend that the court instructed the jury, that the machinery by which the plaintiff received her injury was dangerous; for, whether the danger to the child existed or not, they were told it was "as the evidence disclosed it;" that is, existed or not, as the evidence disclosed. There was nothing misleading in telling the jury that they were to consider all the conditions surrounding the plaintiff, including her age and sex, in determining from the evidence as to the danger she may have been exposed to, and her appreciation of it, as bearing upon the question of contributory negligence.

An objection is also made to an instruction that the jury are instructed that if the plaintiff was in peril under certain circumstances it would be evidence of negligence; thus, as is claimed, telling the jury that the injury while riding on the sweep was of itself evidence of negligence. The instruction is: "If you shall find from the evidence that at the date of the alleged injury the sweep referred to, in its relation to the machinery, was a dangerous place for the plaintiff to ride, and shall find that while the defendants were using said machinery, and the defendants had reason to know the same was dangerous, and they knowingly permitted the plaintiff to sit upon and ride said sweep, in dangerous proximity to said machinery, her parents or other guardians not being present; and you shall further find that, because of the tender years and immature judgment of the plaintiff, she was incapable of comprehending and guarding against the danger to which she was thereby exposed; and you shall further find that, while she was riding under the conditions and circumstances stated, plaintiff's hand was caught and injured in and by said machinery,—that it would be evidence of negligence." As we understand the instruction, it informs the jury that, if a certain state of facts exists, culminating in plaintiff's injury, such state of facts is evidence of negligence. We do not see that the clause objected to, in view of all the other portions of the instruction, and others given, would tend to mislead the jury as complained of.

Objection is also made to this instruction: "And, finding the facts as above stated, you should further find from the evidence that defendants were father and son, and that the son, while working the machinery for the father, invited, requested, induced, or permitted the plaintiff to ride on said sweep, and that the father knew of her so riding, or had reason to know it was dangerous, and could have removed her, or caused her to be removed, therefrom, or could have stopped said machinery, or caused the same to be stopped, and did neither, but, on the contrary, both he and the son suffered her to remain, such facts would show negligence on the part of the defendants." It is said that in this instruction it is not clearly stated how the jury were to determine as to the father's responsibility; that the jury might have been impressed with the idea that the father was responsible for the son as his servant inviting the plaintiff to ride. But we do not so understand the instruction. The first part of it is with reference to the state of facts under which it appeared in evidence that the son invited, permitted, and induced the plaintiff to ride under circumstances of danger to her. The second, that the father, aware of the danger into which she had been placed by the conduct of the son, had yet permitted her to remain there thus exposed, when he could have prevented her. The jury were correctly told that if the state of facts with reference to each, somewhat different, existed, they were both responsible. But we do not understand that they are told that either is responsible for the negligence of the other. We perceive no prejudicial error, and advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BEICHER, C.

McMENOMY v. BAUD. (No. 12,759.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 15, 1890.)

NUISANCE—LAWFUL OCCUPATION—INJUNCTION.

A brass foundry and machinery incident thereto are not, prima facie, nuisances, and in an action by an adjoining proprietor for damages and injunction, where the evidence shows that the smoke-stack and steam escape-pipe are too low; that the boiler and engine are not properly set; that the fuel is not such as should be used; that the dipping of brass castings in diluted acids was practiced upon the sidewalk,—the resulting annoyances are such as can be remedied, and an injunction restraining defendant from operating the factory at all is error, and must be modified. WORKS, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN F. FINN, Judge.

John Darcy, (Otto Tum Suden, of counsel,) for appellant. Clunie & Young, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The plaintiff and defendant are coterminous owners of lots of 27½ feet front on Fulton street, in San Francisco, and running back 120 feet to Ash avenue. Each, with his family, resided on his lot, there being an open space of only five to six inches between their houses. The defendant operated a small brass foundry on the first or ground floor of his house, with machinery incidental thereto, propelled by a small steam-engine having a cylinder of six inches diameter, and seven inches stroke. The principal machinery consisted of turning lathes for turning and polishing brass. The objects of this suit are to enjoin the operating and use of the foundry and machinery, on the ground that they are a nuisance to plaintiff, and to recover $2,000 damages. The allegations of the complaint in regard to the nuisance are as follows: "(3) That defendant has erected and maintained on his said premises, and used and operated for the two years last past, in the same place, and in close proximity to the above-described premises of plaintiff, a steam-engine and boiler and lathe, and the machinery of a brass foundry, and still maintains, uses, and operates the same, and threatens to continue to do the same; that he has operated and used, and operates and uses, and threatens to operate and use, the same in such a manner as to disturb and annoy this plaintiff, and this plaintiff's family, and to endanger the safety and health of this plaintiff, and this plaintiff's family, and to offend the senses of this plaintiff and his family. (4) That the presence and proximity of said machinery, and its operation and use by defendant, has greatly injured and damaged plaintiff, in this: That the defendant has used said machinery and operated the same for the last two years continuously, night and day, and on Sundays and at all times, and still so uses and threatens to and will so use it, unless restrained by this court; that said machinery constantly produces intolerable noise, which deprives plaintiff and his family of all rest and enjoyment, and has produced such effect for two years last past, and has rendered the life of this plaintiff and that of his family miserable; that by the jarring thereof said building of plaintiff has been shaken and unsettled, and the walls and plaster thereof broken and cracked; that defendant has employed and still employs, and threatens to employ, unskilled employees in and about said machinery, and thereby has endangered, and will endanger, the safety of this plaintiff, and this plaintiff's family, and thereby keeps them in peril of their lives, and will so keep them; that, thereby the value of this plaintiff's said property has been and is become greatly impaired in value, and this plaintiff is and will be unable to rent the same, and will be compelled to abandon the same, unless defendant be restrained from operating the same machinery." The answer denies that the operating of the foundry and machinery is, or ever was, a nuisance, and denies all averments tending to prove the nuisance.

As to the alleged nuisance and damage, the court found the following facts: "That during all said times he, said defendant, used, operated, and maintained the same said foundry and machinery, engine and boiler, in such a manner as to disturb and annoy the plaintiff and his family, and to endanger the safety and health, and to offend the senses, of the plaintiff and his family. Fourth. That the presence and proximity of said machinery, and its operation and use by defendant, as aforesaid, greatly injured and damaged plaintiff and his property. That the defendant, during all of said two years next before the commencement of this action, used and operated said engine, boiler, and machinery at unusual and unseasonable hours, night and day, and on Sundays, and that such use and operations caused intolerable noise, produced offensive fumes, smells, smoke, and soot, which extended to and within the said premises of plaintiff; that, by the jarring caused by the operation of said machinery and engines, the said building of plaintiff was continuously shaken and unsettled, the walls and plastering therein broken and cracked, and said house rendered unsafe as a dwelling, and thereby greatly endangered the lives and safety of the plaintiff and his family; that, on account of all thereof, the said property of plaintiff has been greatly impaired and depreciated in value, and the life and existence of plaintiff and his family rendered uncomfortable and miserable, and their health impaired. Fifth. That by reason of the premises, plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of two thousand dollars. Sixth. That the maintenance of said foundry, and the use and operation of said engine, boiler, and machinery, is, and during all of said times has been, a nuisance on said premises of defendant, and to said plaintiff and his family, upon plaintiff's said premises. Seventh. That the said location of said foundry is in a residence portion of the said city of San Francisco, and is in an unsuitable place for the location of such works." As a condition of denying defendant's motion for new trial, the damages were reduced to $1,200. The judgment perpetually enjoins the defendant "from erecting, maintaining, having, keeping, or operating on said premises of defendant described in the pleadings and records herein, said brass foundry and machine-shop, boiler and engine, or any foundry or machine-shop, boiler or engine, causing noises, smoke, or other effluvia injurious to health, offensive to the senses, or an obstruction to the free use of plaintiff's property described herein." And further orders and decrees that a permanent injunction issue to defendant and his servants and employees, "requiring him and them and each of them to perpetually refrain from having, maintaining, operating, or continuing the use of said brass foundry and machine-shop, boiler and engine, or either thereof, on the said premises of defendant, and requiring him and them, and each of them, to perpetually refrain from ing any brass foundry, or foundry or machine-shop, boiler or engine, thereon, causing noises, smoke, or other effluvia injurious to health, offensive to the senses, or an obstruction to the free use of plaintiff's property described herein, and that said nuisance now maintained on said premises of defendant be abated." The defendant has appealed from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, and his counsel here contend that the evidence is insufficient to justify the findings, and that the findings do not support the judgment.

1. As to the effect of the running of the foundry and machinery, upon the plaintiff and his family and his property, the evidence, is extremely conflicting. On the part of the plaintiff it tends to prove that the defendant operated the foundry and machinery in such a manner as to offend the senses of the plaintiff and his family, and to interfere with the comfortable enjoyment of their residence. To this extent the findings are justified by the evidence, notwithstanding the conflict, and entitle the plaintiff to an adequate remedy by injunction. But so far as the findings exceed this, I think they are not justified by the evidence. The evidence does not justify the findings that the noise was "intolerable," that said building of plaintiff was "continuously" shaken and unsettled, that said house was rendered "unsafe" as a dwelling, that the lives of the plaintiff and his family were "endangered" or rendered "miserable," or that their health was "impaired." The points to which the evidence was directed were annoyances (1) by smoke and soot, (2) by noise and jarring of machinery, (3) by noisome smells, and (4) by obstruction of sidewalk. There is no finding, and no evidence to justify a finding, that either of these causes of annoyance and injury to plaintiff was necessarily incident to the proper operation of the foundry or machinery complained of. Indeed, the evidence tends to prove that the injurious effects may be remedied without enjoining the running of the foundry or machinery, and that it was only the improper and negligent manner of running them that caused the injurious effects upon the plaintiff and his property. It is said that the smoke-stack and the steam escape-pipe are too low, that the boiler and engine are not properly set, and that the fuel is not such as should be used. There is no pretense that the "dipping" of brass castings in diluted acids, upon the sidewalk, was necessary, or that such dipping might not be done at some other place from which the fumes would not reach plaintiff's house, nor that the improper obstruction of the sidewalk was necessary to the proper operation of the foundry or machinery. A brass foundry, and machinery incident thereto, are not prima facie nuisances; and a plaintiff who complains of them must allege and prove that they are such by reason of their peculiar location or the improper or negligent manner in which they are conducted. Therefore, where the injurious effects complained of may be prevented without abating or enjoining the works or the operations thereof entirely, only the causes of the specific injurious effects proved should be enjoined. If, for example, the cause be the production and escape of smoke and soot in such a way as that they penetrate plaintiff's premises to his injury, the remedy by injunction should be restricted to this specific injury, and leave the defendant at liberty to operate his works, if he can, and elects to do so, in such a manner as to remove the cause and prevent the injury. Tuebner v. Railroad Co., 66 Cal. 171, 4 Pac. Rep. 1162; Sullivan v. Royer, 72 Cal. 248, 18 Pac. Rep. 655; Cooley, Torts, (2d Ed.) p. 714 et seq.; Wood, Nuis. §§ 144, 151, 556, 559, 565; Carson v. Railroad Co., 35 Cal. 332; Brown v. Kentfield, 50 Cal. 129. The first part of the injunction in this case restrains the defendant from operating the foundry or machinery complained of, in any manner or at all; and the second part restrains him from operating "any foundry or machine shop, boiler or engine, causing noises, smoke, or other effluvia injurious to health, offensive to the senses, or an obstruction to the free use of plaintiff's property described herein." Even this last part is too general. It is not confined to such noises, smoke, and effluvia as shall be injurious to the health or offensive to the senses of the plaintiff, or to the occupants of his property. That the injunction should be modified is apparent, but, on account of the exaggerated findings of fact not justified by the evidence, the extent of the modification cannot be determined here. The judgment and order are therefore reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

CRALL v. BOARD OF DIRECTORS OF POSO IRRIGATION DIST. (No. 14,038.)

IRRIGATION BONDS—CONFIRMATION—PROCEEDINGS IN REM.

1. St. Cal. 1887, p. 29, known as the "Wright Act," authorized the organization of irrigation districts, with boards of directors, who, after determining the necessary amounts to be raised, should submit the question of the issue of bonds therefor to the qualified voters at a special election. St. 1889, p. 212, supplemental to the Wright act, provided for confirmation of proceedings for the issue and sale of bonds issued thereunder by a special proceeding in the superior court on petition of the board of directors after notice given and published in a prescribed manner. Held, that an order of confirmation entered in such proceedings is conclusive, as to a proper compliance with all the provisions of the Wright act, on a land-owner of the district who did not appear at the confirmation proceedings, but who seeks to enjoin the sale of the bonds.

2. The confirmation proceeding being a proceeding in rem, the land-owner is bound thereby if there has been due publication of notice in accordance with the terms of the statute, notwithstanding there has been no personal service upon him.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Stanislaus county; WILLIAM O. MINOR, Judge.

BELCHER, C. C. An irrigation district, known as the "Poso Irrigation District," was organized by the board of supervisors of Kern county under the act passed by the legislature of this state, and commonly called the "Wright Act." St. 1887, p. 29. A board of directors for the district was elected, and the members qualified and entered upon the discharge of their duties. In performance of the duties prescribed by the act, the board estimated and determined that the amount of $500,000 was necessary to be raised for the purpose of constructing necessary irrigating canals and works, and acquiring the necessary property and rights therefor, and otherwise carrying out the provisions of the act. Thereupon the board called a special election, to be held on a day named, at which was submitted to the qualified electors of the district the question whether or not the bonds of the district should be issued in the amount so determined. Notice of the election was given and published in the manner and for the time prescribed by the act, and the election was held pursuant to the call. When the returns of the election were canvassed, it was found and determined that a majority of the votes cast were in favor of the issuance of the bonds, and thereupon the board ordered that bonds of the district to the amount of $500,000 be immediately prepared and issued in the manner and form provided by the act. Subsequently the board made another order that the bonds to the amount of $200,000 be offered for sale. All of the foregoing proceedings were apparently regular, and in compliance with the provisions of the Wright act. After the entry of the order for the sale of the bonds, the board of directors, under the act supplemental to the Wright act, "and to provide for the examination, approval, and confirmation of proceedings for the issue and sale of bonds issued under the provisions of said act," (St. 1889, p. 212,) commenced a special proceeding in the superior court of Kern county for the purpose of having all the proceedings for the organization of the district and the issue of the bonds judicially examined, approved, and confirmed. A petition for confirmation, in due form, was filed, and thereupon the court fixed a day for the hearing of the petition, and ordered notice to be given and published for the time and in the manner prescribed by the act; and in pursuance of this order notice in proper form was duly given and published. At the time appointed the matter was heard upon oral and documentary evidence, and thereafter the court filed its findings of fact and conclusions of law, and entered its judgment, approving and confirming all of the proceedings for the organization of the district and for the issue of bonds; and it "further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the said Poso Irrigation district, ever since its organization as aforesaid, has been, and now is, a duly and legally organized irrigation district, and that it possesses full power and authority to issue and sell, from time to time, the bonds of said district, to the amount of five hundred thousand dollars." The plaintiff herein did not appear in the confirmation proceedings, but after the entry of the judgment of confirmation he commenced this action to obtain a decree enjoining the sale of the bonds.

For the purpose of showing that the plaintiff is a proper party to bring the action, the complaint alleges that he is the owner of lands within the district, and that they will be subject to assessment to raise money to pay the bonds if they should be sold. It then, after stating facts sufficient to show that there was, in form, a regular organization of the district, and an apparent compliance with the provisions of the statute for the issue of bonds, proceeds to allege that the board of directors has no power to issue or sell the bonds, because—First, the petition which was presented to the board of supervisors for the organization of the district was not in truth signed by 50 freeholders, nor by a majority of the freeholders, then or at any time owning land within the proposed district, and that not more than 30 of the persons whose names purport to have been signed to the petition ever were freeholders within the district; second, the notice of the time and place when and where the election for the organization of the district would be held was not in fact published for the full period prescribed by law; third, the lands of plaintiff were not susceptible of irrigation by the same system of works applicable to the other land of the district, and they would not be benefited by irrigation thereby; fourth, the notice of the special election upon the question whether bonds should be issued was not published or posted for the full period prescribed by law; fifth, the board of directors wrongfully and unlawfully estimated and determined that it was necessary to raise $500,000 for the purposes of the district, when in fact it was necessary to raise only $200,000 for those purposes. The answer of the defendant sets up the judgment of confirmation in bar of the action, and is, in effect, that the matters of irregularity and illegality stated in the complaint were conclusively determined by that judgment. To the answer the plaintiff filed a general demurrer, and thereupon, the vital question in the case being whether the plaintiff was estopped by the judgment of confirmation, the parties stipulated that final judgment should be rendered in accordance with the decision upon the demurrer. The court overruled the demurrer, and rendered judgment for the defendant. From that judgment the plaintiff appeals.

There can no longer be any question that the Wright act is constitutional, and that irrigation districts organized under its provisions, like reclamation districts, are public corporations. Irrigation Dist. v. Williams, 76 Cal. 360, 18 Pac. Rep. 379; Irrigation Dist. v. De Lappe, 79 Cal. 851, 21 Pac. Rep. 825. The districts are authorized to construct irrigation works, and to that end to issue bonds bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, the interest payable semi-annually, and the principal in installments extending over 20 years. These bonds are, from time to time, to be offered for sale, and to be sold to the highest responsible bidder, provided that not less than 90 per cent. of their face value shall be accepted; and they are to be paid, interest and principal, by revenue derived from an annual assessment upon the real property of the district. It is a matter of every-day observation that bonds bearing such a rate of interest, and about whose validity and payment at maturity there is no question, can be readily sold for considerable more than their face value, while bonds which are liable to be assailed and questioned years after their issue, by any one who is required to contribute to their payment, are reluctantly taken at any price. It was doubtless for the purpose of settling all these matters in advance, and thereby making the bonds of irrigation districts more readily salable, and at better prices than they would otherwise command, that the legislature passed the confirmation act, providing that the districts might, before offering any of their bonds for sale, have all questions affecting their validity judicially and finally determined. The confirmation proceeding is denominated in the act a special proceeding, and it is clearly in the nature of a proceeding in rem, the object being to determine the status of the district, and its power to issue valid bonds. The fifth section of the act is as follows: "Upon the hearing of such special proceeding the court shall have power and jurisdiction to examine and determine the legality and validity of and approve and confirm each and all of the proceedings for the organization of said district under the provisions of the said act [Wright act] from and including the petition for the organization of the district, and all other proceedings which may affect the legality or validity of said bonds, and the order for the sale, and the sale thereof." St. 1889, p. 212. That the legislature had power to pass an act to accomplish the purposes intended by this act cannot be questioned. Nor is it pretended that the appellant did not have notice of the confirmation proceedings, or that he was in any way or for any reason prevented from appearing therein, and raising all the objections which he now seeks to raise. The contention is simply that no process issued in those proceedings was served on him personally, and hence that he was not obliged to appear, and his rights are not barred by the judgment, but he is at liberty now to make "any attack upon the proceedings for the issue of bonds, including the proceedings for the organization of the district, that he could have made had there been no judgment of confirmation." To hold otherwise, it is claimed, would have the effect of depriving him of his property without due process of law.

It will be observed that the question is not whether the valuation of the land for the purposes of assessment can be made and definitely fixed without further notice to the land-owner, nor whether the assessment can be collected without further notice, but it is simply whether the notice by publication and posting was sufficient to give the court jurisdiction to determine that the proceedings taken for the organization and on behalf of the district were such as will enable the district to create a valid debt to be paid by the levy of assessments in the manner provided by the Wright act. In our opinion the contention of appellant cannot be sustained. It was not necessary, we think, that personal service be made upon all or any of the land-owners of the district in order to give the court jurisdiction and power to render a judgment, valid and binding as against them and all the world, upon all the questions involved in the case; and this view seems to be well supported by the authorities. In Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 727,—a case largely relied on by appellant,—the supreme court of the United States held that, where the entire object of the action is, to determine the personal rights and obligations of the defendants,—that is, where the suit is merely in personam,—constructive service by publication upon a non-resident of the state is insufficient for any purpose, and at the same time declared that “such service may answer in all actions which are substantially proceedings in rem.” In this state constructive notice, given in such way as is provided by statute, of proceedings for the probate of wills, and of all proceedings in the administration of estates of decedents, has always been regarded as sufficient. In State v. McGlynn, 20 Cal. 233, it was held that the probating of a will was a proceeding in rem, and that the decree admitting a will to probate was conclusive not only upon the parties who were before the court, but upon all other persons. In its opinion the court quotes the following language, used by the supreme court of Vermont in Woodruff v. Taylor, 20 Vt. 65: “The probate of a will I conceive to be a familiar instance of a proceeding in rem in this state. The proceeding is in form and substance upon the will itself. No process is issued against any one; but all persons interested in determining the state or condition of the instrument are constructively notified, by a newspaper publication, to appear and contest the probate; and the judgment is not that this or that person shall pay a sum of money or do any particular act, but that the instrument is or is not the will of the testator. It determines the status of the subject-matter of the proceeding. The judgment is upon the thing itself; and, when the proper steps required by law are taken, the judgment is conclusive, and makes the instrument as to all the world (at least so far as the property of the testator within this state is concerned) just what the judgment declares it to be.” See, also, In re Warfield's Will, 22 Cal. 51; Rogers v. King, Id. 72; Halleck v. Moss, Id. 260; Irwin v. Scriber, 18 Cal. 500. So in an action brought against the land and all owners and claimants, known and unknown, to recover a street assessment, it has been held that constructive service of process may be sufficient to authorize the court to render a judgment which is conclusive and binding upon all the world until reversed on appeal or set aside by some direct proceeding brought for that purpose. Mayo v. Ah Loy, 32 Cal. 477;

People v. Doe G. 1,034, 36 Cal. 220; Eitel v. Foote, 39 Cal. 439. So, too, in insolvency proceedings it has been held that notice by publication is sufficient to give the court jurisdiction over the subject-matter and the parties. Bennett v. His Creditors, 22 Cal. 38; Friedlander v. Loucks, 34 Cal. 18; Arnold v. Kahn, 67 Cal. 472, 8 Pac. Rep. 86. Many other analogous cases might be cited, but we think the above sufficient.

The decision in Mulligan v. Smith, 59 Cal. 206, cited by appellant, is not in conflict with what has been said. That case was ejectment to recover possession of a lot of land, which had been sold to pay an assessment under the Montgomery-Avenue act. The act required that a petition, signed by a majority of the owners in frontage of the property to be charged with the costs of the improvement, be presented to the mayor; that a board of public works be then organized, and that it make a report showing the benefits and damages resulting from the improvement to each piece of property within the district to be assessed; and that the report be presented to the county court for approval and confirmation. This court, on page 231, said: “In no part of the statute does it appear that any provisions were made for any notice to be given to property owners of the proceeding authorized to be taken before the mayor, or of the proceedings by the board of public works, or in the county court, against the property declared to be benefited by the opening of the avenue. No personal notice was in fact given to the defendant of the presentation of the petition or of any of the acts of the board. Neither the mayor nor the board was required to give notice until the board had completed the report of its work. Then the statute required it to publish a notice for twenty days in two daily newspapers printed and published in the city and county of San Francisco, that the report would be open for the inspection of all parties interested, at the office of the board, every day, during ordinary business hours, for thirty days.” And again, on page 232: “Nowhere in the statute is the petition made part of the report or of the data or documents used in making it. Nor is it anywhere required that the board or the mayor shall return it to the court or file it there or elsewhere. The court had, therefore, no jurisdiction of the petition,—no power to adjudge upon its execution,—and it could not assume jurisdiction of it, or by its judgment decide upon its sufficiency and validity so as to conclude the defendant; and in adjudicating upon the report itself the court acquired no jurisdiction of the person or property of the defendant, so as to determine his rights. Both, it is true, were within the territorial limits of the jurisdiction of the court, but no actual or substituted process of law had been served upon one or the other.” It was accordingly held that the court below rightly admitted evidence to show that the petition was not signed by the owners of a majority in frontage of the lands assessable for the opening of the avenue. On the other hand, our attention is called to Lent v. Tillson, 72 Cal. 404, 14

Pac. Rep. 71, in which was involved the validity of the proceedings taken for the widening of Dupont street in the city and county of San Francisco, under the provisions of an act passed for that purpose. It was held, in an able and elaborate opinion by Mr. Justice TEMPLE, that notice by publication, as required by the act, was sufficient to constitute due process of law, by which all persons whose rights were affected by the proceedings had before the county court were brought into court, and was sufficient from that time on to charge them with notice of everything done, and to uphold the final order of the court. We conclude that the court below had jurisdiction in the confirmation proceedings of the subject-matter and the parties, and that its judgment is conclusive and binding upon the defendant and all the world until reversed on appeal, or set aside by some direct proceeding instituted for that purpose. We therefore advise that the judgment be affirmed.

Modifying judgment in 25 Pac. Rep. 16.

PER CURIAM. The judgment heretofore ordered and entered in this case is set aside, and the following substituted: The judgment of the superior court as to the difference between 7 and 10 per cent. is reversed, and the cause is remanded, with directions to the superior court to modify the judgment by computing interest on the principal sum of $6,138.50 at 7 per cent. per annum from March 28, 1883, up to the date said judgment was entered. As so modified, the judgment will stand affirmed, the appellant to be allowed the costs of this appeal.

DEDMON et al. v. MOFFITT et al. (No. 13,823.)

VERDICT—FAILURE TO MAKE FINDINGS.

Where, in an action to restrain the diversion of water claimed by plaintiffs by prior appropriation, one of the defendants is enjoined, and it is found that the others had a right to divert the water in the mode and to the extent they were diverting it, plaintiffs cannot complain of a failure to find that said defendants were threatening a further diversion, in the absence of evidence affecting the correctness of the former finding.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Plumas county; G. G. CLOUGH, Judge.

Goodwin & Goodwin, for appellants.
John Gale, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The plaintiffs, claiming to have acquired by prior appropriation the waters of Adams creek and its tributaries, in Sierra county, commenced this action against the defendants to recover damages for a diversion of said water, and to restrain them from further diverting the same. The case was tried by the court, and judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiffs against the defendant Goble, and in favor of the other defendants. The findings are very elaborate and carefully prepared, and appear to give a history of the appropriation of the waters in question by the several parties to the action and their predecessors in interest for a period of 20 years. The plaintiffs moved for a new trial upon a statement of the case, upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings, and that the same are against law; and assign as a particular error that the evidence was insufficient to justify the eighteenth finding of fact. It is a sufficient answer to this assignment of error that the finding itself is not upon a material issue in the case, and that the judgment does not depend upon this finding. Irrespective of this, however, the evidence of Horton and Moffitt, found in the statement, tends to support the finding, and, in the absence of direct evidence to the contrary, was sufficient to justify the court therein.

Appellants ask a reversal of the judgment for the reason that the court has failed to make findings upon certain material issues in the case. A judgment will not, however, be reversed merely for the failure of the court below to make findings upon any issue presented in the case, unless it shall be made to appear to this court that there was evidence presented to that court upon such issue sufficient to authorize it to make a finding thereon. It must also appear that the issue upon which the evidence was given was of such a nature that the finding which the appellant claims should have been made would have the effect to countervail other findings in the record to such an extent that the judgment thereon would be invalid. Himmelman v. Henry, 84 Cal. 104, 23 Pac. Rep. 1098; Winslow v. Gohransen, (Cal.) ante, 504. It appears from the evidence set out in the statement that the south ditch of the plaintiffs was deprived of water during a portion of the irrigating season of 1887, and that the plaintiffs were not able to irrigate as much of their land during that season as they had been accustomed to irrigate in previous seasons. The court found that whatever diversion of the water was made by the defendants, other than the defendant Goble, was rightfully made by them. It also found that during the greater portion of the period covered by the complaint the defendant Goble diverted through his north-west ditch a quantity of water from the creek greater in amount than would have been sufficient to fill all of the plaintiffs' ditches; and, as such diversion was in violation of the plaintiffs' right, the court enjoined Goble from further diversion of water through his north-west ditch. Inasmuch as whatever diversion was made by the defendants, other than Goble, was rightfully made, and as Goble was enjoined from diverting water through his north-west ditch, the plaintiffs obtained all the relief to which they were entitled. When the court had found that the defendants, other than Goble, had the right, as against the plaintiffs, to divert the water in the mode and to the extent in which they were diverting it, the plaintiffs were not entitled to a finding that they threatened any further diversion, as it would not invade their rights. So, too, the extent to which the plaintiffs had appropriated the waters of the creek, or the precise time at which they had completed their ditch, or the amount of water which flowed in it at any particular date, was immaterial, so long as any act of the defendants in reference to such water was not an invasion of their rights. If the plaintiffs do not claim that the findings of the court respecting the relative rights of the parties to divert the waters of the creek were erroneous, it was unnecessary for it to find the time at which the defendants made any specific amount of diversion, or the extent to which the plaintiffs could fill their ditches. As the plaintiffs have not set forth in the statement any evidence affecting the correctness of the above findings, any further findings upon issues, which would not impair the sufficiency of these findings to support the judgment, would be immaterial, and the failure to make such findings does not justify a reversal of the judgment.

It is also urged that certain findings made by the court are inconsistent, and that for this reason the judgment should be reversed. We have carefully examined the findings, and are unable to see that there is any inconsistency in them upon any material point, or which would justify a reversal of the judgment. The case appears to have been fully tried by the court below, and the findings appear to have been carefully prepared, and to show the several rights of the respective parties to the waters in question, and to fully sustain the judgment of the court. The judgment and the order denying the motion for a new trial are affirmed.

BROWN v. CLARK et al. (No. 13,456.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 26, 1891.)

ADVERSE POSSESSION—PAYMENT OF TAXES.

1. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 325, provides that adverse possession is not established unless the land has been occupied and claimed continuously for five years, and the occupants, their predecessors and grantors, have paid the taxes which have been levied on such land. April, 1878, A. entered on land of plaintiff's, fenced it, and occupied it until May, 1884, when he erected a building, and put a tenant in possession, who has since occupied the property. The taxes assessed upon the lot in 1883 were paid by plaintiff. In 1884 the land was assessed to B., mortgagee of A., who paid the taxes that were thereafter assessed for that and three succeeding years. The assessment of 1888 was paid by A. Plaintiff sued in ejectment in 1889. Held, that there had been actual and continuous occupation of the premises and a payment of taxes for five years under adverse claim of right, authorizing a decree quieting A.'s title to the property.

2. Where land is assessed to the mortgagee, and he pays the taxes, it becomes a payment on account of the mortgagor, and is as if made by him, under Const. Cal. art. 13, § 4, providing that the mortgage security shall be assessed as an interest in land to the mortgagee, and either party can pay the tax thereon.

v.26r.no.12—51

Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

J. C. Bates, for appellant. Otto Tum Suden, for respondents.

FOOTE, C. Brown brought an action of ejectment against the defendant Clark and his tenant for the possession of a lot of ground in the city and county of San Francisco. The defendants denied that they had ousted the plaintiff from any portion of the lot described in the complaint except 12½ feet in width by 30 feet in length thereof; and as to this portion they set up by way of cross-complaint the right and title to the same in Clark by virtue of the provisions of section 325 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and prayed that his title thereto might be quieted. Upon the issue tendered by the cross-complaint, and the answer thereto, the court below sustained the contention of the defendants, and held that they were entitled to a judgment for costs, and that the defendant Clark was entitled to a decree quieting his title to the 12½ by 30 feet of the lot, which he claimed in his cross-complaint to be the owner of by adverse possession under claim of right, etc. From the judgment thereupon rendered, and an order refusing a new trial, the plaintiff appeals. The grounds upon which he claims that the court below erred in its findings for the defendants are: That, although the evidence shows that for five years before the action was brought the defendant Clark, or his tenant, was actually and continuously in possession of the land involved here, under a claim of title exclusive of any other right, and had protected the land by a substantial inclosure, and improved the same by building a house thereon, and occupying it by himself or tenant, yet that the evidence did not show that Clark had paid all the taxes levied and assessed upon the land, so as to establish adverse possession, such as is meant by the proviso to section 325 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which reads thus: "Provided, however, that in no case shall adverse possession be considered established under the provision of any section or sections of this Code unless it shall be shown that the land has been occupied and claimed for the period of five years continuously, and the party or persons, their predecessors and grantors, have paid all the taxes, state, county, or municipal, which have been levied and assessed upon such land." If the statute is to be given the construction that the taxes to be paid by the claimant of title, such as is Clark, are taxes which are assessed and levied during the time of his continuous occupation and claim under adverse right, then the defendant is entitled to the relief he obtained if it is also to be held that the payment of taxes by his mortgagee is a payment by him. The action was brought on the 25th of March, 1889. On the 1st of April, 1878, the plaintiff, Brown, was the owner of the land. On that day the defendant Clark entered upon and occupied it, under an adverse claim of right, and under such claim and occupation at once inclosed it with a substantial fence. Ever since that date until May 4, 1884, he maintained his actual occupation and possession of it, keeping the same protected by a substantial inclosure. At the date last mentioned he improved the lot by erecting a building on it, and since then his tenant, Quang Teong, has been in the exclusive possession and occupation of the building and lot. The taxes were paid by the plaintiff, Brown, on the 29th of December, 1883, which had been levied and assessed on the lot on the first Monday of March, 1883. The lot was assessed some time in 1884 to the mortgagee of Clark, and this mortgagee paid all the taxes as they became due which had been assessed against it on the first Monday in March of the years 1884, 1885, 1886, 1887, and the defendant Clark paid all the taxes assessed against the lot on the first Monday of March, 1888, and was in possession up to the day this action was brought, and still is. The plaintiff contends that, as he paid the taxes that were assessed on the first Monday of March, 1883, this was a payment of all taxes due up to and including June 30, 1884, that being the end of the fiscal year, (Const. art. 20, § 5.) and that, therefore, the defendant cannot claim to have the statute run in his favor until the 1st of July, 1884, which would not be five years prior to the 25th of March, 1889, when this action was commenced. But these taxes, while they had been levied and assessed before March 25, 1884, did not remain an assessment levied and unpaid on that day, but became a lien from the first Monday of March, 1883, by virtue of the levy and assessment thereof. Pol. Code, § 3718. The duty laid upon the occupant, as it seems to us, is to pay all taxes which have been levied and assessed against the land during his term of continuous occupancy and adverse claim of right for five years. If he does this he can maintain his possession as against the person who would otherwise be the owner of the land. The plaintiff paid all the taxes which had been levied and assessed on the land, and which remained a burden upon it up to the 29th of December, 1883. When Clark, or his mortgagee, under contract to do so for the mortgagor, paid all the taxes levied and assessed after that, during the five years of Clark's continuous occupancy and adverse claim, he satisfied the conditions of the statute as to payment of taxes.

This view of the matter is greatly strengthened when we come to consider that the actual continuous possession under claim of right, exclusive of any other right for five years, was sufficient to establish adverse possession as against the owner of a paper title by one not relying upon a written instrument, judgment, or decree, where land claimed and occupied was protected by substantial inclosure, or was cultivated or improved, under sections 324 and 325 of the Code of Civil Procedure, until April 1, 1878, when the proviso was added, making, as we think, as an addition to the necessary element of occupation and continuous claim, exclusive of all others, another element that all taxes should be paid which "have been" levied or assessed on the land; the proviso intending that the one element should accord with the other as to time, and this cannot be done except on the idea we have advanced, viz., that the taxes to be paid are all those assessed or levied during the possession, adverse claim, and occupancy. As to continuous occupation under adverse claim of right, it is obvious, under the statute, that it must have existed for five years before the date of bringing the action. That would carry the date of commencement of such necessary possession and occupancy to the 24th of March, 1884. There is nothing in the statute which computes these five years upon the basis of fiscal years. There is nothing therein which states directly for how many years taxes shall be paid. But it says, the taxes to be paid are those which have been assessed on the land. It would seem reasonable, therefore, to say that the object of the proviso was to make the person claiming by occupancy have annexed to this conditional privilege the further condition that he must pay all the taxes which become a burden on the land by levy and assessment during his occupancy under adverse claim of right. It would appear to follow that if Clark had an actual and continuous occupation under adverse claim of right for five years prior to the 25th of March, 1889,—the day this suit was brought,—he satisfied the first condition of the proviso in question, and a reasonable construction of the language thereof must be that if he satisfied this first condition he satisfied the next condition, if he paid all the taxes assessed and levied during that occupation; for, if this be not so, then the rule by which he occupied as to length of time must become different from that which the statute declares to be sufficient as to occupancy, and, in the absence of direct statutory direction, such an inference should not be indulged. Under the constitution of this state, art. 13, § 4, the mortgage security is assessed as an interest in the land to the mortgagee, and either party can pay the tax thereon; but if paid by the mortgagor it is pro tanto a payment of his mortgage debt. Thus, when the mortgage is executed it is in view of this provision of the constitution, and a relation springs up between the parties by virtue of which this tax is to be paid by the mortgagee primarily, but really for the mortgagor; and the tax when thus paid by the mortgagee for the mortgagor by virtue of such relation to do so is a payment for and on account of the mortgagor, and is as if made by him. Therefore, when the mortgagee paid the taxes assessed, there being none other, the mortgagor paid all the taxes assessed and levied on the land. For these reasons we are of opinion the judgment and order should be affirmed.

WE CONCUR: FITZGERALD, C.; TEMPLE, C.

MAXWELL v. TILLAMOOK COUNTY.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — SPECIAL LEGISLATION—CONSTRUCTION OF HIGHWAY.

The act entitled "An act to appropriate $10,000 to aid Tillamook county in the construction of a wagon-road from the Nehalem river, in the north end of said county, to the Fuqua toll-road, in the south end of the county, and to use $1,000 of said appropriation on a branch road from South Prairie to Netart's bay, and to create a board of commissioners to construct said work," approved February 18, 1889, is in conflict with article 4, § 23, subd. 7, of the constitution, which declares that "the legislative assembly shall not pass special or local laws in any of the following enumerated cases, that is to say: * * * For laying, opening, and working on highways, and for the election or appointment of supervisors." The said act is not a general law, but a special and local law, within the meaning of that clause of the constitution.

Appeal from circuit court, Yam Hill county; R. P. Boise, Judge.

W. W. Thayer, for appellant. James McCain and George G. Bingham, for respondent.

LORD, J. This is an action to recover from the defendant, Tillamook county, the sum of $895 for services alleged to have been rendered as superintendent of construction of a public wagon-road from Nehalem to the Fuqua toll-road, in said county, with a branch road from South Prairie to Netart's bay. The complaint alleges, in substance, that by virtue of the provisions of an act entitled "An act to appropriate $10,000 to aid Tillamook county in the construction of a wagon-road from the Nehalem river, in the north end of said county, to Fuqua toll-road, in the south end of said county, and to use $1,000 of said appropriation on a branch road from South Prairie to Netart's bay, and to create a board of commissioners to construct said work," the commissioners named in the act duly employed the plaintiff on the 6th day of March, 1889, as superintendent to superintend the work on said road, at an agreed compensation of $5 per day; that under said employment, and under the direction of said commissioners, the plaintiff rendered services as such superintendent upon and about the construction of said roads from the 26th day of March, 1889, to the 16th day of November, 1889, inclusive, to-wit, 179 days; that the commissioners, upon the construction of such roads, duly reported to the county court of said Tillamook county concerning the construction thereof in manner and form as required by law, and that thereby the said county became indebted to the plaintiff in the sum aforesaid, etc. An answer was filed, denying the material allegations, and further alleging that the plaintiff had filed a verified claim for a less amount ($710) for such services; that the court had examined the same, and adjudged the amount due thereon to be the sum of $300, and ordered a warrant to be drawn on the treasurer of the county for that amount, etc. The plaintiff in his reply alleged that the claim presented was in the nature of a compromise, and did not include all his services, but that he was willing to receive the reduced sum of $710, without controversy, in full, rather than incur the delay and expense of a lawsuit. Upon the case being called for trial, the counsel for the defendant moved to dismiss it for the reasons (1) that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; and (2) that the court had not jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action. The trial court sustained the motion, and ordered that the action be dismissed, and that the defendant recover its costs; and from the judgment entered thereon this appeal was taken.

The main question to be determined is as to the validity of the act under which the services were rendered. The contention is that the act is special and local, and, as such, in contravention of subdivision 7, § 23, art. 4, of the constitution, which provides that "the legislative assembly shall not pass special or local laws in any of the following enumerated cases, that is to say: * * * (7) For laying, opening, and working on highways, and for the election or appointment of supervisors." The act which is claimed to be in conflict with this provision of the constitution reads as follows: "Section 1. There is hereby appropriated out of the general fund of the state of Oregon, not otherwise appropriated, the sum of ten thousand dollars for the purpose of constructing a wagon-road from Nehalem river, in the north part of Tillamook county, to the Fuqua toll-road, in the south part of same county: provided, that one thousand dollars of said appropriation shall be expended on a road from South Prairie to Netart's bay, commencing where the above-named road crosses South Prairie. Sec. 2. That Fred Scherinsinger, A. L. Alderman, and E. W. Mills are hereby appointed commissioners and viewers to locate said road, and cause the same to be surveyed by the county surveyor. When said road or roads are located and run through the lands of any person or persons who may feel themselves aggrieved thereby, they shall have the same recourse at law as is now provided for county roads; but this latter provision shall not apply to any part of said road or roads that are now already located. When said road or roads are located and surveyed, and a plat thereof recorded in the county clerk's office, said road or roads shall not be changed or vacated except upon a petition to the county court, signed by a majority of the freeholders of the district where said change is desired. Sec. 3. The commissioners shall employ some suitable person to superintend the work on said road or roads. The salary of the said superintendent, together with the expenses of damages, viewing, locating, and surveying, shall all be paid out of the county funds of Tillamook county. The said commissioners shall report to the county court of Tillamook county, Oregon, setting forth their action concerning the construction of said road, and a full and explicit statement of their acts in constructing said road. Said report shall be made upon the completion of said road or roads." Section 4 makes provision for the payment of the $10,000 on completion of the road. Sess. Laws Or. 1889, p. 169.

It will be admitted, if this act is a special or local law, that then it comes directly within the prohibition of the clause of the constitution cited, and never had any validity whatever, for the legislature had no power to enact it. But, to determine whether an act of the legislature is special or local, it is necessary to ascertain the meaning to be given to the words "special or local," as used in the constitution. The restriction is that the legislature "shall not pass special or local laws" in the enumerated cases; that is, the inhibition is directed against both "special or local laws;" and as laws may be special and not local, or they may be local and not special, it is necessary that each word receive its distinct and peculiar signification. It is not easy to define with precision the distinction between a general law and one that is special or local. In general language, a local statute may be said to be one that is operative only within a portion of a state, and a special statute is one that is applicable to particular individuals or things. Statutes are sometimes distinguished as general or local, according to whether they are intended to operate throughout the entire jurisdiction, or only within a single county or other division or place. A law which applies only to a limited part of the state, and the inhabitants of that part, is local. At common law, statutes were classified as public or general, and private or special. 1 Bl. Comm. 86. "A general or public act," says Blackstone, "is a universal rule that regards the whole community, and of this the courts of law are bound to take notice judicially and ex officio, without the statutes being particularly pleaded. Special or private acts are rather exceptions than rules, being those which only operate upon particular persons and private concerns." Under this classification, the words "public or general" and "private or special," are used synonymously. The classification of statutes as local is of later origin; for, under the common law, statutes restricted to particular localities were considered as private or special. But the distinction between public and private acts as defined by Blackstone is not quite the distinction recognized in this country, where the disposition has been, on the whole, to enlarge the limits of the class of public acts which in any way affect the community at large. Unity v. Burrage, 103 U. S. 455; Suth. St. Const. § 193. Within this view, local acts may be public or private, and are treated as public when they concern the public generally, though restricted in their operation to a local community. The distinction is important, owing to the various restrictions in the constitutions of the several states, and the division made in some of them between public or general laws, in printing the acts of their legislatures, and to be kept in mind in the examination of the authorities. Thus, in Maryland, the division of the laws as published are "Public General Laws" and "Public Local Laws." Under the constitution of that state, article 3, § 33, inhibits the passage of local or special laws in certain enumerated cases, but the laying out of roads is not included among them; but the next sentence imposes an inhibition to the passage of special laws for any case for which provision has been made by an existing general law. In State v. Commissioners, 29 Md. 516, the case shows that an act was passed relating to roads of that county; and the contention was that the act was a special law, within the meaning of section 33, art. 3, supra, and, because provision had been made by an existing general law for jurisdiction and control over county roads and bridges, it fell within the constitutional prohibition and was a nullity. But the court held that it was not a special law, but a public local law; that to make a statute a public law of general obligation it is not necessary that it should be applicable to all parts of the state; all that is required is that it shall apply to all persons within the territorial limits described in the act. But the clause of our constitution under consideration inhibits the general assembly from passing any "local or special laws" for the laying out and establishing of roads, and any act obnoxious to the objection of being special or local would be a nullity; for it is obvious that the prohibition of the enactment of "local or special laws" in the enumerated cases—as the laying out of a highway—is equivalent to the command that general laws alone shall be enacted for that purpose; for the words "local" or "special" are clearly used in contradistinction to the word "general;" and, there being no power in the legislature in such cases to enact "local" or "special" laws, there can be no other than "general" laws enacted. People v. Cooper, 83 Ill. 586. Hence, if the act in question is local or special,—obnoxious to either objection,—the legislature was without power to enact it, and the act is without any validity. A local act applies only to a limited part of the state. It touches but a portion of its territory, a part of its people, or a fraction of the property of its citizens. "Legislation, to be local," said MULLIN, P. J., "must apply to and operate exclusively upon a portion of the territory of the state, and the people living therein. If it applies to and operates upon persons or property beyond such locality, it is not local." And again: "The true criterion by which to determine whether an act is local or general is to inquire whether, under it, the people of the state may be affected. If not, it is local; if they can be, it is general." Healey v. Dudley, 5 Lans. 115. "A local act," said EARL, J., "is one operating within a limited boundary or specified locality. An act operating upon persons or property in a single county, or in two or three counties, would be local." People v. Plank-Road Co., 86 N. Y. 7. A special statute is one that is only applicable to particular individuals or things. "They are those made," says Mr. Sutherland, "for individual cases, or for less than a class, requiring laws appropriate to its peculiar condition and circumstances. Local laws are special as to place." Suth. St. Const. § 127. A special law is one such as at common law the courts would not notice unless it was pleaded and proved like any other fact. Hingle v. State, 24 Ind. 28; Railroad Co. v. Nordyke, 27 Ind. 95. At common law, "private" and "special" laws, as applied to statutes, were convertible terms. In Allen v. Hirsch, 8 Or. 412, the view was sustained that a special law under section 23, art. 4, is a private law at common law. An act changing the venue of a particular trial for murder is special. People v. Judge, 17 Cal. 547. An act to establish a court at a particular place was held to be a special law in McGregor v. Baylies, 19 Iowa, 43. One text-writer defines a special law as distinguished from a general law in this wise: A general law "is one which provides for all things of a kind or genus; special provides for a species of the genus." Smith, Con. St.

It is not easy to define with accuracy the distinction between general and special laws, but the instances given will serve to elucidate the idea. It is, however, manifest from the construction given to these words, "special or local," as applied to statutes, that the purpose of the prohibition against the general assembly passing "local or special laws" in the enumerated cases, including the laying out of highways, was to secure a harmonious system of general laws upon these subjects, and to avoid the mass of incongruous acts, each applying to some limited portion of the state, or some particular individual or special case, as would inevitably result. This would prevent any distinction in the operation of laws between different localities, as well as between persons or things, in respect to these subjects. It would require, as to these matters, that they should be regulated by general laws of uniform operation throughout the state.

Turning now to the act in question, it is entitled "An act to appropriate $10,000 to aid Tillamook county in the construction of a wagon-road" wholly within its boundaries. It appropriates the money for that purpose out of the general fund of the state. It appoints the commissioners and viewers to locate the road, authorizes them to employ some suitable person to superintend its construction, provides that the expense of damages and locating the road shall be paid out of the county funds, and makes provision for the payment of the $10,000 on the completion of the road. It is thus seen that the law applies and operates exclusively in that limited portion of the state known as "Tillamook County." It does not apply to all highways in that county, but only to the particular highway designated in the law. It confers on that county special benefits, at the expense of the general public, not conferred upon the other counties of the state. The act is plainly intended for a particular case and for a particular county, and contemplates no broader application in the future. When the road is built as provided, and paid for out of the appropriation, the mission of the act is ended. It arbitrarily distinguishes between the different counties of the state, in its operation, by building for that county alone a highway at the public expense for its special benefit, save the expense of salary and damages of locating, when all other counties must lay out and construct their roads at their own expense, under the operation of a general law enacted for that purpose. Nor does the road connect two great or remote sections of the state in which the community at large have an interest, but its advantages and benefits are confined almost exclusively to the inhabitants living along its route. The act is addressed to that county alone, personally as a legal entity, and designed to aid it exclusively, and operates only within its boundaries. If a local act is one operating within a limited territory or specified locality, "one operating upon persons or property in a single county, or two or three counties, would be local," and the act in question must be obnoxious to that objection. In Kerrigan v. Force, 68 N. Y. 381, an act entitled "An act relating to the expenses of judicial sales in the county of Kings" was held to be a local law, within the meaning of the constitutional provision that no private or local bill should contain more than one subject, which should be expressed in its title. CHURCH, C. J., says: "I entertain no doubt that this is a local act, within the meaning of the constitution. It applies to an officer of a single county, and to the property and sales made therein. It is not general, and does not apply to the people of the whole state. True, all persons, wherever living, in or out of the state, foreclosing mortgages in the county, would be bound by the act, and they would be so bound because they would come within the operation of this local act." In Montgomery v. Com., 91 Pa. St. 125, the case shows that an act was passed to reimburse certain parties for money advanced, and required the school directors of Ayr township to assess and levy a tax, etc., for that purpose; and the question was whether this act was in conflict with the provision of the constitution of that state declaring that "the general assembly shall not pass any local or special laws regulating the affairs of counties, cities, townships, wards, boroughs, or school districts," etc.; and the court held that the act was a local and special law, saying: "The act in question is clearly local. It applies to the township of Ayr only. * * * It is also special. The tax was to be levied and collected for one specific purpose. That purpose was to pay a certain sum of money to the persons named in the act. The money could not be used for any other or different purpose."

If the true criterion by which to determine whether an act is local or general is to inquire whether, under it, the people of the state may be affected by its operation, the answer to that question, as regards the present act, must be that it is local, and not general. It operates in the county of Tillamook only, and has no force or effect in any other portion of the state. If such a law is not local, it is difficult to understand, in the light of the authorities, what species of legislation would constitute a local law. It is also special, because it is limited to a particular county for a special purpose. This is as much an individual case as a special law, applicable only to a particular individual. It can have no application to any other county or road than that named, and the appropriation could not be used for any other or different purpose. An act may be special where it applies to many particular and existing persons or things, as where it applies to only one; but the strength of our case lies in the fact that it applies to only one; it is special to Tillamook county, and to no other. General laws relate to the public at large, but special acts concern the particular interest or benefit of certain individuals or particular classes of men. We are relieved of the difficulty which often arises in distinguishing whether an act is general or special, when it concerns many particular persons or things; for the act here concerns the interests of one county only, and that designated by name. In Devine v. Commissioners, 84 Ill. 590, an act was passed under which it was proposed to issue bonds for the erection of a court-house, etc., but which, by its terms, limited its operation to counties containing over 100,000 inhabitants, etc.; and the question was whether the act was in conflict with that provision of the constitution of that state which provides that the general assembly shall not pass local or special laws in certain enumerated cases, and among the subjects mentioned is a subdivision "for regulating county and township affairs;" but the court held that a statute which, by its terms, can have application to but one county in the state, although purporting to be a general law, applicable to all counties having a certain population, is special legislation, and within the prohibition of the constitution on that subject. The court say: "Its very terms preclude it from having any application to any county except Cook county; for we take judicial notice no other county in the state contains over one hundred thousand inhabitants. * * * That it is a 'local or special law,' applicable only to Cook county, is a proposition so plain it will bear no discussion, and, unless its passage can be justified for some reason, it is invalid." In City of Topeka v. Gillett, 32 Kan. 437, 4 Pac. Rep. 800, an act was passed which was claimed to be in conflict with that provision of the constitution of Kansas which provides that "the legislature shall pass no special act conferring corporate powers;" and the court say: "The act would apply to just those three cities, Topeka, Lawrence, and Atchison; no more, and no less. Is such an act a general act, or is it merely a special act? It is our opinion that it is merely a special act. It is true, it applies to three cities, and not merely one; but the act declared unconstitutional in the case of the City of Council Grove, 20 Kan. 619, applied to four cities, and not merely one; and the act declared unconstitutional in the case of State v. Hammer, 42 N. J. Law, 435, applied to two cities, and not merely to one; and the act declared unconstitutional in the case of State v. Bridge Co., 22 Kan. 438, applied to several different corporations, and not merely to one; and the act declared unconstitutional in the case of State v. Herrman, 75 Mo. 340, applied to a large number of notaries public, and not merely to one." But our act applies merely to one. It is designed to aid Tillamook county, and no other. It specifically names that county as its beneficiary, and contemplates no broader or other application of its benefits. Within the definition that all special laws are made for individual cases; that they relate to divers particular towns, or to one or more particular counties,—this act was made to aid that particular county to build that particular road. It applies specifically to it, and operates only within its boundaries. Such a law is in no sense general, but wholly special, within the meaning of all the authorities. It seems to us that it would be difficult to imagine a clearer case of special legislation.

With these considerations in view, it becomes necessary now to notice Allen v. Hirsch, 8 Or. 412, mainly relied upon by the plaintiff. The act passed upon in that case was an act for the construction of a wagon-road up the south bank of the Columbia river from near the mouth of the Sandy, in Multnomah county, to The Dalles, in Wasco county, and was to be paid for, not from taxes levied upon the people of the state, but from the proceeds of sales of public lands for the purpose of making internal improvements. That act was treated as providing for an internal improvement—a state highway—in which the community at large was interested. The benefits of the road to the people along its route were regarded as insignificant, compared to the great advantages to the people at large, which it was its purpose to subserve. Referring to its character, its necessity, and its advantages to the people at large, KELLY, C. J., said: "It is well known to all that during the winter months it is the only practicable route for a public road through the mountain range which separates eastern from western Oregon, and it was deemed to be of the most importance to the people of the state that trade and travel and mail facilities should not be obstructed; that intercourse between these two great divisions of the state should not be suspended during that season of the year when navigation on the Columbia is closed by ice in the river. It was well known to the legislative assembly that for weeks at a time all communication between the east and west was suspended, until the interruption came to be regarded as almost a public calamity; and it was to prevent these obstructions that the appropriations of money were made to construct the Dalles and Sandy road." It is thus seen that the road was regarded by the court as a great highway, connecting two important divisions of the state, separated by a high range of mountains, through which travel and traffic might pass at all seasons of the year, and in which the people of the whole state were interested in like manner as they would be in the construction of a portage road to connect the navigable waters of the Columbia at the place of its obstruction. It was in this view that the court thought that the act could not be regarded as local or special; for the sphere of its influence or operation was not confined to a specified locality, but applied to the people of both sections of the state, and was therefore a matter of general concern. This is the ground upon which that case was decided. But while it was insisted by opposing counsel that this difference was sufficient to exclude the present case from the effect of that decision, yet his argument amounted to saying that the law was stated correctly by the court, but wrongly applied in that case.

The purpose of the constitutional restriction upon the legislative power in the cases enumerated was obviously to require that these specified subjects should be regulated by general laws of uniform operation throughout the state. In the execution of this purpose, it was intended by the restriction to prevent unjust distinctions from the operation of local laws between different localities, and to prevent like distinctions from the application of special laws to particular individuals, counties, or things. This act violates that principle of this constitutional restriction, and embodies the mischief it was intended to prevent, and cannot be upheld. This is the ground upon which we declare this act to be unconstitutional. While it is true that every court approaches with gravity the question of declaring a law to be unconstitutional, and never exerts its power so to do while doubt exists, yet considerations of gravity stand for naught when its incompatibility with the constitution is shown, and nothing remains for the court but to discharge its duty by declaring the law to be unconstitutional. It may be that in this county, as some other localities of the state, where the population is sparse, and the funds of the county are limited, such roads, built at the public expense, would be of general service to the people of those localities, and lend to the development of their interests and prosperity. If this is so, and a change is desirable, the remedy lies with the people, and not with the court. There was no error, and the judgment of dismissal must be affirmed.

CONVICTION OF MURDER—COSTS ON APPEAL.

A person who on conviction of murder gives notice of appeal, and shows that he is absolutely unable to pay for a transcript of the record, is entitled to such transcript at the expense of the public. DUNBAR, J., dissenting.

Application for mandamus.
John Fairfield, for relator.

HOYT, J. Relator was convicted of murder in the first degree and sentenced to death. He gave notice of appeal to this court, and to perfect the same sought to have the clerk transmit a transcript of the record. The clerk declined to do this unless the fees for preparing the same were first paid. Relator thereupon showed that he was without means, and was absolutely unable to pay such fees. Under these circumstances, relator was entitled to such transcript at the expense of the public. The writ of mandamus must issue as prayed.

ANDERS, C. J., and STILES and SCOTT, JJ., concur.

DUNBAR, J. I dissent. I know of no provision of law, either statutory or constitutional, empowering the court to authorize the disbursement of public funds to aid a defendant to prosecute his appeal to the supreme court. Section 22, art. 1, of the state constitution, relied upon by counsel for appellant, in my judgment does not touch this case. That section simply guaranties to the accused the right of appeal in any case; that is, provides that the right of appeal in criminal cases shall not be taken away by statute; and the final judgment referred to in said section refers to final judgment in the superior courts. Such was the construction placed upon it in Stowe v. State, 25 Pac. Rep. 1085, decided by this court at its last term. The payment by the state of the costs of appeal in a criminal action, where the defendant is not able to pay, might be a humane policy for the law to adopt; but as the law-making power has not seen fit to adopt such a policy it is not within the inherent power of the court to grant the relief asked for.

PIERCE v. FRACE.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Feb. 11, 1891.)

PUBLIC LANDS—PRE-EMPTION—FRAUD—CANCELLATION OF ENTRY AND CERTIFICATE.

Act Cong. July 4, 1886, provides that the issuing of patents and sale of public lands shall be under the supervision of the commissioner of the general land-office. Rev. St. U. S. § 2263, provides that proof of settlement and improvement shall be made before entry "to the satisfaction of the register and receiver of the land district in which such lands may lie." Held that, where a pre-emptor has proved his settlement to the register's satisfaction, and received from him a cash entry certificate and final receipt, the latter's judgment cannot be reopened by the commissioner and set aside, on complaint of a stranger that his residence has not been established as required by law. Per DUNBAR, J., dissenting from ante, 192.

For majority opinion, see ante, 192.

DUNBAR, J., (dissenting.) As I indicated at the time of the filing of the majority opinion, I will now give some of my reasons for dissenting thereto. It is a common remark by practitioners before the land department that the land laws "do not amount to anything, but that everything depends upon the instructions." But, in the investigation of rights under the land laws, I prefer to look first at the law, and see if any provisions are made by the law, or direct authority given by the law, for the action of the commissioner, or whether the authority is conferred upon the commissioner, under his supervising powers, to set aside the findings of the register and receiver on the questions of residence and cultivation in case of a pre-emption proof, which is the point involved in this case. An examination of the pre-emption law shows that preceding sections state what lands shall be subject to pre-emption entry, who are qualified pre-emptors, etc.; while section 12 of the act of 1841, corresponding with section 2263 of the Revised Statutes, provides that, "prior to any entries being made under and by virtue of the provisions of this act, proof of the settlement and improvement thereby required shall be made to the satisfaction of the register and receiver of the land district in which such lands may lie, agreeably to such rules as may be prescribed by the secretary of the treasury," now by subsequent enactment changed to secretary of the interior. It seems to me that there is no room for a construction of this section. Here is a judicial authority conferred upon a tribunal in language plain and unmistakable. The power is conferred as plainly as words can state a proposition. It is the judgment of the register and the receiver that is to be satisfied; not the judgment of the commissioner or the secretary of the interior. This is a judicial investigation on their part; not merely a clerical or administrative duty to be performed. A fact is to be judicially determined from evidence adduced under certain rules and regulations of law. The rules and regulations governing the admission of this testimony, or the mode of procedure, are prescribed by the secretary of the interior, and it is the duty of the commissioner to see that these rules and regulations are observed, and that the investigation is conducted in accordance with them; but the judicial inquiry and determination of the facts, under those prescribed rules, are matters exclusively within the jurisdiction of the register and receiver, so far as settlement and improvement are concerned. I repeat that, if this investigation has not been carried on agreeably to, or in conformity with, such rules as the secretary is authorized to make, then for that reason only should the commissioner reject the proof or send it back for a rehearing; for when those officers have obtained jurisdiction, by reason of all the other requirements of the law having been met, and when their discretion and judgment have been legally exercised and a decision reached on the question of settlement and improvement, questions especially submitted to their discretion by the law, that decision is not subject to the supervising power of superior officers. There is a vast difference between prescribing rules and regulations and usurping judicial functions. Supervisory powers may be exercised over acts which are purely administrative or executive; but the distinction must be constantly kept in view between acts which are administrative or executive and those which are judicial in their character. Under this section the register and receiver are authorized by law to exercise their discretion judicially. As was well said by the court in Butterworth v. Hoe, 112 U. S. 50, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 25: "It is not consistent with the idea of judicial action that it should be subject to the discretion of a supervisor, in the sense in which that authority is conferred upon the head of an executive department in reference to his subordinates. Such a subsection takes from it the quality of a judicial act."

But it is asserted by counsel for defendant in error that the commissioner, at the time of ordering a rehearing in this case, acted with authority, because the following circular instructions were then in force, viz.: "Failure to inhabit and improve the land in good faith, as required by law, renders the claim subject to contest, and the entry to investigation." "Final proof in pre-emption cases must be made to the satisfaction of the register and receiver, whose decision, as in any other case, is subject to examination and review by this office." I answer that, if he had no authority before the publication or issuance of these instructions, he manifestly had none afterwards. Courts must confine the enactment of laws to law-making powers. The congress of the United States is the only body that can make laws regulating the sale or disposition of the public lands. The secretary of the interior is authorized to prescribe rules and regulations to make the laws effective, and to exercise supervisory powers in certain instances; but he is not authorized to make new laws, to increase his own powers, or to take away any judicial authority that has been especially, or even generally, conferred upon another tribunal. If the secretary or commissioner are allowed arbitrarily, without any appeal, to substitute their discretion for that of the register and receiver on subjects especially submitted to them, they might logically go further, and dispense with their judgment altogether. "If fraud is alleged in obtaining the final receipt," says Judge Deady in Smith v. Ewing, 23 Fed. Rep. 741, "the government must seek redress in the courts, where the matter may be heard and determined according to the law applicable to the rights of individuals under like circumstances. The right of a party holding a certificate of purchase of public land and that of his grantee is a right in and to property of which neither of them can or ought to be deprived without due process of law." I think the case of Wilcox v. Jackson, 13 Pet. 498, fairly sustains the theory of the plaintiff in error; also Lytle v. State, 9 How. 314. It must be borne in mind that it is not contended by appellant that the action of the register and receiver cannot be reviewed; but the contention simply is that their decision on these two questions, of residence and improvement only, cannot be reviewed in a pre-emption case, and such I believe to be the distinction made by the cases generally; and those cases cited wherein their decisions have been reversed or set aside on some other ground do not involve the pertinent question in this case, and should not be considered. This distinction I think was plainly maintained in the late case of Cornellus v. Kessel, 128 U. S. 456, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 122. Said Mr. Justice FIELD, in a well-considered opinion. "The power of supervision possessed by the commissioner of the general land-office over the acts of the register and receiver of the local land-offices, in the disposition of the pub-lie lands, undoubtedly authorizes him to correct and annul entries of land allowed by them, where the lands are not subject to entry, or the parties do not possess the qualifications required, or have previously entered all that the law permits;" fairly implying that the entry could not be annulled on the ground of want of proof of settlement or cultivation.

But it is contended that the earlier cases are not in point, because they were decided on controversies which arose prior to the passage of the act of 1836, which enlarged the supervisory powers of the commissioner, the first section of which act is as follows: "That, from and after the passage of this act, the executive duties now prescribed, or which may hereafter be prescribed, by law, appertaining to the surveying and sale of the public lands of the United States, or in any wise respecting such public lands, and also such as relate to private claims of land, and the issuing of patents for all grants of land under the authority of the government of the United States, shall be subject to the supervision and control of the commissioner of the general land office, under the direction of the president of the United States. I am of the opinion that the act of 1841 was intended for a full, complete, and independent pre-emption law, and, if it be conceded that the act of 1836 modified the act of 1830 with reference to the powers of the register and receiver, the re-enactment of the same section in 1841 must be conceded to be a restoration of that authority, and their decision would again be final on that point; and this view of the law is in harmony with Johnson v. Towsey, 18 Wall. 72, wherein Justice MILLER says that the act of 1841 so enlarged the right of pre-emption as to have been ever since considered the main source of pre-emption rights." And it may be observed in this connection that, in all the cases relied upon by the majority, while the decisions were rendered subsequent to 1841, yet all the controverted facts had transpired prior to the passage of the act of 1841.

However, conceding that the law of 1836 is still in full force, I cannot conceive how it can in any manner conflict with section 12 of the law of 1841; for it will be observed that the law of 1836 refers exclusively to the executive duties appertaining to the survey and sale of the public lands. Certainly an executive act spoken of in general terms in the act of 1836 has no reference to a judicial duty especially imposed upon a certain tribunal. But, if there could possibly be any doubt on this question, it has been squarely met and settled in the case of Butterworth v. Hoe, 112 U. S. 50, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 26. There it was announced that "the executive supervision and direction which the head of a department may exercise over his subordinates, in matters administrative and executive, do not extend to matters in which the subordinate is directed by statute to act judicially." This was a case growing out of the patent-office department; but the subject of supervisory powers in general, including the supervisory powers in the land department, was reviewed with care and ability by Mr. Justice MATTHEWS, and the doctrine announced therein, it seems to me, is squarely decisive of this case. So far as the case of Harkness v. Underhill, 1 Black. 316, is concerned, I cannot see its application to the case at bar. That was not a contest under the pre-emption laws; but simply under a special law passed April 5, 1832, which allowed parties a pre-emptive right to purchase not to exceed 160 acres of land, which they had already settled and improved prior to the passage of the act, and the parties in that case had made settlement and improvement in anticipation of the passage of the act. The act specially provided that all the entries should be made under regulations prescribed by the secretary of the interior. There was no provision in the act for proof of residence or improvement to the satisfaction of the register and receiver, and the main question involved in this case was not and could not have been involved in that. Barnard's Heirs v. Ashley's Heirs, 18 How. 43, seems to be more in point, so far as some of the expressions in the opinion of the court are concerned, though the material facts in that case were essentially different from the facts in this case. There one of the main questions involved was whether or not the lands were subject to pre-emption at the time of Barnard's attempted entry. It is not contended here that that would not be a proper question for review by the commissioner.

I do not think that it is the province of the court to nullify a plain provision of the law by an argument based upon the bad policy of the law; that is purely a legislative prerogative; though, in my judgment, the view of the law, as contended for by the appellant, can be maintained upon the highest grounds of public policy, and in strict accordance with a just and equitable administration of the laws. It is and should be the policy of the law that rights should be speedily adjusted, and that litigation should be terminated as soon as is possibly consistent with a rightful determination of the matters in controversy. Especially is this true with reference to rights under the land laws, where the home of the citizen is involved. Every consideration of public policy and of private right then calls for a speedy adjustment. The law recognizes the necessity, and, while leaving the more general questions to be reviewed and determined by the higher officers of the department, especially clothes a local tribunal with the power of determining the local fact of residence and improvement, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the department. These officers are on the ground. They are acquainted with the character and reputation of the people making the proof. In many instances they meet the witnesses face to face; in fact, this was the universal practice at the time the law was enacted. They are acquainted with the country, its topography, its soil, and its climate. They know the peculiar circumstances surrounding the settler, in his sometimes successful and sometimes unsuccessful efforts to cultivate the soil; and they are better calculated to pass intelligently on the settler's rights in those particulars than is the commissioner or secretary, albeit they are lower officers in the department, and are more remote from the seat of government. As one member of this court, I cannot indulge in the presumption that an officer's tendency to a careless or corrupt administration of a trust reposed in him is in proportion to his rank or the distance of his habitation from the seat of government. I prefer to believe that—

"The rank is but the guinea-stamp;
The man's the gold for a' that."

But, that all possible safeguards might be thrown around this investigation, the act of 1879 provides that notice of proof shall be given by publication in a newspaper nearest to the land in question for 30 days before the day of proof, and that the names of the witnesses by which claimant intends to establish his claim shall be given in such publication. Opportunity is thus given, to any one who has knowledge of bad faith on the part of the claimant, to appear and resist the claim. Up to this time the settler understands that he must look out for and have on hand the necessary witnesses, and he makes arrangements accordingly. He makes his proof as the law requires, and to the satisfaction of the tribunal empowered by the law to pass upon the sufficiency of the proof. No one appears to contest his right. No appeal is taken from the decision rendered. He pays the money demanded by the government, and so far as he knows and is able to ascertain the case is closed. His final certificate issues. He takes possession of the land, and pays taxes on it. His witnesses are allowed to depart and leave the country, as they are very liable to do in all new countries. He makes valuable improvements on the land, and all the results of his years of labor between the time that he makes his proof and the long time which frequently elapses before patent issues is absorbed by the land; and I agree with the attorneys for the appellant that to subject him during all this time to the uncertainties of an arbitrary proceeding or hearing before the officers of the executive or political branches of the government, at a time when he may be helpless to secure the evidence which he needs, and where he may be overwhelmed with so-called "testimony," which does not have the sanction even of an oath upon which perjury can be prosecuted, is so obviously unjust and unfair that the courts ought not to sanction it.

In the case at bar, Pierce made his final proof to the satisfaction of the register and receiver on the 18th day of February, 1883, paid to those officers the sum of $400, and received his "patent certificate." No appeal was taken from this decision; but six months afterwards Frace, a stranger, filed with the commissioner an affidavit alleging that Pierce had not established a residence upon said land. No action was taken by the commissioner upon this notice until May 16, 1885. Thus it will be seen that after the expiration of two years and three months from the adjudication of this case Pierce's right to this land was called in question in this summary manner. The judgment was reopened and set aside. The land was awarded to the informer, the government retaining the purchase price paid by Pierce, presumably, upon the ground that perjury had been committed in making the proof, without giving him an opportunity to answer that charge in a court of competent jurisdiction, where a judicial determination could be had on that question. There is no claim that the land was not properly subject to pre-emption entry, or that Pierce was not a qualified pre-emptor, or that the register and receiver had not complete jurisdiction of the case when it was first tried, but the sole question involved was one of residence. This question having been once decided by the proper tribunal, and certificate of patent having issued, I think that the commissioner acted without authority of law in disturbing that decision.

MCGRAW V. FRANKLIN.

REPLEVIN—FRAUD—EVIDENCE.

1. Goods recently sold to plaintiff were attached by a creditor of her vendor, and, in consideration of plaintiff giving her note for the debt, the vendor promised to pay the note at maturity. Plaintiff gave a mortgage to secure this note, and both were assigned to A., who was the brother of said vendor, and who foreclosed the mortgage. In replevin against the sheriff having possession of the goods under the foreclosure proceedings, plaintiff alleged that the vendor in fact paid the note, and fraudulently procured the transfer of the mortgage to A., instead of causing its discharge. It appeared that A. had no money with which to buy the note. The testimony was conflicting as to who furnished him the money, and as to whether the mortgage had actually been paid. Held, that the judgment for plaintiff should be reversed.

2. The defendant having obtained possession of the goods by a decree in foreclosure upon default of the plaintiff, evidence as to whether the said vendor of the mortgaged goods and the assignee of said mortgage conspired together to defraud plaintiff is irrelevant to the taking and selling of said goods by the defendant.

Per ANDERS, C. J., and HOTT, J., dissenting.

For majority opinion, see 25 Pac. Rep. 911.

ANDERS, C. J., (dissenting.) I am unable to concur in the conclusion reached by the majority of my brothers in the case. The plaintiff in the court below, being the owner of certain personal property, which she had previously mortgaged, sought to recover the possession, or the value thereof, from the defendant, who was sheriff of King county, and who had taken said property into custody by virtue of a statutory foreclosure proceeding instituted by the assignee of the mortgagee. The note secured by the mortgage was overdue, and both it and the mortgage were in the possession of Andrew Merchant, to whom they had been transferred by the original mortgagee for value. No steps were taken in the pending proceedings, in accordance with the provisions of the statute or otherwise, to contest the right to foreclosure or the amount due; but instead this action was brought to recover the property then in the custody of the sheriff and of the law by reason of the default of the plaintiff herself. It is true the testimony of the defendant shows that, before the sale of the goods under the foreclosure proceedings, she was told by the plaintiff's attorney that, as matter of fact, the note had been paid, and that the attempt to foreclose was a fraud between Robert and Andrew Merchant. But, under the circumstances, he was not bound to relinquish the property on a mere statement of that character, nor, indeed, would he have been justified, as an officer charged with the performance of an official duty, in so doing. It is disclosed by the record that the foreclosure and sale were substantially in conformity to the statute, and the sheriff should not be held responsible in the action for the goods sold by him, unless it be shown that his acts were wrongful and unauthorized by law. The action was tried and judgment rendered against the defendant in the lower court, on the theory that the note and mortgage of Mrs. Franklin had been paid, and that, therefore, the defendant had become a trespasser by seizing and disposing of the goods in question. But I am strongly of the opinion that all the testimony upon that point, taken together, fails to show more than that Robert Merchant promised Mrs. Franklin to pay her note before maturity, and that he failed to do so; and it requires no argument to demonstrate the proposition that a promise to pay is not payment, either in fact or in law. It also seems to me that all the testimony concerning the alleged fraudulent transactions between the Merchants and the agreement made by Robert Merchant with Mrs. Franklin to pay the note was wholly irrelevant, and should have been excluded by the court. Nor do I think the defendant waived any of his legal rights by going to trial, without objection, upon the pleadings, as made up by the parties to the action. The question of conspiracy between the Merchants and Stewart to defraud plaintiff was set up in her reply to defendant's answer. It tendered an immaterial and collateral issue, and I am unable to perceive how the denial of such allegations could, in any way, justify the introduction of testimony touching the same which was objected to by the defendant. In an equitable action against Robert and Andrew Merchant to compel a surrender and cancellation of the note and mortgage, such testimony would have been relevant and proper; and it may be that the facts and circumstances would have warranted the court, in that event, in granting the relief demanded. But in this action the sole question to be determined was whether or not the taking and selling of plaintiff's chattels by the defendant was wrongful, and not whether some other person or persons were guilty of perpetrating a fraud upon the plaintiff, and, in my judgment, the plaintiff should have been confined to the trial of the former question. For the foregoing and other reasons that might be given, I am of the opinion that the judgment of the court below should be reversed, and a new trial granted.

WRONGFUL ATTACHMENT — DEFENSES — FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES — PLEADING.

In an action against an officer for goods seized under an attachment against a third person, where the answer alleges that the goods were the property of such third person, and had been fraudulently transferred to plaintiff in order to hinder and cheat his creditors, and that the transfer was fraudulent and simulated, such answer, being replied to, is sufficient to put the fraud in issue, and evidence tending to prove it is admissible.

Commissioners' decision. Appeal from district court, Arapahoe county.

V. D. Markham and Perry & Carpenter, for appellant. W. S. Decker and T. D. W. Yonley, for appellee.

RICHMOND, C. This action was brought in the district court of Arapahoe county, May 8, 1884, to recover certain personal property, or its value. By the complaint plaintiff claims she was and is the owner and entitled to the possession of the goods, wares, and merchandise therein enumerated; and that on the 2d day of May, 1884, defendant without authority took and carried away and unlawfully detains the same; that the alleged cause of seizure is that in certain suits begun in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Colorado the said goods, wares, and merchandise were seized under a writ of attachment sued out and issued, whereby the defendant seized said goods as the property of one Samuel Bernstein. The defendant answers, and, after denying plaintiff's ownership and possession, admits that he seized the property by virtue of said writ of attachment, as the property of Samuel Bernstein, issued in certain causes pending in the circuit court of the United States for Colorado, wherein Samuel Bernstein was defendant and others were plaintiffs; alleging that the said property so seized was the property of Samuel Bernstein, and that the said Bernstein, intending to cheat, hinder, delay, and defraud the plaintiffs in said action and other creditors, and with intent to conceal, remove, and put his effects out of the reach of his said creditors, did fraudulently convey, transfer, and assign the goods and chattels mentioned in the complaint to the plaintiff herein; that by the transfer, sale, and disposition of such goods and chattels the said plaintiff and the said Bernstein contrived to cheat, hinder, and delay and defraud the creditors of the said Bernstein; and that the said transfer was fraudulent, colorable, and simulated, and was designed to cover up the property of the said Bernstein. Demurrers to answers were interposed, questioning the sufficiency of the defense. Thereafter plaintiff withdrew the demurrers and filed replies. The question of jurisdiction, and the right of plaintiff to institute this suit against the United States marshal, are eliminated from the case. Three trials were had. The last and final trial resulted in a judgment for defendant, to reverse which judgment this appeal is prosecuted. Numerous errors are assigned, the principal one being that the defenses to the causes of action mentioned in the complaint were not sufficient in this: that they failed to specifically allege fraud on the part of Bernstein and the plaintiff against the creditors; hence no evidence tending to prove fraud was admissible under the pleadings; and that the instructions of the court were erroneous because they left the question of fraud to the jury. A careful review of the abstract will show that the main question for our consideration is whether or not the defenses interposed by the defendant were sufficient. If that is shown, it naturally follows that the objection to the instructions of the court, and the objection to the introduction of testimony tending to prove fraud, must be overruled. In this case the plaintiff withdrew his demurrers, and replied to the answer. At least the answer contains a general allegation of fraud, and the appellee went to trial upon the issues thus joined, without taking any exception to the answers on the score of insufficiency. But we are not inclined to agree with counsel that the answers were defective. The defenses clearly aver that the sale from Bernstein to Solomon was colorable and simulated, and for the purpose of putting his property beyond the reach of his (Bernstein's) creditors. To use the language of appellee's counsel, "That sale was a sham, and was contrived by the parties for the sole purpose of swindling creditors." The question of fraud was directly put in issue by the complaint, answers, and replications. This being so, then evidence tending to prove that the sale was fictitious and without value; that the indebtedness between Bernstein and Solomon was not genuine; and testimony relative to the manner of transferring the goods from Bernstein to Solomon; the fact that they were transferred in a lump without invoice; that they were surreptitiously removed from one place to another; that a portion of the goods was exported from the city of Denver, while another portion was dumped into an express wagon and conveyed through an alley to an isolated room in the city, with the evident purpose of concealing them from the officers and the creditors of Bernstein; and the nature of the alleged indebtedness as evidenced by the notes,—were all facts and circumstances clearly admissible under the issue. Hence, as above said, we must conclude that the testimony objected to was admissible, and that the court did not err in overruling the objections.

The last and only question is the one of instruction. The instructions were in the nature of a general charge, and, following the rule of the court heretofore laid down, we feel prepared to say that, taken as a whole, they clearly and sufficiently advised the jury of the law applicable to the case. The sufficiency of the exception is vigorously challenged; but, even conceding this sufficiency, we are clearly of the opinion that the charge to the jury was as favorable to the plaintiff as the evidence warranted. The judgment should be affirmed.

CORPORATIONS—REPORT OF CONDITION—LIABILITY OF OFFICERS.

1. Gen. St. Colo. § 252, requires every corporation to make an annual report stating the amount of its capital, the proportion thereof actually paid in, and the amount of existing debts; and it provides that a failure to file this report shall render the directors and trustees jointly and severally liable for the debts of the company contracted during the year preceding the time for filing it. Held that, where a report is actually filed, the fact that it is false will not render them liable under this section as upon failure to file any report at all.

2. Section 255 provides that all the officers who have signed such false report, knowing it to be false, shall be jointly and severally liable for all damages thereon arising. Held that, in an action to enforce this liability, the complaint is demurrable where it fails to state that officers knew the report was false.

Commissioners' decision. Error to superior court of Denver.

The judgment sustained a demurrer to the complaint. The substantial averments of the pleading were that the Union Smelting & Refining Company was a Colorado corporation organized in 1885, which afterwards bought of the plaintiffs large quantities of ore, and failed to pay about $8,500 of the purchase price. On the 17th day of February, 1886, the company filed in the office of the clerk and recorder of the county of Clear Creek, the county of its place of business, a report which stated that the capital stock of the company was $500,000, of which $407,500 was paid in property and $52,500 in cash, and put the amount of their existing debts at $9,138.31. The report was subscribed by one Lee, as the treasurer of the company; and by the president of the company, who is the defendant in the suit, who made oath to its accuracy, and filed it in the proper of-office. These general allegations were followed by this paragraph: "Plaintiff in fact further says that the said pretended report was and is false and fraudulent in this, to-wit: That the capital stock of said company, $407,500, never was paid in property; nor was any part nor share thereof, save the part of $10,000 or thereabouts, paid in property; nor was $2,500 of said capital stock paid in cash at any time before the filing of said certificate report." The plaintiffs then proceeded to aver that, save as stated, the company did not, within 60 days from the 1st day of January, make any report as required by the statute. This is followed by a general averment of the non-payment of the capital stock, a failure to file a certificate, and a demand for judgment. The complaint contains a further allegation that the certificate was not verified, although it is signed in the following form: "I, Charles B. Patterson, president of the Union Smelting & Refining Company, do certify that I have examined the foregoing report, and find the same to be correct. CHARLES B. PATTERSON. [Seal.] Subscribed and sworn to before me this 15th day of January, 1886. PETER WINKE, Notary Public." The two sections of the statute involved in the decision are sections 252 and 255. The first requires that every corporation shall annually make a report, "which shall state the amount of its capital, the proportion actually paid in, and the amount of existing debts." The report must be signed, verified by oath, be under the seal of the company, and filed in the office of the recorder of the county. A failure to comply with the provisions of this section makes all the directors and trustees jointly and severally liable for all the debts of the company contracted during the year preceeding the time fixed for filing the report. Section 255 is as follows: "If any certified report or statement made or public notice given, by the officers of any corporation, shall be false in any material representation, all the officers who shall have signed the same, knowing it to be false, shall be jointly and severally liable for all damages arising therefrom."

BISSELL, C., (after stating the facts as above.) It is clear that, in the enactment of the two sections of the statute contained in the statement of facts, the legislature intended to subject the officers and trustees of corporations to a statutory liability for the debts of their companies under two very dissimilar conditions. The first section imposes a joint and several liability upon the officers and trustees of corporations for a failure to file the report provided for in that portion of the statute. The liability results from a failure to perform the statutory duty. It makes no difference whatever whether the defaulting trustee did or did not sign the report. The other section imposes a like penalty upon the officer or trustee making and signing the report knowing it to be false. It will be observed that in the latter section there are two elements essential to the liability: First, a participation in the report by an actual signing; and, second, a knowledge of the falsity of that which is made. A casual inspection of the allegations of the complaint will make it apparent that in this case a recovery was sought upon the ground that the report was untrue and false in a material representation, and therefore not a report as required by section 252 of the statute. The real gravamen of the complaint is to be found in the allegations setting out a failure to file a report. It cannot be seriously contended that the allegation that the report was false and fraudulent brings the case within section 255, although the action was brought alone against the trustee who signed it. In order to charge him under that section, it was necessary to aver, not only that the certificate as made and signed by him was false in some material representation, but also that he knew it to be false. This guilty knowledge is made essential to the liability by the express terms of the statute and, in order to charge the officer with the severe penalty imposed, there must be some allegations indicating that it was made for some fraudulent purpose, and with knowledge of its falsity. Pier v. Hanmore, 86 N. Y. 95; Stebbins v. Edmonds, 12 Gray, 203; Bonnell v. Griswold, 89 N. Y. 122. Since it is apparent that upon the complaint the action could not be maintained under the section establishing a liability for filing a report which is known to be false by the officer making it, it leaves the very simple question as to whether, if a report be filed which is false, there can be said to have been a failure to file a report as required by the other section. If the report set out in the complaint be analyzed, and compared with the statute, it is impossible to hold that it is not in form a compliance with its provisions. It was filed within the time designated. It states the amount of the capital stock, the amount which was paid in cash, and the amount paid in property. It was signed by one of the officers charged with the duty, and was sufficiently verified to satisfy the statutory requirement. It therefore would seem that the company did not fail to do what the statute required. But the contention is that a false report is no report and the inquiry ought to be, not only whether the report was made, but whether it was true, and, if not true, then that all the trustees are liable whether they did or did not sign the report. This cannot be the purpose, nor is it the plan, of the statute. The subsequent section contemplates the possibility of a false report, and provides a penalty. As was well said by the court in Bonnell v. Griswold, 80 N. Y. 128: "The statute does not declare that, if false, it shall be as no report, or annul it. It leaves the report in its place as part of the scheme or plan provided by statute, and imposes a penalty or punishment upon those who signed it knowing it to be false, and upon no others. Not all, then, who signed the false report are liable therefor, but only those who signed it knowing it to be false. As the statute makes this discrimination, the court cannot ignore it." It is impossible to import into the statute a time or a condition for the purpose of extending or imposing a penalty. The statutory liability provided for by section 252 can only arise in the specific case designated by the statute, to-wit, a failure to file a report in compliance with its provisions. If that be done, then the trustees are not liable, even though the report be totally and wholly false; and the party must seek his remedy therefor under the section which provides a penalty in such case, and pursue the officers who are knowingly guilty of the misrepresentation for which the statute has provided a penalty. This doctrine is well supported by the New York cases, and is a reasonable and safe construction. The demurrer was properly sustained, and the judgment should be affirmed.

HUTCHINSON V. HUTCHINSON.

(Supreme Court of Colorado. May 7, 1891.)

DEED—RECORD—CONVEYANCE BY HUSBAND TO WIFE—PROOF OF DELIVERY.

1. The recording of a deed is not essential to its validity. A deed duly executed and delivered, although unrecorded, can be enforced against a subsequent purchaser for value who buys with actual notice of its existence.

2. In an action between a married woman and a third party, involving title to real estate, she may, under our statute, testify to the delivery of a deed to her by her husband, although such delivery took place during the existence of the marital relation.

Appeal from district court, Lake county.

The record in this case shows that on and prior to March 5, 1884, Asa B. Hutchinson was the owner in fee of a certain lot in the city of Leadville, at which date he executed and delivered a deed for the same to his wife, the plaintiff and appellee herein. After the execution and delivery of this deed, and upon the day of the execution thereof, the plaintiff and her husband left Leadville for the city of Denver; and while in Denver, and on the 6th day of March, 1884, the plaintiff gave to her husband a receipt, which reads as follows: "Denver, Colorado, March 6th, 1884. Received of Asa B. Hutchinson a certain deed made at fifth of March, 1884, in the city of Leadville, Colorado, deed of lot 10, block D, and mortgaged description of lot 11, block D, both of said lots in Stevens & Leiter's subdivision of United States survey No. 271, situated on south side of East Fourth street, between Harrison avenue and Poplar street, in the city of Leadville, Colorado; said deed to be delivered to Jervis Joslin, of Leadville, Colo., for safe-keeping, subject to said Asa B. Hutchinson's order, and to be unrecorded during Asa B. Hutchinson's life. J. C. HUTCHINSON. Witness: E. L. BETTS." That, in pursuance of the terms of said receipt, the plaintiff, on her return from Denver to the city of Leadville, deposited said deed with Joslin & Park, jewelers, in said city, for safe-keeping, and took from said Joslin & Park a receipt therefor. Subsequent thereto, and on the 10th day of June, 1884, said Asa B. Hutchinson executed and delivered a warranty deed for said premises to O. D. Hutchinson, his son by a former marriage, which deed was duly recorded on the 21st of June, 1884. On the 10th day of July, 1884, the plaintiff withdrew the deed first above mentioned from the custody of Joslin & Park, and placed the same upon record. Thereupon this suit was commenced, plaintiff alleging that she was the owner in fee of said premises by virtue of the deed executed and acknowledged by her husband and delivered to her, and charging the conveyance by the same grantor to his son to have been in fraud of her rights, and a cloud upon her title to the property. Trial was had and a decree entered in favor of the plaintiff, to reverse which decree this appeal is brought to this court. The evidence establishes the due execution and delivery of the deed to Mrs. Hutchinson upon the 5th day of March, 1884. It also appears from the evidence that, at the time of the execution and delivery of the deed from her husband, there was a house upon the deeded property, but as to whether this house was erected thereon by the husband or by the wife is not definitely shown. It does appear, however, that the house was held and occupied by Mrs. Hutchinson, and that she put many improvements upon the lot with the understanding and promise on the part of her husband that it should be her property. Upon receiving notice that the deed to appellant had been placed upon record, appellee procured the deed to her, which up to this time had remained in the custody of Joslin & Park, and filed the same for record. Thereupon she brought this suit to remove the cloud upon her title created by the deed to appellant. Judgment for plaintiff.

C. C. Parsons, for appellant. T. A. Green, for appellee.

HAYT, J., (after stating the facts as above.) Under our laws, a husband may convey title to real estate direct to his wife with the same freedom as to a third person. It is not essential that a deed be recorded in order to pass title. By the execution and delivery of the deed to appellee upon March 5th, the title vested immediately in her. The recording of the deed was not essential to its validity. A deed duly executed and delivered, although unrecorded, can be enforced against a subsequent purchaser for value who buys with actual notice of its existence. The subsequent deposit of the deed with Joslin & Park by Mrs. Hutchinson, without consideration, and the written receipt given by her, did not divest her previously-acquired title to the premises. Gen. St. § 215; 5 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 451. Appellant admitted while upon the witness stand that he had actual notice of the contents of the receipt of March 6th, and therefore he must be held to have had ample notice of the title under which Mrs. Hutchinson held the property. In addition to this, she was then in the actual and exclusive possession of the premises, and so remained in possession up to the time of trial. Asa B. Hutchinson, the grantor in both deeds, died prior to the trial. We are unable to ascertain from the record the exact date of his death. We infer from the testimony, however, that it occurred shortly after the execution of the deed to his son, bearing date June 10, 1884. Upon the trial Mrs. Hutchinson was allowed in rebuttal, against objection, to testify in reference to certain transactions with her husband during his life-time in relation to the property; and this, in the opinion of counsel for appellant, raises the most important question appearing upon the record. As to whether the testimony was offered as a part of the main case or in rebuttal is quite immaterial. The conduct of the trial, and the time and manner of the examination of witnesses, is largely a matter within the discretion of the trial court. In this case we cannot say that such discretion was abused. By our modern statutes, the rights and privileges of married women in reference to property have been very much enlarged. She may now, with us, own, buy, sell, and hold property, both real and personal, in her own right, the same as if she were not married. These rights necessarily required a modification of the common-law rule in reference to evidence; and such modification has been made by statute. Mrs. Hutchinson was permitted, against objection, to testify to communications between herself and husband. The testimony objected to was in reference to the delivery of the deed to her by her husband. This being the nature of the evidence, we think it was properly admitted. The testimony of O. D. Hutchinson, the grantee in the second deed, in reference to statements made to him by counsel and others as to the legal effect and purport of the receipt signed by Mrs. Hutchinson, was properly excluded. We discover no substantial error upon the record. The evidence fully justifies the findings of the court below, and the judgment must be affirmed.

ATKINSON v. COLE.

(Supreme Court of Colorado. May 7, 1891.)

LANDLORD AND TENANT—LIABILITY OF TENANT—HOLDING OVER—INCREASE OF RENT.

In case of a tenancy from month to month, the landlord cannot, by notice to vacate, fix the tenant's liability if he holds over, for a greater rent than under the old lease, and without regard to the value of the use, unless the tenant expressly or impliedly assents to the increase.

Error to Arapahoe county court.

Action by landlord to recover $100 rent from tenant for the use of certain premises for the month of September, A. D. 1887, and also for possession of the demised premises. For some time prior to said month of September, Atkinson, plaintiff in error, had occupied the premises under a verbal agreement with defendant in error, Cole, to pay him as rent for the same $25 per month, payable at the end of each month. Atkinson claimed that this agreement was for the period of one year, which time had not yet expired, while Cole denies this, and alleges that the tenancy was only from month to month. In the month of August, 1887, Cole caused the following notice to be served upon Atkinson: "Denver, Colo., October 3d, 1887. Mr. Alex. G. Atkinson: You are hereby required to pay me one hundred dollars due as rent for the premises now occupied by you as my tenant, and known and described as follows, viz., lots 25, 26, 27, and 28, in block 2, Snyder's subdivision, Denver, Colo., in three days after the day of service upon you of this notice, or, in case of your failure to pay said rent, to deliver up to me said premises within said time. In case of your failure to comply with the terms of this notice, I shall proceed to oust you by process of law. Respectfully, G. W. COLE, Landlord." To which notice Atkinson replied, as follows: "Denver, Colo., Aug. 23rd, 1887. George W. Cole—Dear Sir: Your notice of this date to vacate premises by September 1st, known as lots 25, 26, 27, and 28, block 2, Snyder's subdivision to Denver, or you would raise my rent to $100 per month. My contract with you was, I was to have the premises for one year from the time I sold to you, March 1st, at the rate of $25.00 per month, payable at the expiration of each month, and you have received the same as near that date as I could see you, and give you check. I am prepared to live up to my agreement, and expect you to do the same if you count your word any good. Yours, etc., A. G. ATKINSON." The court below found that the tenancy was from month to month only, and rendered judgment for plaintiff for possession, and for $100 rent for one month.

J. P. Brockway, for plaintiff in error.
Perry & Carpenter, for defendant in error.

HAYT, J., (after stating the facts as above.) The conclusion of the trial court that Atkinson's tenancy was from month to month only, is amply supported by the evidence, and cannot be disturbed in this court. The case, therefore, presents but a single question for our consideration, viz., can a landlord, against his tenant's objection, arbitrarily fix by notice the amount of rent which the later must pay when holding over after the expiration of the term of such tenant's lease? The trial court decided the landlord had such right. Its conclusion was probably founded to some extent upon the opinion of the case of Hurd v. Whitsett, 4 Colo. 77, a case decided under a statute which has since been repealed. This statute provided that, if any person held over after notice to quit, and in violation of his lease, he would by such conduct become chargeable with certain additional liabilities. It also declared that the notice shall operate to create and establish, "as a part of the lease or agreement, the terms and conditions specified in said notice." The repeal of this statute is indicative of an intention on the part of the legislature to change the rule therein provided for, whereby a landlord was permitted arbitrarily to fix the liability of a tenant holding over after notice. But, aside from any inference that is to be drawn from this repeal, upon principle and authority, it is now clearly established that, where the right to terminate the tenancy is in the landlord, and an increase of rent is demanded, the tenant will not be liable for such increase, unless it is shown that he expressly or impliedly assented to the same. A tenant thus holding over is regarded merely as a tenant at will, and only liable for an increase of rent when the value of the use and occupation of the premises is shown to exceed the rate fixed by the lease. Galloway v. Kerby, 9 Ill. App. 501; Meaher v. Pomeroy, 49 Ala. 146; Gallagher v. Himmelberger, 57 Ind. 63. Applying the foregoing rule to this case, and it follows that, although the trial court found that the tenancy was only from month to month, and subject to termination by the landlord accordingly, this will not permit the landlord to fix the tenant's liability for rent at a greater price than under the previous lease against said tenant's protest, and without reference to the value of the use, as has been attempted in this case. The rule announced by the county court, and contended for here by counsel for defendant in error, is not only contrary to the general current of authority, but is so unreasonable and unjust that it ought not to be followed. Its unfairness is well illustrated in this case. The evidence shows that the rent had been fixed by the parties at $25 per month; that a bona fide dispute had arisen between them as to the length of the term, and, although upon the evidence it has been decided that the tenancy was only from month to month, and subject to termination by the landlord accordingly, to allow him to fix the tenant's liability for rent, against such tenant's protest, would be subjecting the latter to a demand entirely disproportionate to anything warranted by his conduct. Had Atkinson remained silent after receiving notice of the attempted increase of rent, then a promise on his part to pay the same might have been implied. He did not do this, however, but promptly communicated his protest against any such change. An examination of the cases cited to support the conclusion of the trial court shows that in nearly every instance the tenant's consent to the terms was properly implied from his conduct or language. Under this principle it was held in Dickson v. Moffatt, 5 Colo. 114, that consent would be implied against one going into possession, after ascertaining the amount of rent demanded, although he at the time expressed his dissent therefrom. But this case can have no application, under the facts here presented. The judgment of the county court will be set aside, and a new trial ordered. Reversed.

RESULTING TRUST—TITLE IN ANOTHER'S NAME—EVIDENCE.

Plaintiff and her two daughters, E. and H., bought a home, plaintiff paying the purchase money, except small contributions from the daughters' earnings. The title was taken in the name of E., who, against her will, as she testified, conveyed one-half to H., and the other half to plaintiff. Plaintiff and E. testified that the purchase was by and for plaintiff only; that E. negotiated for the purchase and took the title in her name because plaintiff could not speak nor write English; and that she, with her family, occupied the property as a residence for eight years, during which she paid the taxes and insurance. H. testified that she and E. bought the property, and was somewhat corroborated, and she introduced a lease to plaintiff, but both E. and plaintiff denied that they knew of or authorized it. Held, that a decree that H. held the title to half the property under a resulting trust for plaintiff was proper.

Appeal from district court, Arapahoe county.

HELM, C. J. This suit was brought upon the theory of a resulting trust for an undivided half interest in certain real property within the city of Denver. Plaintiff, in 1880, was a widow with seven children, the eldest, Ellen, being 16, and the youngest 2 years of age. Plaintiff was poor, and Ellen and her next younger sister, Hilda, who was about 14, and who is the defendant and appellant in the present case, worked out and helped plaintiff to support the family. Plaintiff and the two elder girls decided upon the purchase of the premises plaintiff was then renting and occupying, $750 being the purchase price. They conferred together frequently concerning this purchase before it was agreed upon, and during the time of making the deferred payments. The business was attended to mainly by Ellen, and title was subsequently taken in her name to the entire premises. She afterwards deeded one-half of the property to plaintiff, and the other half to Hilda, but no consideration was paid her for either of the conveyances. During this entire period, and up to the date of her marriage, Hilda was under age. In the county court, and in the district court, to which the cause was taken by appeal, decrees were rendered in favor of plaintiff, recognizing the trust, and requiring Hilda to convey the moiety in her name to plaintiff. The sole assignment of error now urged in argument is that the decree challenged is not sustained by the evidence. We might, perhaps, decline to review the record before us upon this assignment, because no proper objection was interposed or exception reserved to the entry of the decree. But, under the circumstances, we prefer to rest our decision upon the merits. True it is that, when parol evidence is relied on for the purpose of establishing a resulting trust, the essential fact or facts must be sustained by clear, strong, and convincing proofs. It should be borne in mind, however, that the trust asserted in the present case is not claimed to result solely from payment of the purchase money. Plaintiff and Ellen both testify positively and repeatedly that the property was really bought by plaintiff. They say that while Hilda participated with them in the conferences, and took part in bringing about the purchase, the intention of all was to have the ownership ultimately vest in the mother, so that she would be securely provided with a home for herself and the remaining children. According to their explanation, the reason why title was taken in Ellen's name, and why she was so conspicuous in the negotiations, was that plaintiff could not read or write in English, and understood very imperfectly the English language when spoken. Hilda, on the other hand, testifies that she and Ellen bought the property, and in this respect she receives corroboration through the testimony of her husband touching subsequent admissions of plaintiff; also through the testimony of Mr. and Mrs. Gallup, as to incidental declarations of Ellen. But the following circumstances, in addition to those already mentioned, so strongly confirm the position taken by plaintiff and Ellen as to clearly demonstrate Hilda's error, viz.: The cash payment of $50 advanced at the time the contract was made was by plaintiff from her own funds. Plaintiff was at that time in possession of the premises with the five younger children, and continued in the quiet and undisputed occupancy thereof down to the time of trial, about eight years. During this period she paid all expenses, including taxes, insurance, and repairs, and also made certain improvements, such as the digging of a well, etc. For a considerable time plaintiff boarded and lodged Baldwin, the vendor of the property, and did his washing, the income from such board, lodging, and washing, whatever it was, being applied upon the purchase price. Subsequent to the making of the contract, she advanced $128 more of the purchase money, besides additional sums, the exact amount of which cannot be determined from the evidence. It is undoubtedly true that some of the earnings of both Ellen and Hilda were used in discharging the deferred payments, or in liquidation of loans obtained to complete the purchase. But the amount thus contributed is extremely uncertain, and we are fairly warranted in assuming that it was either by way of loan to plaintiff, or voluntary advancements in the nature of gifts. The evidence very strongly points towards the latter theory. Both girls made plaintiff's home their home, and when out of employment, which was seldom, lived with her. They were affectionate daughters, and contributed at times from their meager earnings to the support of the family and education of the other children. It is not entirely clear why Ellen deeded one-half of the property to Hilda; but she (Ellen) testifies that it was not of her own free will, and that she expected Hilda to convey it "over" to her mother. As to the lease giving plaintiff possession of the property for life upon the payment of one dollar per year, we observe—First, Ellen declares under oath that she had no knowledge of its existence, and, if she signed the paper, it was in ignorance of its contents; second, there is nothing in the record showing that plaintiff asked for this lease, or authorized such an arrangement, and she also denies all knowledge thereof. Both of the trial courts saw and heard the witnesses, and were in much better position than we to correctly resolve the conflicts appearing in the evidence. Under all the circumstances, we cannot say that a trust was not established with the requisite clearness and sufficiency. In view of the foregoing conclusion concerning the facts and the law, it becomes unnecessary for us to follow the interesting discussion of counsel on the subject of emancipation from parental control. We leave undetermined the question whether or not, under the circumstances presented by this record, plaintiff would have been entitled to demand and receive the wages earned by Hilda, who was, during the period in question, an unmarried minor under the age of 18 years. The mother having made the purchase herself, merely conducting the transaction through Ellen for convenience, it is a matter of no significance whether she was entitled of right to the earnings of Hilda, or whether Hilda voluntarily contributed, as a gift or loan, money over which her mother had no original control. The decree of the court below is affirmed.

FRYER v. BREEZE et al.

BILL OF PARTICULARS—RECORD ON APPEAL—EVIDENCE OF PARTNERSHIP—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. A bill of particulars is not a part of the record proper. This court cannot take notice that a paper certified in the transcript as a bill of particulars was the bill in controversy at the trial, nor that some other or further bill was not furnished in due time. Such matters cannot be effectually reviewed on error unless they are definitely preserved by bill of exceptions, together with the rulings of the trial court thereon.

2. Correct pleading requires that parties intending to sue as partners should allege the fact of their copartnership in the body of the pleading; but the general rule is that a failure so to do should be taken advantage of, if at all, in apt time, and before final judgment.

3. A mere technical variance between the pleadings and proofs, not noticed at the trial, which does not prejudice the opposite party, will not be considered in the appellate court for the first time as a ground for reversal.

Error to district court, Garfield county.

Defendants in error, plaintiffs below, brought this action, alleging in their complaint that defendant was indebted to them on an account in the sum of $1,000 for services as the attorneys of defendant, rendered at his instance and request and upon his retainer between the 1st day of February, A. D. 1883, and the 1st day of June, A. D. 1884, in prosecuting and defending suits, drawing and preparing instruments in writing, taking depositions, preparing motions and notices and serving the same, and advising defendant in and about his business and at his request, which services so rendered were and are reasonably worth the said sum of $1,000; that defendant has not paid the same, except the sum of $106.80. The defendant answered to the effect that the payment of the sum of $106.80 was payment in full for plaintiffs' services, and that he was not indebted to the plaintiffs, or either of them, in any further sum. The cause was tried by jury. Verdict and judgment were rendered in favor of plaintiffs for the sum of $777.68. The defendant below brings the case to this court by writ of error.

M. B. Carpenter, for plaintiff in error.
H. B. Johnson, for defendants in error.

ELLIOTT, J., (after stating the facts as above.) It is assigned for error that the court erred "in permitting testimony of plaintiff to be given upon any account, as the bill of particulars was not filed within the time required by law, and amounted to nothing as a bill of particulars." A single extract from the bill of exceptions is relied on as the basis for this assignment. One of the plaintiffs being examined as a witness, plaintiffs' counsel, Mr. Bartley, asked him: "What, if any, services did you perform for Mr. Fryer in the month of February, 1883?" Objected to by Mr. Ashton, attorney for defendant, for the reason that they have not complied with the notice served upon them to furnish an itemized statement of the things done, the dates when done, and the cases in which the services were rendered. Mr. Bartley replied: "An itemized statement and an amended statement was served on October 13, 1885. Objection overruled. Exception taken." It is scarcely necessary to say that the question, objection, ruling, and exception thus preserved do not sustain the assignment. The record does not affirmatively show that any bill of particulars had been demanded of plaintiffs in pursuance of section 63 of the Code. But, conceding that such demand was duly made, it does not appear whether plaintiffs failed to furnish any copy of the account at all, or whether defendant intended to question the sufficiency of the one alleged to have been furnished. A bill of particulars is not a part of the record proper. This court cannot take notice that the paper certified in the transcript as a bill of particulars was the bill in controversy between the attorneys at the trial; nor does it appear that some other or further bill of particulars was not furnished in due time before the trial. Such matters cannot be effectually reviewed on error unless they are definitely preserved by bill of exceptions, together with the rulings of the trial court thereon. Cook v. Hughes, 1 Colo. 51; Freas v. Truitt, 2 Colo. 495; Robbins v. Butler, 13 Colo. 496, 22 Pac. Rep. 803; Rutter v. Shumway, 16 Colo. —, ante, 321. It is further assigned for error that "the evidence, verdict, and judgment are given plaintiffs as partners, and there is no allegation of partnership in the complaint." The names of the parties, as specified in the title to this action, are as follows: "John M. Breeze and Lemuel L. Breeze, partners, doing business under firm name of Breeze & Breeze, plaintiffs, vs. James Fryer, defendant." The words, "partners doing business under firm name of Breeze & Breeze," in this title, are, in legal effect, regarded as descriptio personarum, and not as indicating that plaintiffs sue as partners. 2 Walt, Pr. 373. Strictly speaking, therefore, the parties did not sue as copartners, but as joint plaintiffs. The summons followed the complaint as to the names and capacity in which plaintiffs sued. No question was raised by demurrer or answer as to such names or capacity. The verdict and judgment correspond to the complaint and summons indicating the plaintiffs as joint plaintiffs and not as copartners. So there was not even a technical variance in the record proper. Correct pleading undoubtedly requires that parties intending to sue as partners should allege the fact of their copartnership in the body of the pleading; but the general rule is that a failure so to do should be taken advantage of, if at all, in apt time and before final judgment. No objection to the supposed defect in this case was interposed in the court below at any stage of the proceeding; and no attempt is now made to show that defendant has been, or can in any way be, prejudiced by the omission of such averment. The complaint is unquestionably sufficient in substance. The objection now sought to be raised by the assignment of error is at most a mere technical variance between the pleadings and proofs, not noticed at the trial. Under the circumstances, it would be manifestly unjust, and contrary to established practice, to allow such question to be raised in this court for the first time. If the objection had been made at the trial, the plaintiffs would have been entitled to amend the complaint to conform to the proofs. 3 Chit. Pr. 480, 923; Code Civil Proc. § 78; Bliss, Code Pl. § 435 et seq.; Wall v. Toomey, 52 Conn. 38. This disposes of the assignments of error so far as the same have been presented by counsel for plaintiff in error in their brief and argument. It is not incumbent upon the court to go further. The judgment of the district court is affirmed.

HOCHMARK V. RICHLER.

(Supreme Court of Colorado. May 7, 1891.)

USURY — COMPOUND INTEREST — ALTERATION OF NOTE.

1. A note of $177 stipulated that interest should be paid thereon after maturity at the rate of 3 per cent. a month. It was shown that the face of the note was made by adding to $150, the actual loan, $27, which was equal to the interest at 3 per cent. a month from the date of the note to its maturity. Held that, as to this, $27, the interest after maturity was compound interest, contracted for in advance, and to that extent no recovery can be had, it being usurious.

2. Where one of the makers of a note signed only as accommodation maker, without knowledge that appellant was to sign it afterwards, appellant's subsequent signing is not such an alteration as will avoid the note as to all the makers, including himself, when he received part of the loan.

Appeal from Lake county court.

This action was begun before a justice of the peace upon a promissory note in favor of appellee, signed by appellant and two other parties. The note was for $177, and provided for the payment of interest after maturity at the rate of 3 per cent. per month. Judgment being rendered in favor of plaintiff, an appeal was taken to the county court. There the cause was retried, and a recovery by plaintiff again sustained. The remaining facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Geo. Goldthwaite, for appellant. Alvin Marsh, for appellee.

HELM, C. J. The note sued on in this action is not illegal upon its face. Interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per month after maturity is provided for, but by statute in this state parties may contract for a larger rate of interest than that specified to govern in the absence of contract. Gen. St. § 1708; Buckingham v. Orr, 6 Colo. 587, and cases cited. While, however, the contract was, upon its face, unobjectionable, it clearly appears by the evidence that the amount specified ($177) consisted of two items, viz., $150, the actual loan, and $27, interest,—the interest on this loan at 8 per cent. per month from the date of the note to its maturity; and, though no further interest was payable until the debt became due, yet after that date interest was to be paid upon the $27 interest, which had been made part of the principal. The contract did, therefore, in effect, provide for compound interest, (2 Pars. Cont., 6th Ed., 150 et seq.) and to this extent it was illegal, for with us compound interest is, in general, not recoverable, (Manufacturing Co. v. McAllister, 6 Colo. 261; Fillmore v. Reithman, Id. 121; Beckwith v. Beckwith, 11 Colo. 568, 19 Pac. Rep. 510.) There was in the present case no such gross delinquency or intentional misconduct on the part of appellant as justified an application of the exception to the foregoing rule mentioned in Fillmore v. Reithman, supra, and in Sedg. Dam. (6th Ed.) 475. A disposition undoubtedly appears in some of the modern decisions and text-books to reject the doctrine that compound interest contracted for in advance is per se unlawful. 3 Pars. Cont. 153. But, the question being stare decisis in this state, and there being much to commend the doctrine, it will not now be disturbed. We do not intimate that the arrangement would have been illegal had the promise of appellant to pay compound interest been made after instead of before the interest to be compounded had accrued. Sedg. Dam. 473, 474; 3 Pars. Cont. 151, 152. The fact that compound interest was thus provided for did not, however, as counsel contends, render the entire contract usurious and void. Courts, upon grounds of public policy, simply decline to enforce payment of the interest upon interest. 3 Pars. Cont. 152. An indorsement appeared on the back of the note, showing a payment by Gaw, one of the makers, of $150, and a release from further liability on his part. Appellant insists that this release, without his knowledge and consent, of one of his co-makers, operated as a release of himself and his remaining co-maker. The instrument in suit is both joint and several; but the common-law rule invoked has been held applicable in this state to joint and several as well as to joint promissory notes. Heckman v. Manning, 4 Colo. 543; Nicholson v. Revill, 4 Adol. & E. 675; Benjamin v. McConnel, 4 Gilman, 536; Bank v. Doolittle, 14 Pick. 123; Rowley v. Stoddard, 7 Johns. 207; Tuckerman v. Newhall, 17 Mass. 580. It is shown by the proofs that the indorsement of the $150 credit was made by Gaw himself over appellee's signature while the note was held by one of appellee's creditors as collateral security, appellee not being present or consenting at the time. Gaw testifies that appellee previously promised, upon payment of the sum mentioned, not to trouble him further in connection with the note, and there is other testimony tending to corroborate him in this regard; but appellee crossed out the release before bringing suit. The record is exceedingly meager, and does not purport to contain all the evidence. Whether Gaw was actually released from further liability is a question of fact, and without all the evidence before us we cannot consider the court's finding thereon. For the above reason, and for the additional reason that no exception was saved to the judgment, we are unable to say whether or not the proofs sustain the remaining conclusions of fact that must have been reached by the county court in rendering judgment. But were the statement of counsel for appellant as to what the evidence showed accepted, his legal deduction predicated thereon would not follow. He says that Gaw signed the note solely as an accommodation maker for his co-obligor, Gutt, and did not know that appellant was either to sign it or to receive part of the loan. This subsequent signing of the note by appellant as a co-maker constituted such an alteration, it is argued, as rendered it void as to all the defendants, including appellant. We must decline to recognize the applicability of the common law principle relied on, for, in the first place, appellant had been active in obtaining the signatures of his co-makers, and signed his own name immediately after Gaw had attached his signature. He received all and retained part of the money borrowed, and it was not paid to him till after he signed. There is, therefore, strong ground for the position that the note did not become a perfect contract till after appellant's signature was appended. But, secondly, such alterations at most operate only to invalidate the instrument as to non-consenting parties, and no such party is here complaining. Byles, Bills, (6th Ed.) 481, 482, and note 2; Wallace v. Jewell, 21 Ohio St. 163; Bower v. Briggs, 20 Ind. 139. They do not release from liability the additional co-maker, who has himself been in no way deceived or injured; a fortiori must this be true where, as in the present case, such co-maker enjoys part of the consideration. The remaining objections presented by counsel for appellant have been considered, but we do not deem them of sufficient importance to warrant discussion at length. The alleged mutilation of the note is explained. The asserted payment of $45 by appellant upon this particular note is contradicted. The trial court accepted the explanation, and resolved the conflicts in testimony favorably to appellee. We cannot discredit his conclusions in these particulars. The court, as we have seen, erred in allowing interest upon the $27 interest; but we do not deem it necessary on this account to order a new trial. The judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded with directions that judgment be re-entered nunc pro tunc as of February 13, A. D. 1888, omitting the compound interest in question.

CITY OF DURANGO V. REINSBERG.

PROSECUTIONS UNDER ORDINANCE — COMPLAINT — VALIDITY OF ORDINANCE.

1. A prosecution under a municipal ordinance for an offense not punishable by general statute is not a criminal proceeding, but a civil action, and a judgment in such action against the municipality may be reviewed on error.

2. A complaint for the violation of a municipal ordinance, which states the number of the section and title of the ordinance violated, together with the date of its passage, is sufficient under the statute, the proceeding not being a criminal prosecution.

3. A municipal corporation can exercise only such powers as are granted to it by its charter or by the general law of the state, either in express words or by necessary or reasonable implication, or such as are incidental to the powers expressly granted, or such as are essential to the objects and purposes of the corporation. A municipal corporation, under a general grant of authority, cannot adopt ordinances which infringe the spirit or are repugnant to the policy of the state, as declared in its legislation.

Error to La Plata county court.

This action was originally commenced before the police magistrate of the city of Durango. The complaint upon which the action was based contains the following charge: "That one E. Reinsberg on or about the 22d day of June, 1890, said day being then and there a Sabbath day, at, to-wit, the said city of Durango, county of La Plata, state of Colorado, then and there being, did then and there violate section number one of ordinance number 229 of the city of Durango, being an ordinance entitled 'An ordinance requiring the observance of the Sabbath,' by keeping open his place of business on the said Sabbath day, and the display and sale of goods after nine o'clock of said day; the above ordinance having been adopted and approved May 20th, 1890." The ordinance under which the prosecution was instituted forbids in general terms all labor and business on Sunday except certain specified kinds. Upon appeal to the county court on defendant's motion the complaint was quashed, and the defendant was discharged, "on the ground," as set forth in the record, "that the city council had no authority to pass Ordinance No. 229 so far as relates to the charge against the defendant herein." The city brings the case to this court by writ of error.

Wm. E. Beck and O. S. Galbreath, for plaintiff in error. Baker & McHolland, for defendant in error.

ELLIOTT, J., (after stating the facts as above.) It has been expressly held by this court that a prosecution under a municipal ordinance for an offense not punishable by general statute is not a criminal proceeding, but a civil action, and that a judgment in such an action against the municipality may be reviewed by this court upon writ of error. City of Greeley v. Hamman, 12 Colo. 94, 20 Pac. Rep. 1. Neither the complaint nor any part of the record in this case discloses the kind of business which the defendant was accused of carrying on upon the Sabbath day. The complaint charges in substance that he kept his place of business open and displayed and sold his goods on a certain Sabbath day in the city of Durango, contrary to the provisions of a certain ordinance, stating the section, number, and title of said ordinance, together with the date of its passage. The brief and argument of counsel for plaintiff in error are devoted to the question of the validity of the ordinance; but our decision must be controlled by a statutory provision not noticed by counsel in this court, and, so far as we can discover from the record, not presented to the consideration of the county court. The statute relates to the matter of pleading in cases of this kind. Under ordinary rules of pleading the complaint might have been quashed for insufficiency, as not stating a cause of action; that is, for not specifying a kind of business against the carrying on of which upon Sunday the sanction of the ordinance might properly be invoked. But section 114 of the towns and cities act (chapter 109, Gen. St. 1833) provides as follows: "In all suits brought for the recovery of any fines or penalties for violation of any ordinance it shall be sufficient to state in the complaint or affidavit the number of the section and title of the ordinance violated, together with the date of its passage, without stating said section or ordinance in full or the substance thereof." It must be remembered that this is a civil proceeding, originally instituted in a court not of record; hence the statute is not obnoxious to the constitutional requirement that the accused in criminal prosecutions shall have the right to demand the nature and cause of the accusation. Const. art. 2, § 16. Hence, giving effect to the statutory provision, the complaint must be held sufficient on its face, both in form and substance. The defendant, therefore, should not have been discharged upon motion. The kind of business which he was accused of carrying on upon Sunday should have been ascertained by evidence or otherwise as a matter of fact. If found guilty of violating the ordinance by the commission of some act which the city council had the power thus to prohibit, he should have been fined as the ordinance requires; otherwise he should have been discharged. The complaint having been quashed on the ground that the city council had no authority to pass the ordinance, "so far as relates to the charge against the defendant," we are asked to review this conclusion of the lower court. This cannot well be done, since the specific charge against the defendant does not appear in the record. An ordinance, like a statute, may be valid in part and void in part. Cooley, Const. Lim. 177, 178. For example, it must be conceded that such business as may by municipal authority be prohibited altogether may by such authority be prohibited on Sunday, on the ground that the greater includes the less. (Gen. St. c. 109, § 14.) even though there may be other kinds of business with which town and city governments are not intrusted with any supervision or control. A municipal corporation can exercise only such powers as are granted to it by its charter or by the general law of the state, either in express words or by necessary or reasonable implication, or such as are incidental to the powers expressly granted, or such as are essential to the objects and purposes of the corporation. Besides, there are certain well-recognized principles by which the powers of municipal corporations to pass ordinances in the nature of legislative enactments are limited or qualified. For example, municipal ordinances must not be "repugnant to the constitution and general laws of the state," nor can a municipal corporation, "under a general grant of authority, adopt by-laws (ordinances) which infringe the spirit or are repugnant to the policy of the state as declared in its legislation." 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. (3d Ed.) §§ 89, 316, 329. The ordinance in question may be tested by these and other legal principles for the purpose of determining its validity as to "the charge against the defendant" when the specific act of which defendant is accused shall become judicially known. But it is not incumbent upon this court to anticipate, discuss, or settle supposed legal controversies upon writs of error. We cannot undertake to determine the validity of the ordinance in question, "so far as relates to the charge against the defendant," until we are properly informed of the specific nature of such charge. The complaint having been prepared in statutory form, it was error to quash it upon motion before the particular act of which defendant was accused was ascertained. The judgment of the county court is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

PARTNERSHIP—DISSOLUTION—NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS.

1. The dissolution of a partnership will not affect the rights of holders of negotiable paper executed thereafter in the firm name by one of the partners, unless such holders had notice of the dissolution.

2. Nor can the defense be made to negotiable paper, executed in the firm name by one of the partners, that he had no authority to do so, unless it be shown that the holder had notice of his want of authority.

Commissioners' decision. Appeal from district court, Arapahoe county.

This was a suit in equity, brought by appellees against appellants, to set aside, declare void, and cancel two promissory notes and a trust-deed upon certain lands in the state of Kansas, executed by appellees to secure the payment of the notes. For many years prior to the summer of 1885 one William M. Roworth was a merchant doing an extensive business in Central City in this state. About the year 1870, Roworth and appellee John McCaskill formed a partnership for the purpose of breeding, raising, and dealing in cattle. By the terms of the contract of partnership McCaskill, who had very limited means, was to take charge of and give his attention to the business for a certain interest, and Roworth was to furnish the necessary money. The business was prosecuted for some years in Colorado under the firm name of Roworth & McCaskill, was then transferred to Chase county in the state of Kansas, where the business was prosecuted under the same name, and was there continued until some date not definitely fixed, but prior to June, 1885, when the partnership was dissolved, and the business continued in the name of John McCaskill. Roworth was at all times a borrower of money in the conduct of his business; for years had done business with and been a borrower from the appellants the Rocky Mountain National Bank of Central City and the Colorado National Bank of Denver, by both of which he was usually carried for quite large sums; his notes at each of said banks being renewed from time to time, and the indebtedness continued almost indefinitely. On the 28th day of July, 1885, Roworth was indebted to the Rocky Mountain National Bank on a note of another person, the payment of which he had guaranteed, and which he had discounted, in the sum of about $4,500, and for overdrafts in about $1,500, in settlement of which he made the following note: "$6,000. Central City, Colo., July 28, 1885. On demand, after date, we promise to pay to the order of Wm. M. Roworth, six thousand dollars at the Rocky Mountain National Bank, with interest at one per cent. a month from date until paid. ROWORTH & McCASKILL. Value received. No. 7,675." And on the back of said note is the following indorsement: "For and in consideration of the sum of ten cents, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, I hereby guaranty the payment of the within note, waiving demand and notice of non-payment and protest; and agree to pay all costs and expenses paid or incurred in collecting the same. Wm. M. ROWORTH." On June 30, 1885, Roworth was indebted to the Colorado National Bank of Denver in the sum of $5,000, which had been of long standing, and frequently renewed, each time previously by his individual note, and on that date he gave to the bank the following note, and took up his own: "$5,000. Denver, Colorado, June 30th, 1885. One day after date we promise to pay to the order of the Colorado National Bank of Denver five thousand dollars at the Colorado National Bank of Denver, with interest at one per cent. per month from date until paid. ROWORTH & McCASKILL. Wm. M. ROWORTH. Value received. No. 42,626." Shortly after this Roworth failed. On the 31st day of August, 1885, Roworth, T. H. Potter, of the Rocky Mountain National Bank, and the attorney of the Colorado National Bank were at the place of residence of appellees in Kansas, to obtain from McCaskill security for the payment of the two notes due, respectively, to the two banks. Roworth had an interview with McCaskill, informed him of the existence of the notes, stated that he was embarrassed, needed help, and urged McCaskill to secure the two notes, and assist him in that way. McCaskill consented, met the agents of the banks, executed his notes, payable one year after date, for the sums respectively due on the former notes the note for the sum due the Rocky Mountain National Bank being made payable to Potter, and the sum due the Colorado National Bank made payable to Kountze, its president; both notes being secured by trust-deed on the lands of appellees in Kansas, William B. Berger being named as trustee; and the former notes were canceled. At the same time Roworth executed and delivered to McCaskill his note for $12,000, to cover the indebtedness assumed and secured by McCaskill. It is alleged in the complaint that before the notes of June 30th and July 28th were made the firm of Roworth & McCaskill had been dissolved; that Roworth never had authority to make notes in the name of the firm; that the indebtedness for which the notes were given was the individual indebtedness of Roworth; and that such fact was known to the defendants at the time, and that Roworth executed the notes of the firm at their solicitation and instance, they having full knowledge that the indebtedness was not that of the partnership. Also that the two notes of McCaskill and the trust-deed were obtained by fraud and by misrepresentation of Roworth, Potter, and the attorney, Bartels, in regard to the financial condition of Roworth, they representing that Roworth's embarrassment was only temporary; that he had ample property to satisfy his debts, and only needed time, when in fact Roworth was hopelessly insolvent. Praying that the notes and trust-deed be declared void, and that they be canceled and delivered up. A very voluminous answer was filed, traversing every important allegation of the complaint. In an amendment to the answer defendants, by what may be treated as a cross-complaint, assert the validity of the two notes of June 30th and July 28th to the respective banks as the proper debts of the firm, and pray judgment against McCaskill for the amount of the notes and interest. Upon the trial a jury was impaneled, to which several issues of fact were submitted by a series of questions, 12 in number, in regard to the manner in which the notes and trust-deed were obtained from appellees, all of which were answered adversely to the defendants, (appellants,) and sustaining the allegations in the complaint that they were obtained by fraud, misrepresentation, and concealment of important facts; but no issues of fact were submitted to the jury in regard to the validity of the former notes executed with the firm name by Roworth. Much oral testimony was given, some of it quite contradictory and irreconcilable. The court found in favor of appellees upon all the issues, and decreed that the McCaskill notes be canceled and delivered up, that the trustee execute and deliver a deed of release freeing the land from the lien created by the trust-deed, holding the former notes invalid as against McCaskill, and refusing the prayer in the cross-complaint for a judgment against him upon them. From such decree, and the overruling of a motion for a new trial, an appeal was taken to this court.

Lucius P. Marsh and Bartels & Blood, for appellants. L. C. Rockwell and D. McCaskill, for appellees.

REED, C., (after stating the facts as above.) The established practice of this court precludes the review of questions determined in the lower court, unless exceptions were saved to the judgment, and error duly assigned. The only question submitted by the single assignment in this case for the determination of the court is the one of the validity of the notes as partnership paper at the time of their execution and delivery. The dissolution of the partnership before the making of the notes seems to have been unquestioned. Whether the officers of either bank knew of the dissolution of the partnership is left in doubt. It is not conclusively or satisfactorily shown that they had such knowledge. The dissolution of the firm could in no way affect appellants unless it were shown that they had knowledge of it. Regular customers and dealers with a firm are required to have special notice of the dissolution. Parties who, like appellants, only take for discount the paper of the firm, are not required to have special notice, but there must be a reasonable or general notice, sufficient to warn and notify the public, by publication of a notice of dissolution, or in some other public manner. 1 Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 369*b*; Lovejoy v. Spafford, 93 U. S. 439; Bank v. McClesney, 20 N. Y. 240. It does not appear from the evidence that any notice whatever was given of the dissolution, or that the fact was known to any one but the former members of the firm. It was contended by appellees that Roworth had no authority to bind the partnership in the making of promissory notes. This contention was not established by the proof. If his authority in this regard was limited by a special contract between himself and McCaskill, nevertheless, as to third parties, such a contract would have been a nullity, unless their knowledge of the fact was shown. The authority of a partner to bind the firm within the scope of its business is implied, and grows out of the fact that it is a firm, and each member is a general agent for the other copartners. 1 Daniel, Neg. Inst. §§ 355, 356; Greenslade v. Dower, 7 Barn. & C. 635; Swan v. Steele, 7 East, 210. There is this distinction to be made: A contract made between partners, that certain members of the firm only could bind the firm, might be valid as between themselves, and might make a debt which purported to be a firm debt an individual debt in the adjustment of the partnership affairs, while such debt would be a firm debt in the hands of a third party who had no knowledge of the want of authority of the partner executing the paper. Another well-settled rule of law is that without actual knowledge of the want of authority of a partner to make negotiable paper in the name of the firm, where paper properly executed in the name of the firm is discounted, the lender is not required to inquire into the intentions, or to see that the money is properly applied to firm uses; but if the lender knows that the paper is not made for the legitimate business of the firm, or knows that the money is obtained for the purpose of discharging an individual debt, the paper would be invalid in his hands as against the firm. The burden of proving that the lender was aware of the wrongful use of the firm name and cognizant of the fraud is upon the party asserting the irregularity. 1 Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 357; Hayward v. French, 12 Gray, 453; Sedgwick v. Lewis, 70 Pa. St. 221. The testimony is very conflicting in regard to the knowledge of appellants at the time of the execution of the respective notes that they were not being used for the purposes of the firm, but for the individual benefit of Roworth; but sufficient appears in evidence in regard to what was said and done at the time, taken in connection with the established fact that the notes were substituted for the individual notes of Roworth, that had been frequently renewed before that time for indebtedness that was not created in the name of the firm, but in his individual name, to warrant the court in finding that the respective parties had the necessary knowledge that the paper was not being used in the legitimate business of the firm. Although there was much testimony opposed to this view, there was sufficient in its favor to warrant this court in refusing to disturb the finding; and, as before stated, this court, by reason of the absence of assignments of error, being precluded from examining the question of subsequent ratification and adoption of the notes by McCaskill, we recommend that the decree be affirmed.

RICHMOND, C., concurs. BISSELL, C., concurs in result.

DOUGHERTY v. SEYMOUR.

LEASE OF BAWDY-HOUSES — RIGHT TO RECOVER RENT.

No rent can be recovered under a written lease, where it is shown by extrinsic evidence that the premises were let to be used as a bawdy-house, and were used for that purpose.

Error to superior court of Denver.

Action to recover rent alleged to be due upon a written lease. Defense that the demised premises were leased to be used as a bawdy-house, and that they were so used with the knowledge and consent of the landlord. Judgment for defendant.

Wm. C. Ghost, for plaintiff in error. Coe & Freeman, for defendant in error.

PER CURIAM. At common law, the keeping of a house of prostitution is an indictable offense. Such places are regarded with so much disfavor that not only the keeper of the house, but also a landlord, knowingly leasing the same for the purposes of bawdry, is held to be guilty of a criminal offense when the house is actually put to such immoral use. 2 Whart. Crim. Law, (8th Ed.) § 1459; 1 Bish. Crim. Law, (7th Ed.) § 500; Com. v. Harrington, 3 Pick. 26. These salutary rules have received the almost universal sanction of the courts wherever the common law has been administered. Colorado, at an early date, following the lead of many of the older states, adopted the common law of England, so far as the same might be found applicable and of a general nature. Gen. St. 1883, § 197. The keeping of a bawdy-house tends directly to debauch the public morals. It is against public policy and unlawful, both at common law and under our statute. Id. § 839. It is said, however, that as the written lease upon which this action is founded is silent as to the purposes for which the house was to be used, it is a valid contract, and can be enforced, notwithstanding the use to which it was known that the house would be put. The contract is prima facie good, but extrinsic evidence shows it to have been tainted with moral turpitude, which overthrows its prima facie appearance, and exposes its baseness and illegality. As to whether or not the house was let to be used as a bawdy-house, it is true the evidence is conflicting. It was, however, the peculiar province of the trial judge to determine upon which side lay the greater weight. This court is not at liberty, under the circumstances, to substitute its judgment upon the mere weight of evidence for that of the trial court, with the superior advantages possessed by the latter by reason of the living witnesses appearing before it. Accepting the finding as correct, and we have a case in which both parties to the lease are shown to have entered into the same with the understanding that the leased premises were to be used for the purpose of prostitution. Such contracts, being contra bonos mores, cannot be enforced. Ralston v. Boady, 20 Ga. 449; Bish. Cont. § 566; 2 Chit. Cont. p. 981; Story, Conf. Laws, § 258; Dyett v. Pendleton, 8 Cow. 737; Lightfoot v. Tenant, 1 Bos. & P. 556; Thomas v. City of Richmond, 12 Wall. 349; Forsythe v. State, 6 Ohio, 20. The judgment of the district court is right, and must be affirmed.

LANDLORD AND TENANT—DENIAL OF LANDLORD'S TITLE.

Though the tenant is estopped to deny the landlord's title without surrendering possession of the leased premises, in an action for rent for occupancy under an agreement continuing the terms of an expired lease, where the tenant denies any such agreement, it is proper for the court to receive evidence of title in a third person, leaving its admissibility to be determined by its conclusion as to the existence of the alleged agreement.

Commissioners' decision. Appeal from district court, El Paso county.

Mr. L. B. France, for appellant.

BISSELL, C. In 1886 Mrs. Innman brought this suit against Jesse Knowles to recover $250,—$125 as rent due for the last six months of the term of a lease for three years upon certain property in Douglas county, and $125 as rent for the use and occupation of the property for the half year following the expiration of the term named in the instrument,—alleging a continuing occupancy by Knowles under an arrangement which would extend the conditions and general provisions of the lease to the new term. Sifted of all extraneous matter, the substantial defenses interposed to the recovery were two: First, a payment under garnishment proceedings by Knowles of a claim which had been established against the lessor; second, the expiration of the lease, the non-occupancy, under its terms and conditions, subsequent to the alleged surrender, and title in a third party. It is true that the defendant interposed a plea resembling that of non est factum at the common law, but upon demurrer this was very properly held bad, because, under our statute, it is incompetent for a party sued upon a written contract set out in the complaint to deny that it is his deed, unless he verifies his plea. It is plain that the defense of title in a third person was only permissible upon the hypothesis that the term had ended, that possession had been surrendered, and that Knowles was no longer a tenant of Mrs. Innman. The rule is too well settled and too familiar, to require either argument or citation of authority, that the tenant is estopped to question the title of the one from whom he leases and receives possession, and that a surrender must precede the defense of an outstanding title in any third person. Upon this hypothesis the court may have well refused to either consider or attach any importance whatever to the testimony offered concerning the title of James Innman. The defendant in his denials contested his occupation subsequent to the expiration of the term named in the original instrument under an agreement which embraced a continuing occupancy according to the terms of the original lease. Under this state of the pleadings it was entirely proper for the court to receive the testimony, leaving its admissibility or its value to be estimated and determined by the conclusion at which the court might arrive upon the proof concerning the agreement for the continued occupancy. It is evident from the judgment rendered that the court found as a matter of fact that there was such an agreement between the parties, and that Knowles, during the subsequent year, occupied the premises upon a convention which gave him the right to the use of the property for the ensuing year upon the terms and conditions named in the original lease. This must be true, because the other defense of the payment of a judgment under garnishment process seems to have been abundantly proved, and must have been adjudged by the court a sufficient defense as to part of the claim sued on. While there are no findings of fact by the court in the record upon which this conclusion can be predicated, yet as it is apparent that the court must have rendered its decision upon this basis, which is well sustained by the testimony, the presumption that it so decided will be so far indulged in as to uphold the judgment. The case was tried by the court without the intervention of a jury. The opinion of this court as to mere preponderance of testimony is not a proper basis for reversal. It is only in those cases where the finding and judgment are clearly against the testimony, and evince gross error on the part of the trial court, that the judgment will be reversed upon that ground. As the testimony stands in print, without an opportunity to hear and see the witnesses, it is barely possible that a different conclusion might be reached; but the judgment is amply sustained by competent testimony. Other matters are discussed in counsel's brief, but they are not deemed of sufficient importance to necessitate a discussion. They are not errors which would operate to reverse the judgment, whatever might be the conclusion at which the court might arrive concerning them. The judgment should be affirmed.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—BILLS—OPINIONS OF SUPREME COURT.

Where the promoters of a bill that has been presented to the supreme court for its opinion concede that in some important particulars it is unconstitutional, the court will not discuss its terms at length, as it is not the province of the court to indicate whether or not a constitutional measure might be prepared to embody the leading purpose of such bill.

A copy of house bill No. 10, "In relation to the weighing of coal at mines," was submitted to the court, requesting an opinion whether said bill, if enacted as a law, would operate to deprive persons affected thereby of their property without due process of law or without just compensation; and whether said bill, if passed by the legislature, could be sustained as a valid police regulation. The text of the bill is as follows: "House bill No. 10. By Mr. Bowman. A bill for an act in relation to the weighing of coal at mines. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the state of Colorado: Section 1. That hereafter all coal mined in this state by any corporation, company, or individual, whether as lessee or owner, shall be weighed in the box in which it is originally loaded, credited to the employe sending the same to the surface, and accounted for at the legal rate of weights as fixed by the laws of Colorado. Each and every violation of this section shall subject the offender to a fine of not less than fifty dollars nor more than two hundred dollars, to be paid into the treasury of the county in which said mine is situated, to be collected as other fines are collected. Sec. 2. The weighman employed at any mine shall subscribe an oath or affirmation before a justice of the peace, or other officer authorized to administer oaths, to do justice between employer and employe, and weigh the output of coal from the mines, as herein provided. The miners employed by or engaged in working for any mine-owner, operator, or lessee of any mine in this state shall have the privilege, if they desire, of employing at their own expense a check-weighman, who shall have like rights, powers, and privileges in the weighing of coal as the regular weighman, and be subject to the same oath and penalties as the regular weighman. Said oath or affirmation shall be kept conspicuously posted in the weigh-office; and any weigher of coal or person so employed, who shall knowingly violate any of the provisions of this article, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction, shall be punished by a fine of not less than twenty-five nor more than one hundred dollars for each offense, or by imprisonment in the county jail for a period not to exceed thirty days, or by both such fine and imprisonment; proceedings to be instituted in any court having competent jurisdiction. Sec. 3. Any person having or using any scale or scales for the purpose of weighing the output of coal at mines, so arranged or constructed that fraudulent weighing may be done thereby, or who shall knowingly resort to or employ any means whatsoever by reason of which such coal is not correctly weighed and reported in accordance with the provisions of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction, for each such offense be punished by a fine of not less than two hundred dollars nor more than five hundred dollars, or by imprisonment in the county jail for a period not to exceed sixty days, or by both such fine and imprisonment; proceedings to be instituted in any court of competent jurisdiction. Sec. 4. The manner of weighing, as hereinbefore provided for, shall also apply to the class of workers in mines known as 'loaders,' engaged in mines wherein the mining is done by machinery, whenever the workmen are under contract to load coal by the bushel, ton, or any quantity, the settlement of which is had by weight. Sec. 5. All acts or parts of acts in conflict with this act are hereby repealed."

PER CURIAM. After hearing several arguments amicus curiæ as to the validity of house bill No. 10, we adopt the concession made by the promoters of the measure who appeared before us,—that in one or more important particulars the bill as presented for our consideration must be held unconstitutional. It is unnecessary to discuss its terms at length, as it is not our province to indicate whether or not a constitutional measure might be prepared which would effectuate the leading purposes of the bill. We therefore refrain from expressing any further opinion upon the subject.

SAN DIEGO FLUME Co. v. CHASE. (No. 13, 888.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 25, 1891.)

In bank. On rehearing. For former report, see 25 Pac. Rep. 756.

PER CURIAM. A rehearing of this cause is denied, but so much of the opinion and decision heretofore filed as limits the respondent to the use of two 1½-inch standard pipes is set aside. The contract does not limit respondent to any particular number of standard pipes in conducting his irrigation.

WM. WOLFF & Co. v. CANADIAN PAC. RY. Co. (No. 13,242.)

JUDGMENT BY DEFAULT—APPLICATION TO SET ASIDE—CONDITIONS.

1. On July 19th defendant filed an application to set aside a judgment by default entered against him on July 16th. The hearing was postponed by consent, and on November 23d the motion was stricken from the calendar in the absence of both parties, but on defendant's motion it was restored on January 8th following. On January 12th defendant, discovering that the application was defective, filed a new application, with affidavits and a proposed answer, making the record of the first application part of the moving papers. Held, that the second application was substantially an amendment of the first, and was filed within a reasonable time, within the meaning of Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 473, requiring such an application to be made within a reasonable time, but in no case exceeding six months after the judgment was taken.

2. Such provision does not require the application to be heard within the time limited.

3. The dismissal by the court without prejudice, on defendant's motion, of his application to set aside a judgment by default because of a defect in the application, is not a refusal, in whole or in part, to grant the application, within the meaning of Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 182, providing that if an application to a judge for an order is refused, in whole or in part, no subsequent application for the same order shall be made, etc.

4. Where the court makes an order opening a judgment by default on condition that defendant pay plaintiff a certain attorney's fee, the refusal of plaintiff to accept the same, on the ground that his right of appeal from the order may be affected, does not warrant the court's vacating that part of the order requiring payment of the fee.

5. Where an order opening a judgment by default requires defendant to pay plaintiff a certain attorney's fee, a tender thereof to plaintiff's attorney is sufficient to preserve defendant's rights under the order until its validity is determined, but does not constitute payment unless it is kept good.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN F. FINN, Judge.

Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 473, provides that the court may relieve a party from a judgment taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect, provided that application therefor be made within a reasonable time, but in no case exceeding six months after the judgment was taken. Section 182 provides that "if an application for an order, made to a judge of a court in which an action or proceeding is pending, is refused, in whole or in part, or is granted conditionally, no subsequent application for the same order shall be made to any court commissioner, or any other judge except of a higher court; but nothing in this section applies to motions refused for informality in the papers or proceedings necessary to obtain the order, or to motions refused with liberty to renew the same."

O'Brien, Morrison & Daingerfield, for appellant. Edward S. Salomon and Lindley & Eickhoff, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. The appellant is a California corporation, and, as such, on June 30, 1888, brought an action in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco against the respondent, a foreign corporation, to recover damages for an alleged failure safely to carry and deliver certain goods, the property of appellant, from New York to San Francisco. The summons was served upon Moses M. Stern, who is described in the affidavit of service as the business agent of the defendant. Judgment by default was rendered July 16, 1888. On the following day the defendant's attorney obtained an order staying execution pending a motion to set aside the default. On July 19, 1888, the attorney for defendant gave notice of appearance in the action, and also of a motion to set aside the default and judgment on the grounds of mistake and inadvertence; and upon the following day the papers served upon the plaintiff were filed. The hearing of the motion was postponed from time to time, by consent of both parties; and on November 23, 1888, the motion was stricken from the motion calendar by the court in the absence of both parties, and, on motion of defendant, was restored to the calendar on January 8, 1889. On January 12, 1889, the defendant, discovering that the first application was defective, filed a new application upon additional affidavits, accompanied by a proposed answer to the complaint. This application purported to be a present application to the court "to vacate and set aside the judgment heretofore entered in said action against defendant, to relieve said defendant from the default judgment and other proceedings taken against defendant in said action after the institution thereof, and for such other and further relief as may be proper, upon the ground that such proceedings, said default, and such judgment were made in said action because of the mistake, inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect of said defendant; upon the further ground that such judgment was improvidently rendered; and upon the further ground that said defendant has a good and substantial defense to said action on its merits, and that the granting of said application would be in furtherance of justice." It also contained a notice, by the attorneys for defendant, "that we shall move to have the application aforesaid heard, and said relief applied for granted, at the court-room of said court and department, in the new city hall, in said city and county, on Friday, the 18th day of January, 1889, at 10 o'clock A. M., or as soon thereafter as counsel can be heard. Said motion will be based upon all the papers and proceedings on file or of record in the above-entitled action, and upon the affidavits and the proposed answer of defendant herewith served and filed." Both the original and amended applications were brought to a hearing on January 25, 1889, when plaintiff filed counter-affidavits contradicting some of the facts stated in the affidavits for defendant, and stating additional facts tending to show that the last application might have been made at an earlier date. The defendant then moved to dismiss without prejudice the first application, of which notice had been given on July 19th; and this motion was granted, against the objection of the plaintiff. The court thereupon proceeded to hear the second or amended application, and on January 25, 1889, made an order setting aside the default and judgment on the conditions that the defendant pay to the plaintiff $16.50 costs, and $75 for counsel fees, within 10 days, and further ordering that the proposed answer, filed with the application, stand as the answer of the defendant. On January 29, 1889, the $75 for counsel fees was tendered to plaintiff's attorneys, who refused to receive the money, and at the same time gave, as the reason for refusing, that the right of plaintiff to appeal from the order setting aside the default and judgment might be prejudiced by accepting it. Upon an affidavit showing this tender and refusal, the court, on February 4, 1889, issued an order to plaintiff to show cause why the order of January 25th should not be modified by vacating so much thereof as directs the payment of $75 counsel fees, which order was served February 5, 1889, but the affidavit upon which the order was made was not served with the order. The hearing upon the order to show cause was regularly continued, and finally set for March 8, 1889; when, there being no appearance for the plaintiff, the court modified the order of January 25th by vacating so much thereof as required the payment of $75 attorney's fees. The plaintiff has appealed from both orders, and contends that, inasmuch as the first application was abandoned and dismissed, the second application must stand and be considered as if no earlier application had been made; and that it was not made within a reasonable time, because no motion was made in open court until after the expiration of six months from the date of the judgment; and that the modifying order was erroneous, for the reason that the moving affidavit was not served with the order to show cause, and that the money should have been tendered to plaintiff, and not to plaintiff's attorneys.

1. A view of the whole proceedings as disclosed by the record will show that the second application was substantially an amendment of the first by the addition of affidavits and a proposed answer, and, for the purpose of determining the question of diligence, must be so regarded. The second application expressly refers to and makes "all the papers and proceedings on file or of record" a part of the moving papers. The plaintiff consented to the delay of the hearing of the application as first made. There is nothing to show that the defect in the moving papers as first filed was discovered by the defendant any considerable time prior to the date of the amended application. The discovery was presumably made on the 8th of January, 1889, when the first application was restored to the calendar. The question as to what is "a reasonable time," short of the extreme limit of six months allowed by section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, within which application may be made for relief "from a judgment, order, or other proceeding," etc., must depend upon the circumstances of the particular case, all of which should be considered by the court. Where a delay has been assented to by the other party, or does not appear to have been injurious to his rights, the six-months limitation prescribed by the Code should be considered as the only limit of reasonable time. In the matter of opening defaults, much is confided to the discretion of the trial court. Dougherty v. Bank, 68 Cal. 275, 9 Pac. Rep. 112; Chamberlin v. County of Del Norte, 77 Cal. 151, 19 Pac. Rep. 271. And where the circumstances are such as to lead the court to hesitate, it is better to resolve the doubt in favor of the application, so as to secure a trial and judgment upon the merits. Watson v. Railroad Co., 41 Cal. 17; Cameron v. Carroll, 67 Cal. 500, 8 Pac. Rep. 45; Lodtman v. Schluter, 71 Cal. 94, 16 Pac. Rep. 540. The application having been made within six months after the judgment, and within a reasonable time, the jurisdiction of the court to hear and determine it could not be lost by the expiration of the six months before the hearing. The limitation prescribed by section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure is a limitation of the time within which the application must be made, and not upon the time within which it must be heard or determined. Conklin v. Johnson, 34 Iowa, 266. The dismissal of the first application without prejudice, at the request of defendant's counsel, was not, under the circumstances, a refusal by the court, in whole or in part, to grant the application, in the sense of section 182 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

2. But I think the court erred in vacating that portion of its former order requiring the payment of $75 to plaintiff as a condition of opening the default. Having, in the proper exercise of its discretion, imposed this condition, it should not have been revoked on the showing made, which was that plaintiff's attorneys declined to accept the money for the mere reason that they feared that such acceptance might prejudice the right of plaintiff to appeal from the order opening the default. Under the circumstances, the court might, perhaps, have required the defendant to deposit the money in court to abide the event of the proposed appeal; for plaintiff's attorneys may well have doubted as to the effect of their acceptance of the tender upon their right to appeal. Cogswell v. Colley, 22 Wis. 399; Radway v. Graham, 4 Abb. Pr. 468; Lupton v. Jewett, 19 Abb. Pr. 320. The tender to plaintiff's attorneys, however, was a sufficient performance of the condition to preserve the rights of the defendant under the order opening the default until the question of its validity should be determined. But, in order to constitute the tender a payment, it must be kept good; and the plaintiff is entitled to receive the amount tendered upon the affirmance of the order setting aside the default judgment. I think the order of January 25, 1889, setting aside the judgment by default upon the conditions therein stated, should be affirmed; and that the order of March 8, 1889, vacating so much of the order of January 25th as requires the payment of $75 for counsel fees, should be reversed.

We concur: FOOTR, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order of January 25, 1889, setting aside the judgment by default upon the conditions therein stated, is affirmed; and the order of March 8, 1889, vacating so much of the order of January 25th as requires the payment of $75 for counsel fees, is reversed.

DAVIES v. OCEANIC S. S. CO. (No. 13,933.)

NEGLIGENCE—PLEADING—EVIDENCE.

1. A complaint alleging that defendant negligently left open a hatchway on its vessel, and that plaintiff's intestate was struck and thrown down said hatchway by the negligence of defendant's employe in loading the vessel, states a cause of action.

2. The admission of evidence that said employe would get intoxicated when he came off a trip, though not relevant, as it appeared that at the time he was not intoxicated, is not ground for reversal, as it could not have influenced the verdict.

3. No one except said employe saw deceased at the time of the accident, and he did not do so until deceased was struck by the barrel, which the employe was swinging from the rail to the hatchway, but it appeared that, a short time before, deceased was caulking near the hatchway. Held, that the question of negligence on the part of the employe and deceased was one for the jury.

Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN F. FINN, Judge.

Milton Andros, for appellant. Geo. Lesinsky, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. This is an action by the plaintiff, as administratrix, to recover damages for the death of H. B. Davies. The complaint alleges that said death was caused by the negligence of defendant, its servants and employes. Plaintiff recovered judgment for the sum of $7,000.

1. It is claimed by the appellant that the complaint does not state a cause of action, in that it does not show that the defendant failed in the discharge of any duty it owed to the deceased. It is urged that the negligence with which appellant is charged is the leaving unprotected an open hatchway on its vessel, through which the deceased fell and was killed, and we have been referred to the cases of Dwyer v. Steam-Ship Co., 17 Blatchf. 474,¹ and The Germania, 9 Ben. 356, which hold that so doing is not negligence for which an action will lie. These cases are not in point. It is true the complaint alleges that the hatchway through which deceased fell was negligently left unprotected, but this is only part of an averment, the gist of which is that deceased was lawfully employed on the vessel, and "by and through the carelessness and negligence of said defendant and its servants and employes in and about the said loading, and without any negligence or fault of said H. B. Davies, said H. B. Davies was struck by a barrel of lime, which said defendant, its servants and employees, were engaged in loading into a hatchway near said H. B. Davies, and was precipitated down said hatchway in the said vessel." This, with the other averments, states a cause of action. The defendant did owe to deceased, lawfully on its vessel, the duty of not negligently throwing him down the hatchway.

2. The testimony of the witness Classen, to the effect that the witness Hulgerson would get intoxicated when he "came off a trip," though not relevant to any issue in the case, could not have prejudiced the case of the defendant. It was clear from Classen's evidence that Hulgerson was not intoxicated at the time of the accident, and the admission of the evidence complained of could not have influenced the verdict, and is therefore not a cause for reversing the judgment.

3. The plaintiff offered no evidence tending to show that the witness Luce had made before the trial the statement embodied in the question asked him, and which the witness denied; and therefore the rule laid down in People v. Jacobs, 49 Cal. 384, has no application.

4. It is also urged that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict. No person saw the deceased at the time of the accident except the witness Hulgerson, and he does not seem to have done so until deceased was struck by the barrel of lime. He says: "I did not see him before the barrel struck. He must have come from aft." And this witness further stated that when he first saw him deceased was between him and the hatchway. But there was evidence tending to show that within a very short time before the accident the deceased was engaged in caulking near the hatchway, and it was for the jury to determine his position at the time, from all the circumstances appearing before them; and so it was for them to determine, from conflicting evidence, whether, in the mode in which the lime was being hoisted, the witness Hulgerson could manage and control the barrels while in transit from the railing to the hatchway. Assuming, however, that he could do so, as claimed by appellant, it was still a proper question for the jury whether, in view of all the facts surrounding him, he was not negligent in attempting to convey the barrel to the hatchway without looking to see if it would in its passage strike the deceased. The same may also be said of appellant's contention that deceased was guilty of contributory negligence. It makes no difference whether deceased was knocked into the hatchway while he was engaged in caulking, or whether he was struck while attempting to pass between the railing and hatchway, it would still be a question for the jury to determine whether at the time of the accident the deceased was exercising the degree of caution required of him by his situation. It is certainly a pure question of fact whether the deceased, while engaged in caulking near the hatchway, would have been in any danger, with the exercise of reasonable care upon the part of the person handling the barrel from the railing to the hatchway; and if he would not, with such care, have been in danger, he was not guilty of any contributory negligence in working there. Conroy v. Iron-Works, 62 Mo. 35. And so also it cannot be said as a matter of law that the deceased, in the way the jury may have believed he attempted to pass between the railing and hatchway, would have been in any danger if at that time the person in charge of the barrel on the railing had exercised reasonable care, and looked to see whether he could safely proceed with the loading. The deceased was not guilty of negligence simply because he did not anticipate negligence on the part of the man at the railing in charge of the loading, unless he was in some way chargeable with notice that such person was indifferent or careless. He was only bound to exercise such care as a prudent man in his situation would ordinarily exercise for the protection of his life; and whether he did or not was a question, the decision of which was for the sound and impartial judgment of the jury. There are cases where the state of the evidence is such that the court can declare, as matter of law, that there was no negligence on the part of defendant, or that a plaintiff has been guilty of contributory negligence, but this is not one of them. When the evidence is conflicting, or when reasonable men might differ as to the inferences which ought to be drawn from the undisputed evidence, the question of negligence or contributory negligence is not one of law, but of fact. 1 Shear. & R. Neg. § 54; Belton v. Baxter, 58 N. Y. 411; Hart v. Bridge Co., 80 N. Y. 622; Railroad Co. v. Moore, 24 N. J. Law, 382. While the evidence does not make a very strong case for the plaintiff, we cannot say that the verdict is without evidence to support it. The questions relating to defendant's negligence and plaintiff's contributory negligence were fairly submitted to the jury by instructions to which no exception is taken, and, as there is evidence upon which it can rest, the verdict is conclusive here. Judgment and order affirmed.

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—VENDOR AND VENDEE.

In a suit for specific performance of a parol contract to convey land, followed by part performance, the evidence must show that the acts of part performance were done by complainant, and with defendant's consent, and that they were done in pursuance of the contract, and with a design of carrying it into execution.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Lake county; R. J. HUDSON, Judge. Clitus Barbour, for appellant. R. W. Crump, (James Wheeler, of counsel,) for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action for the specific performance of a parol contract to convey land. Among other facts, the court found: "Defendant verbally sold the land described in the complaint to plaintiff for two hundred dollars, which sum plaintiff then and there paid to defendant. That then and there defendant agreed to execute and deliver to plaintiff a deed thereto, and plaintiff immediately took possession of said land, with the knowledge and consent of defendant, and made valuable improvements thereon." After a careful examination of the evidence in this case we are satisfied that it does not support the foregoing findings. In the case of Blum v. Robertson, 24 Cal. 142, this court said: "It is a rule well settled that a party who claims a right to a conveyance of land under a parol or verbal contract upon the ground of part performance must make out by clear and satisfactory proof the existence of the contract alleged by him; and it is not enough that the acts of part performance proved are evidence of some agreement, but they must be unequivocal and satisfactory evidence of the particular agreement charged in the complaint." The terms of the contract in this case, under any aspect of the evidence, are vague and indefinite in the extreme. The plaintiff himself says that the defendant was to deed him all the land south of the road and fence, and there appears to be some of the tract claimed between the road and fence. It appears this particular tract of land was bought by defendant of Mrs. Reeves, and paid for at the time other tracts were purchased; and whatever promises defendant made to plaintiff as to deeding him this land were made without any consideration whatever, and partook of the nature of a gift without delivery. But, whatever the contract may have been, there is no evidence to support the finding that "defendant sold said land to plaintiff for two hundred dollars, and which sum plaintiff then and there paid to defendant." And again, there is no evidence to support the finding that "the plaintiff immediately took possession of said land with the knowledge and consent of defendant, and made valuable improvements thereon." The fact that he moved some personal property upon the land in the nature of fence-posts and loose lumber, is not a compliance with the rules of courts of equity requiring permanent and valuable improvements; and, according to the testimony of plaintiff himself, the defendant never consented to his possession, or authorized it in any way. Indeed, there is no evidence showing that he had any knowledge of it. Equitable fraud is the basis of this character of action; that is, fraud as a necessary consequence in setting up the statute as a defense, and the vendor thus securing for himself the benefits of the acts of part performance. It follows from this principle that the acts of part performance must be done by the party seeking to enforce the contract; and must be done in pursuance of the contract, and with a design of carrying the same into execution; and must be done with the consent and knowledge of the other party. While there may be some trust relation existing between these parties as to this land, the evidence fails to disclose sufficient facts upon which to base a decree for specific performance. Let the judgment and order be reversed, and the cause be remanded for a new trial.

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—POWERS TO COMPROMISE.

In California an agreement by an executor or administrator to receive in full satisfaction of a judgment in favor of the estate an amount less than that due thereon is void, and hence the debtor's note executed and delivered to him pursuant to such agreement is without consideration.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. H. REARDEN, Judge.

D. Wm. Douthitt, (Marcus Rosenthal, of counsel,) for appellant. Ben Morgan, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an action on a promissory note. The defendant pleaded want of consideration for its execution. The court gave judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals. The facts are these: In 1879, the defendant, for a valuable consideration, executed to W. W. Traylor two promissory notes for sums aggregating $2,950, and bearing interest at the rate of 1 per cent. per month. In January, 1883, Traylor died intestate, and in February following Mrs. Elizabeth D. Traylor was duly appointed administratrix of his estate. She qualified, and entered upon the discharge of her duties as administratrix, and in April, 1883, the said notes were inventoried and appraised as of no value. In July, 1883, no part of the notes having been paid, Mrs. Traylor commenced an action to recover the amount due thereon, and on September 18, 1883, judgment by default was entered in her favor, as administratrix, against defendant for the sum of $4,372.50. On February 2, 1885, the defendant executed the note now in suit, which reads as follows: "$750.00. San Francisco, Feb. 2, 1885. On demand, for value received I promise to pay to Mrs. E. D. Traylor seven hundred and fifty ($750) dollars, with interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum payable monthly. This note is given by me in payment of all claims against me by the estate of W. W. Traylor. Not transferable. GEO. G. CLARK." When this note was taken, nothing had been paid on the judgment, and it was intended to have the note, by way of compromise, take the place of all existing indebtedness of the defendant to the estate. The attempted compromise was, however, never authorized or approved by the court having jurisdiction of the estate or a judge thereof, and the administratrix never satisfied of record the judgment or any part of it, but the same was in full force when this action was commenced, and remained so until it became barred by the statute of limitations. In July, 1885, defendant paid $50 on his indebtedness to the estate, and in August of that year the whole estate was distributed to Elizabeth D. Traylor in her own right and as assignee of other heirs. In October, 1885, Mrs. Traylor died testate, and, after administration of her estate, the note in suit, with other property, was distributed to the plaintiff, who commenced this action June 2, 1888. Conceding that executors and administrators have the legal right to compromise and discharge debts due the estates which they represent, without the approbation of the court or a judge thereof, when it appears to them to be just and for the best interest of the estates, (Moulton v. Holmes, 57 Cal. 337,) still it has been held in this state that a payment of a part of the amount due upon a money judgment, under an agreement that it shall operate as satisfaction in full, will not discharge the judgment, and that an agreement to discharge a judgment for a sum less than the amount for which it was rendered is void, (Deland v. Hiett, 27 Cal. 611.) It will be observed that the note in suit was not given, or intended to operate, as a mere part payment of the judgment against the defendant, but it was to take the place of and be a substitute for the whole judgment. This being so, the agreement on the part of the administratrix to accept it for that purpose was clearly null and void under the rule above stated. But a void promise on one side cannot constitute a consideration for a valid promise on the other side. The rule on this subject is thus stated in Story, Cont. § 447: "Mutual promises are concurrent considerations, and will support each other unless one or the other be void; in which case, there being no consideration on the one side, no contract can arise." See, also, 1 Whart. Cont. § 498. It follows, in our opinion, that the note was executed without any sufficient consideration therefor, and that the court below properly so held. The point is made that the want of consideration was not sufficiently pleaded in the answer, but we think it was. We advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

SALE—CONTRACT—PAROL EVIDENCE—FRAUD.

1. Where the contract for the sale of coal is in writing, and mentions the quality of coal sold by name, but nothing therein indicates that a sample was used or referred to, parol evidence is not admissible to show a sale by sample.

2. In an action for the purchase money, where there is nothing to show that the coal was not of the quality mentioned in the contract, but judgment goes for defendant, the admission of such parol evidence is reversible error.

3. Such evidence is not admissible as showing that a fraud was practiced on defendant, where there is no allegation in the answer that the contract was induced by false representations.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. H. REARDEN, Judge.

Craig & Meredith, for appellant. H. C. Firebaugh, for respondents.

DE HAVEN, J. The defendants had judgment in the court below; and from such judgment, and an order denying him a new trial, the plaintiff appeals. The action is for a balance alleged to be due plaintiff on account of the sale of 50 tons of coal, sold under the name of "Montana Lump Lehigh Hand-Picked Coal." The answer sets up, among other defenses, that the coal was sold by sample, and not by name, and that the coal delivered did not correspond with the sample. The plaintiff proved that an agreement for the sale of the coal was reduced to writing, and executed in duplicate, and that the one retained by him was lost. He then proved the contents of this written agreement by a witness who refreshed his memory from a letter-press copy of the written portion of said agreement, and a blank memorandum of contract similar to that upon which the agreement was written. The contract, as thus proven, is as follows: "San Francisco, January 12, 1882. Messrs. McCormick & Lewis ordered from J. W. Harrison fifty tons Montana Lode Lump Lehigh Hand-Picked Coal, early lading in New York. Ship to be named, original cost, etc. To be paid on receipt of bills of lading, etc., and the freight to be paid on receipt of coal here, at $13.50 per ton per 2,240 pounds, gold coin, payable as above, delivered from ship's side when landed. Any shortage in excess of 2 per cent. to be paid by the seller." The record does not disclose any conflict in the evidence as to the fact that there was a written agreement, or that its written terms were as above set forth. The defendants, however, were permitted to show by parol evidence that the contract was for coal of the same kind and quality as the defendants had previously bought from plaintiff, and which they were then using in their foundry, and that the coal delivered was not of the kind or quality thus referred to as a sample; and the question presented by this appeal is whether this parol evidence was properly admitted.

1. We do not see how the admission of this evidence can be sustained. Its effect was to show that coal was sold by sample, and thereby to import into the contract a warranty that the coal sold was to be equal to the sample. When the contract is in writing, and nothing in the written contract indicates that a sample was used or referred to, parol evidence cannot be allowed to show a sale by sample. Tied. Sales, § 188; Wiener v. Whipple, 53 Wis. 298, 10 N. W. Rep. 433; Thompson v. Libby, 34 Minn. 374, 26 N. W. Rep. 1. In Wiener v. Whipple, supra, the written contract was as follows: "Bought of Cass Whipple about 300 bushels of barley, at 65 cents per 50 pounds, to be delivered by the 15th of September next. Paid on same, $25." And it was held not competent to add to the terms of this agreement by parol evidence that the sale was made by sample. In Thompson v. Libby, supra, it is distinctly held that in a sale of personal property a warranty of its quality, if made at all, forms a part of the contract of sale, and is not a collateral contract; and therefore proof of such warranty cannot be added to the written agreement by parol evidence. It is claimed that the agreement proven by plaintiff was a mere informal memorandum, incomplete upon its face, and not intended to contain all the terms of the contract, and that for this reason the oral evidence was proper. We do not so regard the writing under consideration. It contains within itself all that is necessary to constitute a contract; and this being so, in the absence of any averment in the answer of defendants that there was an omission or mistake made in reducing it to writing, it is not competent to show by oral evidence that it does not state all of the terms of the agreement. The question whether a writing is upon its face a complete expression of the agreement of the parties is one of law for the court, and the rule which governs the court in its determination has been well stated as follows: "If it imports on its face to be a complete expression of the whole agreement,—that is, contains such language as imports a complete legal obligation,—it is to be presumed that the parties have introduced into it every material item and term; and parol evidence cannot be admitted to add another term to the agreement, although the writing contains nothing on the particular one to which the parol evidence is directed." Thompson v. Libby, 34 Minn. 377, 26 N. W. Rep. 2. See, also, Naumberg v. Young, 44 N. J. Law, 339. In 1 Greenl. Ev. § 275, it is said: "When parties have deliberately put their engagement in writing in such terms as import a legal obligation, without any uncertainty as to the object or extent of such engagement, it is conclusively presumed that the whole engagement of the parties, and the extent and manner of their undertaking, was reduced to writing." Tested by this consideration, it is clear that the agreement here is to be deemed complete, as it imports a clear legal obligation, and without any uncertainty as to what the parties thereto undertook to perform. It states an agreement for the sale and delivery of 50 tons of coal of a particular name; and it contains, either expressly or by implication, everything necessary to make the mutual obligations of the parties, arising out of a contract of sale, complete. This is therefore to be deemed a written contract; and other terms and conditions which might have been introduced into it by the parties, but were not, cannot be added by parol. The abbreviation, "etc.," found in the sentences: "Ship to be named, original cost, etc. To be paid on receipt of bills of lading, etc.,"—does not render the writing incomplete as a contract of sale, nor justify the conclusion that it was not intended by the parties as a memorial of all the terms of their contract. In the connection used, the abbreviation used is meaningless, and in no manner affects the legal construction of the agreement, and is therefore to be disregarded as surplusage.

2. The respondents further insist that this evidence was proper because it tended to show that a fraud was practiced upon them in the making of the contract. This would be so if such a defense had been made in the answer. The answer denies the execution of the contract alleged in the complaint, and avers that the contract of sale was by sample; but it contains no averment that defendants were induced to enter into the contract alleged in the complaint by any fraudulent representation, as that the coal described in such contract by name was the same kind and quality of coal previously bought by defendants from plaintiff; and without such averments, or an allegation of mistake in reducing the contract to writing, this evidence was irrelevant and immaterial.

3. The court does not find as a fact that the coal delivered to respondents was not merchantable. It is true, one part of the finding is to the effect that it "was filled with slate and dirt and foreign matter;" but this is said in connection with the statement that it was not as good as the sample by which the court finds it was sold. In another portion of its findings the court declares that it was not as good as the sample referred to, "but it was of the kind, variety, and class known as 'Montana Lump Lehigh Hand-Picked Coal.'" If it was, then the respondents got what was called for by the written contract, unless it was not equal in quality to coal of that brand. There is no finding that it was not. In this state of the findings, we cannot hold that the admission of the oral evidence as to the sale by sample was immaterial, as it would have been if the court had found that the coal delivered was not merchantable, nor equal in quality to that called for by the contract alleged in the complaint, and that plaintiff had been paid its full value. Judgment and order reversed.

CONTRACT—CONDITIONS—BREACH.

Where in an action for a breach of contract it appeared that defendant verbally accepted plaintiff's written offer to furnish stone for a building defendant had undertaken to build, and that plaintiff was required, as one of the conditions, to execute a bond for the performance of the work and to commence the work as soon as possible, the failure of plaintiff to furnish or tender the bond within eight or nine days precludes his right to recover prospective profits, when nothing has been done under the bid.

VANCLIEF, C. This is an appeal from a judgment of nonsuit, and from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial. The complaint alleges, in substance, that in July, 1886, the plaintiff contracted with the defendant to cut, furnish, and deliver to the defendant the stone required for the construction of the state asylum about to be erected in the county of Santa Clara, for the sum of $6,883; that plaintiff was at all times ready and willing to perform the contract on his part, but that the defendant refused to accept the stone, and gave plaintiff notice of such refusal, and prevented plaintiff from performing the contract, and wholly repudiated it, to the damage of plaintiff in the sum of $2,000. The answer specifically denied each allegation of the complaint. Upon the trial, the plaintiff testified that on the 9th day of July, 1886, he presented to the defendant a bid or offer in writing, of which the following is a copy: "San Jose, July 9, 1886. The undersigned propose to cut, furnish, and deliver the stone-work of the asylum to be built at Agnew station, according to the plans and specification of Mr. Jacob Lenzen & Son, architects, for the sum of six thousand eight hundred and eighty-three ($6,883.00) dollars. THOMAS FLYNN." Plaintiff admitted that there was no contract or memorandum in writing between him and the defendant for the stone-work mentioned in the complaint; and further testified that the defendant was himself bidding for the construction of the state asylum at Agnew station, and a few days thereafter informed plaintiff that the contract for its construction had been awarded to him, (defendant,) and that plaintiff's bid for the stone-work was accepted, telling him at the same time that a bond would be required of him, (plaintiff,) and that he should make arrangements to commence work as soon as possible, so as not to delay the construction of the asylum; that on July 20th plaintiff came to San Jose, and after meeting with the defendant was informed by him that the contract for the stone-work had been given to another person; that he was at all times ready to carry out and perform the contract on his part, and for that purpose had brought his foreman to San Jose, and instructed other workmen to follow; that the cost of the work would not have exceeded $4,500, and that if he had completed the contract he would have realized therefrom a profit of over $2,000; that he had quite a lot of stone on hand already quarried that could have been used, which it would have cost between $500 and $600 to quarry, and which he had previously quarried while he was getting out other work, the most of which is still on hand; that if the stone had been cut according to his bid and the specifications, and had not been used in the construction of the asylum, it would not have been available for other purposes or salable in the general market, but that none of the stone was so cut, and none of it was delivered, nor was any money paid therefor by defendant. Another witness testified to a conversation with the defendant in which he told the witness that Flynn had got the contract for cutting, furnishing, and delivering the stone for the asylum. No other evidence was given or offered in the case, and defendant moved for a nonsuit on the ground that the alleged contract was for the sale of goods and chattels, and as there was no note or memorandum thereof in writing signed by defendant, nor any acceptance or receipt of the goods or any part thereof, nor any payment of any part of the purchase money, as required by the fourth division of section 1624 of the Civil Code, the contract was invalid, and on the further ground that the plaintiff failed to prove that he had sustained any damage. The court sustained the motion, and plaintiff excepted. I am inclined to the opinion that the alleged contract was not within the statute of frauds, but it is unnecessary to decide that question, since, according to plaintiff's own testimony, the acceptance of his offer by the defendant was only conditional, the condition being that plaintiff must give a bond for the performance of the work. There is no evidence tending to prove that plaintiff ever gave or offered to give the bond, without which even the proposed verbal contract was incomplete. It appears that the negotiation was opened by the uninvited offer of plaintiff to do the stone-work according to certain specifications for a certain price. At the same time that defendant said he accepted the offer he also said that plaintiff should give a bond, and commence the work as soon as possible. About eight or nine days thereafter, without having given or offered to give the bond, the plaintiff returned to San Jose, when he was told that the work had been let to another party; but even then he did not offer to give the bond, nor does he testify that he then offered to commence the work, but only that "he was at all times ready to carry out and perform the contract on his part," by which he may have intended to be understood that he offered to commence the work. But his offer to commence the work, if he did so offer, before he tendered the bond, was nugatory. He claimed no other damage than being deprived of prospective profits, but, as he signally failed to prove a contract, he is not entitled to even nominal damages. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

SWAMP LANDS—RIGHT TO PURCHASE—EVIDENCE.
1. An application to purchase swamp and overflowed land, made before segregation of the land, is void, and it is proper to refuse to admit it in evidence in an action to determine the rights of the parties thereto to purchase.

3. In such action it is competent to show that the land in question, though granted to the state as swamp land, has been so far changed by natural causes as to have become suitable for cultivation.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; WILLIAM W. CROSS, Judge. N. O. Bradley and W. B. Wallace, (Wells, Guthrie & Lee, of counsel,) for appellant. Lamberson & Taylor and T. M. McNamara, for respondent.

MCFARLAND, J. This action was brought by respondent against Ruiz, defendant, to determine the rights between said parties to purchase certain swamp and overflowed land. Gardner intervened as successor in interest to Ruiz. Judgment went in the lower court in favor of respondent, and against the defendant and intervenor, and the latter appeals.

1. There was no error committed in refusing to admit in evidence the application of defendant, Ruiz, to purchase, and subsequent papers dependent upon it, because, waiving all other objections, it appeared, and is not contradicted, the said application was made before segregation of the land, and was therefore void. Since the briefs in the case at bar were filed, this court has, in Buchanan v. Nagle, 26 Pac. Rep. 512, in Wren v. Mangan, Id. 100, and in later cases, approved the doctrine stated in Garfield v. Wilson, 74 Cal. 175, 15 Pac. Rep. 620, that the Code makes no provision for an application to purchase prior to segregation.

2. There was no error in allowing respondent to show that the land in contest, although granted to the state as swamp and overflowed land, and purchasable as such, had been so far changed in its character by natural causes as to have become "suitable for cultivation." Fulton v. Brannan, (Cal.) 26 Pac. Rep. 506.

3. The evidence warranted the findings, and the latter clearly show that the defendant was entitled to purchase.

We see no material error committed at the trial of the cause. The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

ATTORNEY AND CLIENT—NEGLECT—FAILURE TO COLLECT CLAIMS—TRIAL.

A complaint against an attorney alleged that he had received the full amount of a note left with him by plaintiff for collection, that he had surrendered the note to the maker, and refused to pay over the amount received. The answer denied receiving any money, and alleged that defendant, being a creditor of such maker, had, with the consent of plaintiff, taken an assignment of a contract held by such maker to secure both claims. Upon the trial plaintiff testified that he gave the note to defendant to collect or obtain security, that he pointed out property for the satisfaction of the note, and that the maker offered to give a second mortgage on his property, having a sufficient margin, as defendant knew, and that he understood the contract was assigned to defendant as security. Defendant was allowed to prove that the assignment of the contract was all he could get, and the court charged that, unless the jury found defendant had failed to collect or get good security when he could have so done, and thereby the debt was lost, they should find for the defendant. A verdict was rendered for plaintiff. Held, that the case having been tried and submitted, without objection, on the theory of negligence in collecting the note, defendant received the benefit of a defense that the note could not have been collected, and as that was more favorable than he was entitled to under the issue in the complaint, he cannot complain of the verdict.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Del Norte county; JAMES E. MURPHEY, Judge.

L. F. Cooper and Sawyer & Burnett, for appellant. Lucas & Miller, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. Appeal from judgment and order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. Action to recover money alleged to have been collected on a note by defendant as plaintiff's attorney. It is charged that the defendant received from the debtor payment and satisfaction in full, both principal and interest, and thereupon canceled and surrendered the note to the maker; that defendant has failed and refused to pay to plaintiff the amount recovered, or any part thereof, "and now refuses to pay the same, or any part thereof, and now wrongfully withholds the same from plaintiff." The defendant admits receiving the note, but denies receiving it as plaintiff's attorney, and avers that plaintiff and defendant were both creditors of one White, and consulted in regard to the prospect of collecting their debts, and that defendant, with the full consent of plaintiff, finally agreed with White to surrender all the notes held by himself and plaintiff to White in consideration of the assignment to them of White's interest in a certain contract, to which White was a party; that the contract was assigned to defendant with plaintiff's knowledge and consent, in pursuance of this agreement, defendant agreeing to hold it for himself and plaintiff in proportion to the amount of their respective claims. He denies that he has collected any money whatever upon the note, and avers an offer to assign to plaintiff the contract transferred to him by White, and his readiness still to so assign it. He also avers that at the time of the transfer White had no other property except a dairy farm, which was mortgaged for more than it was worth, and some personal property, which was then under attachment. That plaintiff and defendant, then, consulting as creditors of White and not as attorney and client, agreed to take the assignment in payment of their indebtedness, and, in pursuance of this understanding, plaintiff delivered the note in question to defendant, and not otherwise. The action was tried by a jury, who returned a verdict for plaintiff. The plaintiff testified, in effect, that he gave the note to defendant, as an attorney, to collect or obtain security; that he pointed out to defendant sufficient property from which the money might have been made, and that White offered to secure the debt by a second mortgage on his ranch, and that there was ample margin for that purpose, as defendant knew; that he understood that the contract was assigned as security, and not in payment, and afterwards discovered that his note had been surrendered and canceled. The evidence is abundantly sufficient to sustain a verdict against the defendant, if it can be held to be consistent with the allegations of the complaint. The complaint is for money had and received, on the theory that, as defendant had surrendered the note to be canceled as paid, he may be charged as for a collection. On the trial both parties, as well as the court, appear to have tried the case as though the issue were whether defendant had failed to collect through negligence. That the defendant so regarded the issue is conclusively established by the instructions he asked for, as well as by the evidence he offered. That the court so understood it, is shown by the instructions given of its own motion. If the plaintiff recovered, the amount would be the same in either form of action. The main difference would be that, in an action for damages, the defendant would have had the benefit of a defense that the debt could not have been collected. As a matter of fact, he had the benefit of such defense. The instruction of the court was to the effect that the jury should find for the defendant, unless they found that he had failed to collect or to get good security, when he could have collected or obtained security, and thereby plaintiff had lost his debt. This instruction was more favorable to defendant than he was entitled to have. If, having no authority to accept in payment anything but money, he took, in his own name, property in full payment, and discharged the debt, the client was at liberty to regard it as a collection. Here he was allowed to prove that it was all he could get, or that the debt could not have been collected. The trial was not in accordance with the issue tendered in the complaint, but there was no objection made at the trial, and the case was in all respects tried as though the pleadings covered the matters actually in contest. The defendant has evidently sustained no injury. The objections to the sufficiency of the complaint cannot be made after verdict; undoubtedly it is good enough to support the judgment. We think the judgment should be affirmed.

MASTER AND SERVANT—WHERE RELATION EXISTS—DEFECTIVE MINE.

In an action for negligence in suffering the roof of a drift in a coal mine to remain without support, whereby it fell upon and injured a miner, it appeared that several months prior to the accident, defendant, being the owner, turned over the possession and management of the mine to one D., who from that time employed and paid the workmen and operated the mine for his own benefit. Held, that there was no relation between the parties whereby a liability could arise, and the fact that the miners were paid at defendant's store, and that some of them thought they were working for defendant, was immaterial.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WALTER H. LEVY, Judge.

Action by John Smith, a minor, by his guardian ad litem, James Smith, against Mortimer W. Belshaw, Charles Belshaw, and James Dickenson, doing business under the firm name and style of Belshaw & Co.

Fred B. Lake, (J. E. Foulds, of counsel,) for appellants. Leander Quint, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action to recover damages from defendants on account of their negligence in suffering the roof of a drift in a coal mine to remain without support, by reason whereof a portion of said roof fell upon plaintiff, who was a laborer in the mine, and injured him. A verdict for damages was rendered against M. W. Belshaw and Dickenson, and a judgment in favor of defendant Charles Belshaw. This appeal is prosecuted by M. W. Belshaw from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial. Under the law, as applied to the facts of this case, it plainly appears that no liability rests against the appellant Belshaw. While we will not disturb the verdict of a jury where the evidence is conflicting upon substantial matters, yet in all cases the verdict must have some meritorious support from the evidence, or be set aside and disregarded. In this case the evidence is undisputed that at the time of the accident, and for some months prior thereto, the mine was in the exclusive possession and control of defendant Dickenson, under a contract with Belshaw, who was the owner thereof. That under such contract Dickenson employed and paid the workmen; had entire charge of and authority over the mine, and received a fixed rate per ton from Belshaw, for the coal taken therefrom, when the same was delivered to him. The principle of law is so well settled that, where one carries on an independent employment in pursuance of a contract, by which he has entire control of the work, and the manner of its performance, his employer is not liable for any negligence of which he may be guilty in the course of his employment, that the citation of authorities is unnecessary labor. Indeed, respondent's counsel concedes the law, but insists that the evidence is sufficient to sustain the verdict. As already stated, we are unable to find it in the record. The fact that the miners were paid their wages at defendant Belshaw's store, where they had been paid prior to the contract with Dickenson, and the further fact that some of the miners thought they were working for Belshaw, are circumstances too slight to defeat the express and uncontradicted testimony as to the terms of the contract, and the labor performed under it. What the miners thought as to who was their employer is entirely immaterial. There is no question of estoppel involved in the case, and appellant, in order to escape liability for the negligence of Dickenson, was not bound to give any notice to the miners that he had given up the control of the mine. This is not an action on contract, based upon ostensible agency, but is an action in tort, and must rest upon the actual facts and the actual relations existing between the parties. Samuelson v. Mining Co., 49 Mich. 164, 13 N. W. Rep. 499; Rourke v. Colliery Co., 2 C. P. Div. 206. In Guizoni v. Tyler, 64 Cal. 336, this court said: "If the defendants were the owners of the boat, but had not the possession, control, or management of it themselves, or by their agents or employees, they cannot be held responsible for the negligence or mismanagement of whosoever had the exclusive control, possession, and management of it." In Johnson v. Owen, 33 Iowa, 515, it is said: "A bare belief of plaintiff, though founded on a reasonable cause, that Nash was defendant's servant, which in no way had influenced his action, which was not intended to be created, and which was not the natural result of his acts, could not make him liable as the employer of Nash. It would be a very dangerous rule to hold that inferences and opinions concerning men's actions, although founded upon reasonable cause, would render them liable for the acts of others." It is further contended by respondent that the appellant was liable as owner of the mine. (1) That the accident occurred in an old drift that was used simply for the purposes of egress and ingress to that portion of the mine from which the coal was being extracted, and therefore it remained under the control of Belshaw. (2) That the mine was in an unsafe condition at the time appellant turned the possession of it over to Dickenson. Neither of these positions can be successfully maintained. The entire mine, as disclosed by the evidence, was turned over to Dickenson; and he had the same control, possession and management of the old drifts, used for the purposes of ingress and egress, as he had over the portions where the miners were actually engaged in extracting the coal. And there is no testimony in the case indicating that this drift was in an unsafe condition at the time Dickenson assumed control. He had been in possession some months when the rock, which finally caused the injury, was noticed to be dangerous. The case in 49 Mich. 164, 13 N. W. Rep. 499, heretofore cited, is quite similar to the one at bar in many respects, and we quote: "That the mine at no time was a place of absolute safety is conceded, but the danger was not peculiar to this mine, and by itself raised no presumption of negligence. The question is whether the defendant, at the time of delivering possession to the contractors, had neglected any precaution which ought to have been taken to guard against danger. * * * The negligence, if any, must, on this showing, have consisted in the failure to inspect the roof frequently, and to bar down any rock that seemed likely to detach itself and fall, or to erect timbers to prevent the fall. Some personal fault must be involved, or neglect of duty, before there can be a personal liability." It follows from the foregoing views that the judgment and order must be reversed as to defendant M. W. Belshaw, and cause remanded for a new trial. It is so ordered.

REHEARING—POINTS NOT BEFORE PRESENTED.

A petition for a rehearing, filed by counsel whose names are not on the record, and based upon grounds not presented in the original argument, will not be considered. Affirming 26 Pac. Rep. 615.

On rehearing.

PER CURIAM. A petition for rehearing has been filed in this cause by counsel other than those whose names appear in the record, or who participated in the oral argument. In their petition they do not question the correctness of the opinion filed upon the decision of the cause, but ask for a reversal of the judgment upon grounds entirely different from those which were presented at the oral argument, or in the briefs then submitted. Petitions for rehearing are permitted by the rules of the court for the purpose of correcting any error which the court may have made in its opinion, or of enabling counsel to direct the attention of the court to matters presented at the argument which may have been overlooked in the decision. When counsel have once argued and submitted a cause for the decision of the court, it must be assumed that they have presented all the reasons upon which they rely for an affirmance or a reversal of the judgment. The court will not consider a petition for a rehearing that attempts to discuss the case upon grounds which were not presented in the original argument, or discussed in its opinion. Kellogg v. Cochran, 87 Cal. 192, 25 Pac. Rep. 677. Rehearing denied.

SUNNY SIDE LAND & IMP. CO. v. WILLAMETTE BRIDGE RY. CO.

ACTION FOR BREACH OF CONTRACT—COMPLAINT.

1. Where a complaint sets up a contract and alleges a breach thereof, a demurrer on the ground that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action is not well taken, since plaintiff is entitled to nominal damages at least.

2. If the allegations by which plaintiff seeks to lay down the rule for the measure of his damages are insufficient or irrelevant, the defect cannot be reached by demurrer so long as the other parts of the complaint contain a sufficient statement.

Appeal from circuit court, Multnomah county; E. D. SHATTUCK, Judge.

The complaint in this action alleges, substantially, that on March 24, 1888, plaintiff, being the owner of a tract of land in East Portland known as "Sunny Side," entered into a written contract with the defendant company for the construction within 4 months from said date, and the operation for 30 years from June 1, 1887, of a street railway from the foot of Morrison street in the city of Portland to said tract of land, and as a consideration for which plaintiff was to pay to said defendant the sum of $10,000, and furnish the right of way for said road; that by the terms of said agreement, among other things, it was provided that defendant should cause cars to be run over said railroad each and every day from 6 o'clock A. M. until 8 o'clock P. M. so that a car shall pass every point on said railroad every 15 minutes in each direction, and between the hours of 8 o'clock P. M. and 11 o'clock P. M. cars shall pass every 30 minutes in each direction, and that it should not charge for transporting passengers on said line more than 5 cents for each passenger going in one general direction, and that no further fare shall be charged or compensation demanded for transporting such passengers across the Willamette river. By said agreement it was further provided that "for the due and faithful performance of the conditions of this agreement on the part of each of the parties hereto they respectively bind themselves, each to the other, in the sum of ten thousand dollars, to be paid by the failing party;" that plaintiff has duly performed all the conditions of said contract on its part; that the object of plaintiff in securing the railway services contracted for in said agreement was to render said tract of land desirable for residence purposes, and make it more valuable and salable, all of which defendant well knew; that defendant entered upon the performance of the contract on its part, but has failed and neglected to perform the same in that it does not cause cars to be run over said railway in each direction oftener than every 30 minutes between the hours of 6 o'clock in the morning and 8 o'clock in the afternoon, nor oftener than every 60 minutes between 8 and 11 o'clock P. M., nor does it transport passengers on said line at the rate of 5 cents for each passenger while going in one direction, but has repeatedly charged passengers at the rate of 10 cents for such transportation; that since entering into said contract plaintiff has sold one-half of its tract of land for $160,000, which was all that could be obtained, and is still the owner of the remaining half, which is of the value of $300,000; that if defendant had caused the cars to run on said line as provided in the contract, and had only charged the fare therein provided, plaintiff would have received for the portion of the land sold the sum of $170,000, and the part remaining unsold would be worth $310,000, and plaintiff's land would have been benefited by the construction and operation of the road in the manner provided in the contract in the sum of $20,000; that by reason of the failure and neglect of the said defendant above set forth the plaintiff was prevented from selling the portion of its land which has been sold for $170,000, which sum would have been the market value thereof, and is now prevented from selling the portion of its land remaining unsold for the sum of $310,000, which would be the market value thereof, and plaintiff is thereby and otherwise damaged in the sum of $20,000. A demurrer being sustained and complaint dismissed, plaintiff appeals.

Sears & Beach, for appellant. Dolph, Bellinger, Mallory & Simon, for respondent.

BEAN, J., (after stating the facts as above.) The respondent's counsel contends that the items going to make up plaintiff's damages are so speculative, remote, and uncertain as to form no basis for damages in this case, and therefore the complaint does not state a cause of action. If we concede that his premises are correct, the conclusion drawn by him does not follow. The complaint sets out a contract between the parties, and avers a breach thereof by defendant. The demurrer admitting the truth of the complaint, the plaintiff is entitled to nominal damages at least, and this is sufficient on demurrer. 1 Suth. Dam. 759. If the allegations of the complaint in which plaintiff seeks to lay down the rule by which the damages are to be estimated are insufficient or irrelevant, the defect cannot be reached by demurrer so long as the other parts of the complaint contain a sufficient statement. If these damages are sought to be recovered at the trial, defendant may then object to the evidence. An erroneous claim of damages does not make a complaint demurrable. 1 Suth. Dam. 762; Cowley v. Davidson, 10 Minn. 392, (Gil. 314); Leland v. Tousey, 6 Hill. 328; Telegraph Co. v. Hopkins, 49 Ind. 223. The allegation of damages in the complaint is "that by reason of the failure and neglect of the said defendant above set forth [that is, the failure to run the cars and carry passengers according to the contract] the plaintiff was prevented from selling the portion of its said land which has been sold for $170,000, which sum would have been the market value thereof, and is now prevented from selling the portion of its land remaining unsold for the sum of $310,000, which sum would be the market value thereof, and plaintiff is thereby and otherwise damaged in the sum of $20,000." Omitting therefrom the portions objected to by defendant the allegation would read, "that by reason of the failure and neglect of the said defendant as above set forth [that is, the failure to run cars and carry passengers according to contract] plaintiff is thereby and otherwise damaged in the sum of $20,000;" and this under all the authorities is a sufficient allegation of general damages. Wisner v. Barber, 10 Or. 342; Wilson v. Clarke, 20 Minn. 367, (Gil. 318;) 1 Suth. Dam. 763. Whether the demurrer was well taken is the only question before us, and we therefore forbear to express any opinion upon the measure of damages, a question to which the demurrer does not extend. Judgment of the court below is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded with directions to overrule the demurrer.

STATE v. MCDANIEL.

GAMING—FARO.

A person who bets money at a game of faro dealt by another, "plays" faro within the meaning of section 3526, Hill's Code.

Appeal from circuit court, Lake county; L. R. WEBSTER, Judge.

The defendant was indicted for playing at faro for money and checks as representatives of money and value. The evidence offered on the part of the state tended to prove that the only way in which the defendant played was to bet money against the game, which was a banking game, set up, carried on, and dealt by others. The court instructed the jury as follows: "I instruct you that betting at a game of faro is playing it, within the meaning of the law," to which an exception was taken, and this presents the only question on this appeal.

H. K. Hanna, Warren Truitt, W. A. Wilshire, and C. A. Cogswell, for appellant. W. M. Colvig, Dist. Atty., for the State.

STRAHAN, C. J., (after stating the facts as above.) The indictment in this case is drawn under section 3526, Hill's Code, which provides that each and every person who shall deal, play, or carry on, open, or cause to be opened, or who shall conduct, either as owner, proprietor, or as employee, whether for hire or not, any game of faro, etc. Counsel for appellant contend that the term "play" has by the usages of persons engaged in gaming a peculiar meaning,—one different from that which is ordinarily employed; hence, in construing this statute, it should be given that meaning which it is accustomed to receive by the usage of persons engaged in gaming. And counsel remark: "When we speak of persons engaging in a game of whist, seven-up, or poker, we do not say they set up, deal, or carry on the game, but use the word 'play.' In regard to 'faro,' when speaking of it, we say 'dealing faro.' Never are the words 'play faro' employed. If one desires to express the idea of betting at faro, he says 'bet' or 'buck' at it." This is the gist of the appellant's contention. While it is both original and critical, we cannot accept it assound. We cannot accede to counsel's proposition that the usages of gamblers can have anything to do with the interpretation of this statute. It was designed to suppress gambling, and it would be altogether paradoxical to say that the usages and customs of the class against whom it is directed should control or influence its construction. If that argument were conceded, it would not be long before such usages and customs would prevail to such an extent as to render the statute altogether nugatory. In this case the ordinary rules of construction must prevail. It must be intended that the words in this act were used in the sense and meaning ordinarily attached to them; and when the whole tenor and manifest object of the act in question are considered we can have no doubt that to bet at a game of faro is to play it. In State v. Light, 17 Or. 358, 21 Pac. Rep. 132, this court held that to bet money at a game of stud poker, dealt by another, was in violation of the statute, and that the dealer was an accomplice,—a particeps criminis with the player. This could only be upon the theory that both were guilty, each performing a separate, but necessary, part in the violation of the statute. We think that case was correctly decided, and adhere to it. It results that the court did not err in giving the instruction excepted to, and its judgment must be affirmed.

STATE v. ADAMS.

GAMING—EVIDENCE—GRAND JURY—INSTRUCTIONS.

In a prosecution for gambling it is not proper for the defense, on cross-examination of the state's witnesses or otherwise, to introduce evidence tending to prove that the particular act of gambling investigated by the grand jury was different, and occurred on a different day in the same month, in a different place in the same town, from the one then being investigated before the trial jury; and an instruction based on such evidence is properly refused.

Appeal from circuit court, Lake county; L. R. WEBSTER, Judge.

By the indictment in this case the defendant was charged with the crime of dealing, playing, and carrying on a game of faro on the 29th day of September, 1890, in Lake county, Or. Upon a trial before a jury he was convicted, from which judgment he has appealed. The other facts appear in the opinion.

H. K. Hanna, Warren Truitt, W. A. Wilshire, and C. A. Cogswell, for appellant. W. M. Colvig, Dist. Atty., for the State.

STRAHAN, C. J. The first question made by the appellant is disposed of by State v. McDaniel, 26 Pac. Rep. 837, (decided at this term,) and need not be further noticed. Upon the trial in the court below counsel for the defendant was permitted to ask some of the state's witnesses on cross-examination in relation to what particular act of gambling they testified to before the grand jury, and, it appearing that the act then under investigation before the jury occurred at a different place in the same town, and on a different day, from that laid in the indictment, defendant's counsel moved to strike out all the evidence in relation to it, but the court overruled the motion, to which an exception was taken. At the conclusion of the evidence the defendant's counsel asked several instructions, each of which was designed to present the same question. It will therefore be necessary to notice but one of them. Number 5, which was asked and refused, is as follows: "(5) The defendant cannot be convicted of any other crime than the one for which he is indicted. He cannot, under this indictment, be convicted of a similar crime, committed on another day, or in another place. If the defendant was indicted for dealing, playing, and carrying on a particular game of faro, which was played on September 29, 1890, at Stanley's club-room, in the town of Lakeview, Oregon, he cannot be convicted of the crime of dealing, playing, or carrying on the game of faro on September 12, 1890, at the club-room adjoining the saloon of Lane, in said town. The evidence elicited on cross-examination of some of the state's witnesses as to what particular place the game of faro testified to by them before the grand jury was conducted was clearly improper. It was not proper cross-examination, and raised an inquiry that could not be permitted. If that step were taken, the entire secrets of the grand-jury room would be opened to inquiry, and the policy of the law on that subject thwarted. This kind of investigation has never been permitted in any case that I have been able to find, nor has counsel setting up this right been able to fortify it by a single decision of any court. On the contrary, whenever this line of investigation has been attempted, the courts have decided against it. State v. Fasset, 16 Conn. 458; State v. Baker, 20 Mo. 339; People v. Hulbut, 4 Denio, 133. Both time and place must be alleged in every indictment; but the only object of alleging time, unless it enters into the nature of the offense, is to show that the prosecution is not barred by the statute of limitations; and generally the only object of alleging place is to show that the offense was committed within the political subdivision of the state over which the court has criminal jurisdiction. These principles are elementary and statutory, and need no citation of authorities. It follows that there was no error in the judgment appealed from, and it must be affirmed.

MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE—FRAUD—DESERTION.

Facts examined, and held, that plaintiff was entitled to a decree dissolving the marriage, and also for $1,487, and interest, money advanced at defendant's request, before said marriage, upon the fraudulent representations and statements of the defendant.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from circuit court, Washington county; F. J. TAYLOR, Judge.

This is a suit for divorce. The plaintiff has also joined in the same suit a claim to recover $1,487, advanced by him at the defendant's request to pay off a certain mortgage on real property in Washington county then owned by defendant's mother, and for other equitable relief. It is charged that the defendant induced the plaintiff to pay and advance $1,487 by means of fraudulent statements, promises, and representations, all of which are particularly alleged. The answer denies most of plaintiff's allegations, and then recriminates desertion of the defendant by the plaintiff; and there is no objection that there is a misjoinder of causes of suit. The court dismissed the complaint, as well as the defendant's cross-complaint; from which decree, dismissing the complaint, the plaintiff has appealed.

S. B. Huston and Gilbert & Snow, for appellant. T. H. Tongue, for respondents.

STRAHAN, C. J., (after stating the facts as above.) After carefully considering the evidence in this case, we have no doubt that the plaintiff is entitled to a decree of divorce on the ground of desertion. The parties were married at Vancouver, and returned to Portland, where they spent one night together, and then the defendant returned to her home in Washington county, and never thereafter lived with the plaintiff, and it satisfactorily appears from all the circumstances that at the time of the marriage she did not intend to do so. It is unnecessary to recapitulate the evidence. It must be painful enough in its details to both parties. The plaintiff must also have a decree for the $1,487, and its interest. Justice would not be complete without it. This money was advanced at the request of the defendant upon the most delusive hopes and promises, which she did not intend to fulfill, but they were made only for the purpose of overreaching the plaintiff and obtaining his money. Under the circumstances, the so-called release executed at the moment of the marriage ceremony cannot be permitted to stand in the way of this result. It was a part and parcel of the same fraudulent means and purpose which characterized defendant's conduct with the plaintiff in all of these transactions. Let the decree of the court below be reversed, and a decree be entered here in accordance with this opinion.

STATE INS. CO. V. OREGON RY. & NAV. CO.

PARTIAL ASSIGNMENTS—ACTIONS—PARTIES.

1. Where the value of property destroyed by fire occasioned by the act of a wrong-doer is in excess of the amount of insurance money paid thereon, and the owner assigns his claim against the wrong-doer, to the extent of the insurance money paid, to the insurer, the latter has only a joint interest with the owner in a single cause of action, and cannot sue at law thereon alone.

2. Code Or. § 381, which provides that "if the consent of any one who should have been joined as plaintiff cannot be obtained he may be made a defendant, the reason thereof being stated in the complaint," does not apply to actions at law.

Appeal from circuit court, Multnomah county; E. D. SHATTUCK, Judge.

R. Eakin & Bros. and Cox, Teal & Minor, for appellant. W. W. Cotton and Zera Snow, for respondent.

LORD, J. This is an action to recover the sum of $515, paid by the plaintiff as insurance money to R. J. Rodgers and S. B. Williamson on account of certain hay valued at $1,600 which had been destroyed by the negligence of the defendant. To the extent of the insurance money paid thereon Rodgers and Williamson duly assigned to the plaintiff their claim against the defendant. It thus appears that the total value of the property destroyed by the negligent act of the defendant was greatly in excess of the amount of insurance money paid by the plaintiff to Rodgers and Williamson for which the assignment was taken. As assignee of a portion of such claim or liability against the defendant as a wrong-doer the plaintiff has brought this action in its own name for its recovery. The question is, has the plaintiff a right to sue alone upon such a state of facts? As in this state it is the distinction between forms of action at law only that is abolished, and not the distinction between actions at law and suits in equity, as in several of the Code states, it is contended that the assignment, being of a portion of a claim or liability in tort, is purely equitable, and can only be enforced in equity in a suit in which all the parties interested in the cause of action are made parties; that, by reason of this, when our Code provides that "every action shall be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest" in actions at law it applies only to those holding the legal right or title and not those holding an equitable right or title,—hence, as the assignment confers merely an equitable title upon the plaintiff, it can only be enforced by the plaintiff by a suit in equity in his own name, jointly with Rodgers and Williamson as plaintiffs, or as defendants, if they refuse to join, because the plaintiff has no right or interest which is recognized at law. But the subrogation of the insurer, upon payment of the insurance, to the rights and remedies of the insured—the party holding the legal title—to the extent of such payment is purely an equitable result and the creation of equity, which, operating as an equitable assignment, authorizes the plaintiff to bring an action at law in the name of the insured for his benefit. Why, then, may not the plaintiff, under the provision of the Code cited, whether he acquires his right or interest in the liability of the defendant for its wrongful act by an assignment purely equitable, or by subrogation which operates as an equitable assignment, pursue his remedy at law in his own name, joining Rodgers and Williamson as plaintiffs, upon the same principle that the plaintiff could, at common law, bring his action at law in the name of the insured? In either case the singleness of the action is preserved and the rights of the parties are the same, the remedy only being varied as it may be affected by the provision of the Code. However that may be, there is but one wrongful act complained of, causing one loss and creating but one liability. It is a single wrongful act giving rise to but one liability upon a claim which is admissible. It is immaterial whether the insurer acquires his right or interest by subrogation or assignment. When the property destroyed exceeds the value of the insurance money paid, he only acquires a joint right or interest with the owner of such property in a single cause of action or liability. Where there is but one liability or cause of action, those united in interest must adjust their loss in a single action. "The logic of the general requirement," says Mr. Bliss, "that actions should be brought in the name of the real party in interest, and that all who are united in interest should unite as plaintiffs, clearly demands the union of the assignor with the assignee of a part." Bliss, Code Pl. § 65. Together they constitute the real parties in interest upon a claim which is indivisible. "To hold that these plaintiffs cannot unite in one action," said LYON, J., "to enforce what is really but one liability or cause of action, but that each must bring a separate suit, would open the door to litigation which would be more oppressive to the defendant, and which would produce much mischief." Swarthout v. Railroad Co., 49 Wis. 625, 6 N. W. Rep. 314. Equally as emphatic is Judge DILLON that the insurance company cannot sue the wrongdoer, who occasioned the loss, in its own name. "The wrongful act," he said, "was single and indivisible, and gives rise to but one liability. If one insurer may sue, then if there are a dozen each may sue, and if the aggregate amount of all the policies falls short of the actual loss the owner could sue for the balance. This is not permitted." Ætna Ins. Co. v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co., 3 Dill. 1. Likewise Judge LAWRENCE said: "If the property is burned through the carelessness of some third person, can such person be liable to as many suits as there are insurances? Is there more than one cause of action against him? And can that be indefinitely divided? What is the measure of damages? Is it the injury done by him to the property, or the amount the insurance companies have paid? Clearly, the former. If the insurance companies have paid more than the actual loss they cannot make him liable for what they have paid. He is liable to the owner of the property for the injury he has done to it, and, although a wrong-doer, it is still his right to have the loss adjusted in a single suit." Insurance Co. v. Frost, 37 Ill. 336. All this goes to show that in cases of this sort, where the wrongful act is single and indivisible, there can arise but one liability or cause of action. While at common law this liability would be enforced in the name of the insured under the Code, except where the insurance company has paid the full value of the property, the loss of which was occasioned by the negligent act complained of, and the insurer by reason thereof has no interest, the insurer and owner of the property may join to recover the whole loss in one action. Together they have a united interest in a single cause of action or liability to which the negligent act of the defendant gave rise. The insurer acquires, not a new and separate cause of action, but only a right or interest with the owner of the property in a single cause of action or liability, and cannot therefore, in such case, sue in his own name alone. It is upon this principle, which preserves the indivisibility of the action arising out of one loss and one liability, that under the old practice the action would have been brought in the name of the insured for the benefit of all concerned, but, the Code requiring the action to be brought in the name of the real party in interest, the insurance companies and the owners of the property destroyed, constituting such party, would have to join in the recovery. In other words, the insurance companies would join the owner in bringing one action to determine the liability of the defendant. But it is said, if the owner or some one of the companies should refuse to join, there is no authority under our Code in actions at law to compel parties jointly interested to join in the action. While we have a section which provides that "of the parties to the suit those who are united in interest must be joined as plaintiffs or defendants, but if the consent of any one who should have been joined as plaintiff cannot be obtained he may be made a defendant, the reason thereof being stated in the complaint," (section 381, Code,) it does not apply to actions at law. In states where all distinctions between law and equity are abolished, as in Wisconsin, where there is a similar provision to our section 381, supra, there is no difficulty about compelling parties to join, as the case of Pratt v. Radford, 52 Wis. 114, 8 N. W. Rep. 606, illustrates. Unless the parties united in interest are willing to join there is no provision in our Code in actions at law to compel them. Ordinarily reliance may be placed upon the interest of parties to voluntarily join when they are united in interest, but if some one should refuse, as has happened in cases of other sort, resort will have to be sought in equity until the legislature shall obviate the difficulty, if any change is desirable. To allow separate actions to be brought where there is but one liability would be illogical, and contrary to established legal principles, and would be productive of mischief and oppression. As the court said in Swarthout v. Railroad Co., supra: "For a single wrongful act which gave rise to but one liability the defendant might be harassed with a dozen different actions." As well on principle as to avoid useless litigation this ought not to be permitted. The judgment must be affirmed.

HARDWICK v. STATE INS. CO.

INSURANCE—ORAL CONTRACT—ACTION.

1. In an action on an insurance policy the complaint must state that plaintiff had an insurable interest in the premises, failing which a cause of action is not stated.

2. Where application is made for insurance, and the premium fixed, and the agent orally agrees that in consideration of the necessary delay in procuring the execution of the policy the insurance shall begin from the date of the application, this is a valid contract of insurance, on which a recovery may be had if the property is destroyed before the policy issues, and not a mere agreement for a contract, to be executed by execution and delivery of the policy.

3. While the insurer, in the absence of a provision to that effect in the contract, cannot demand the premiums before the policy issues, in an action for breach of the oral contract to insure the plaintiff must allege and prove payment or tender of the premium before he can recover.

4. Where there is evidence that plaintiff had no knowledge of any limitations on the agent's authority, and the court has properly instructed on the law of agency, it is not error to leave it to the jury to determine whether the agent had authority to make the oral contract sued on.

Appeal from circuit court, Yamhill county; R. P. Boise, Judge.

This is an action to recover the sum of $1,000 on a preliminary oral contract of insurance, alleged to have been made by defendant. The complaint, in substance, alleges that on March 6, 1889, defendant executed and delivered to plaintiff its certain policy, by which it agreed to and did insure against loss by fire for the term of three years from that date the following described property, to-wit: "On plaintiff's dwelling or residence, $700; on beds and bedding, while in said house, $200; on household furniture in said house, the sum of $100." That at the time of the delivery of the policy the plaintiff paid defendant $5 in cash, and delivered to it his notes for the balance of premium to be paid on the policy, to-wit, $25. That afterwards some question or dispute arose in regard to the validity of the policy on the grounds that the property was described as a dwelling-house or residence, when in fact it was a hotel or boarding-house. That the dispute was finally settled as follows: The plaintiff agreed, through the agent of defendant at Newburg, Or., viz.: N. C. Maris to surrender up the said policy for cancellation, and to make application through said agent for a new policy for the term of one year, and to pay as a premium thereon $44, in addition to the $5 already paid, and defendant was to surrender to plaintiff the notes executed by him for cancellation. That, pursuant to said agreement, plaintiff did surrender up said policy, and on the 20th day of July, 1889, made an application for a new one, which was received and agreed to by defendant's agent, with the agreement on his part that the new policy should be executed and delivered as soon as could conveniently be done, and the additional premium of $44 should be paid on the delivery of the policy. That it was agreed that, inasmuch as it would take some time to execute and return the new policy from Salem, the principal office of defendant, the insurance should commence on the 20th day of July, 1889, at the hour of 12 o'clock m., and, in case said property should be destroyed by fire before said policy could be delivered to plaintiff, the sum of $1,000—the amount thereof—was to be paid as though it had already been delivered, and the policy was to run from said date, instead of the actual day of its execution or delivery. That owing to the sickness of defendant's agent, who received the application, the policy was not written out, executed, or delivered to plaintiff. That on August 18, 1889, the property was destroyed by fire, and defendant refused to execute or deliver the policy as agreed to, and refused to pay for said loss. A general demurrer was filed to the complaint, which, being overruled, defendant answered. The answer admits the execution of the first policy, but denies in toto everything in the complaint relating to the alleged contract to insure the property by a second or new policy, and affirmatively alleges that Maris had no authority to make any contract or agreement for or on behalf of defendant, which plaintiff well knew. A trial resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $1,000, from which this appeal is taken.

Geo. H. Burnett and W. W. Thayer, for appellant. Caples, Hurley & Allen and James McCain, for respondent.

BEAN, J., (after stating the facts as above.) It is contended by appellant that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, because (1) it does not allege that the plaintiff had any insurable interest in the property at the time of the loss; (2) it appears that both parties contemplated an agreement in writing, which was never executed; and (3) it is not alleged that plaintiff either paid or tendered the premium agreed upon for the second policy. The rule is well settled that in fire insurance the assured must have an insurable interest in the property both at the time of the insurance and at the time of the loss. In the case of Ruse v. Insurance Co., 23 N. Y. 516, it was distinctly enunciated that a policy obtained by a party who has no interest in the subject of insurance is a mere wager policy. It was said in that case that, aside from authority, this question would seem easy of solution. Such policies, if valid, not only afford facilities for a demoralizing system of gaming, but furnish strong temptations to the party interested to bring about the event insured against. In respect to insurances against fire, the obvious temptation presented by a wagering policy to the commission of the crime of arson has generally led the courts to hold such policies void. The contract of insurance is one of indemnity only, and, unless the plaintiff has an insurable interest in the property at the time of the loss, he cannot be injured in any way. Howard v. Insurance Co., 3 Denio, 301; Murdock v. Insurance Co., 2 N. Y. 210. The plaintiff's right to maintain this action depending upon his having an insurable interest in the property at the time of the loss, it follows that his complaint must contain an averment of such interest in order to state a cause of action. Freeman v. Insurance Co., 14 Abb. Pr. 398; Fowler v. Insurance Co., 26 N. Y. 422; Quarrier v. Insurance Co., 10 W. Va. 507. In Chrisman v. Insurance Co., 16 Or. 283, 18 Pac. Rep. 466, it was held by this court that, the plaintiff's interest in the property insured being one of the essential facts upon which his right of recovery depends, in an action founded on a policy against damage by fire such interest must be alleged in the complaint. In that case the question was raised on a motion of the defendant for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, and the court held the objection fatal. The complaint before us fails to allege that plaintiff had any interest in the property destroyed, either at the time the insurance is alleged to have been effected or at the time of the loss. Nor is there any sufficient allegation of an insurable interest at the time the first policy was issued. The allegation that defendant insured his dwelling-house or residence is an insufficient allegation of this interest, and the more obviously so as it is not alleged, even in this way, that the beds and bedding and household furniture in the house, which were also insured, were his. It is not averred, either directly or indirectly, that on July 20, 1889, at the time the contract upon which this action is founded is alleged to have been made, plaintiff had any interest in the property whatever, nor that he had any interest at the time of the loss. Without these allegations the complaint fails to state a cause of action. The decisions, as far as we have been able to ascertain, without exception sustain the position that in cases of this kind the complaint must distinctly allege an insurable interest when the policy is taken out, and also when the property was damaged by fire.

The next objection made to the complaint is that it appears that both parties contemplated an agreement in writing, which was never executed, and hence it is argued there was no contract. We do not understand this action to be based upon an oral contract of insurance, but upon an alleged preliminary oral contract, by which it was agreed that defendant should insure plaintiff upon the property for one year, for the sum and at the rate agreed upon, from the time of making the contract; and that a policy should thereafter be made out by the defendant company, at its home office, to take effect from that time. That such a contract is valid and binding on an insurance company when made within the real or apparent scope of the agent's authority, has been too often decided to leave it an open question. Thus, in City of Davenport v. Insurance Co., 17 Iowa, 276, an agreement of insurance was entered into between the parties, by their agents, on the 20th of March, the insurance to date from noon of that day, the policy to be executed and delivered the next day. On the night of the same day the property was destroyed by fire. On the morning of the 21st the policy was executed and delivered and received in perfect accord with the agreement, both parties being ignorant of the fire. Held that the company was liable for the loss. So, in Audubon v. Insurance Co., 27 N. Y. 216, it appeared that plaintiffs sent certain of their engravings to a bookbinder, on Saturday, to be bound, and in the afternoon of the same day sent their agent to defendant's office to effect an insurance on them, at a valuation of $1,500, for one month. It appeared that on January 10th preceding the defendants, by an ordinary policy, had insured plaintiff on certain sets of the same work, at the same bindery, for one month, at a valuation of $1,000, the premium being at the rate of 30 cents per $100. That, when plaintiff's agent applied to defendant's secretary for the insurance, and asked him if defendant would insure the property, the secretary replied, "We will;" and agreed that the policy would be sent to plaintiffs on the following Monday. The engravings were burned on the following Sunday, and defendant refused to issue or deliver the policy. Held, that the insurance took effect from the date of the oral application, and the company was liable for the loss, notwithstanding no definite agreement was made as to the premium. So, in Fish v. Cottenet, 44 N. Y. 538, it appeared that on October 20, 1864, the plaintiff applied to Wilber, as agent of defendant, to insure him upon brewery buildings against loss and damage by fire, to the amount of $5,000; and it was there verbally agreed between the plaintiff and Wilber, who assumed to act in behalf of the company, that the company from that time forth, and for the space of one year therefrom, would insure the plaintiff upon the brewery buildings against loss and damage by fire, the sum of $5,000, and would deliver its policy of insurance accordingly, and that, when requested, plaintiff would pay the premium. The plaintiff after this frequently called upon Wilber to get the policy, and upon each and every occasion Wilber said the policy had not yet come, but that it would come; that he need not give himself any trouble about it; and that he was just as much insured as if he had the policy. The plaintiff acted in good faith, and relied upon the agreements and statements of Wilber. On January 24, 1865, the buildings were destroyed by fire. Held, that defendants were liable for the loss, although no policy of insurance upon the buildings was ever delivered by the company to the plaintiff; nor was the premium ever demanded or paid; nor did Wilber ever communicate to the company the application of the plaintiff for insurance, nor the agreement made with him. In Angell v. Insurance Co., 59 N. Y. 171, the plaintiff entered into an agreement with the agent of the defendant company to insure his building for $1,000 for three years for the sum of $30, and to make out and deliver a policy, the premium to be paid when the policy was delivered. The agent did not make out the policy, and, the premises having been destroyed by fire, the plaintiff tendered the premium, and demanded the policy. The defendant refused to execute or deliver the policy, and an action was brought to recover for the breach of the contract to insure, and the court held the company liable. GROVER, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The counsel for the appellant is mistaken in supposing the action based upon an oral contract of insurance for three years. There was not sufficient evidence to show that Carpenter was authorized to make such a contract for the defendant. It was alleged in the complaint, and the evidence tended to prove, that a preliminary contract was made, by which it was agreed that the defendant should insure the plaintiff upon the property against damage by fire for a sum and at a rate agreed upon, for the term of three years from the time of making the contract, and that a policy should shortly thereafter be made out, to take effect from that time." Without stopping to quote from other authorities upon this question, it is safe to say that in all cases where parol contracts of this kind are not prohibited by statute, a parol contract of insurance is valid and binding, as well as parol contracts to effect an insurance by issuing policies; and the latter class of contracts will be enforced by compelling specific performance by the company, or in an action for the breach of the agreement, in either of which a recovery for a loss of the property agreed to be insured will be awarded the plaintiff. Ellis v. Insurance Co., 50 N. Y. 402; Angell v. Insurance Co., 59 N. Y. 171; May, Ins. § 565. In such case the risk attaches from the date of the application, or from the time designated as the commencement of the risk; and the only effect that can be given to the additional promise to execute a written policy is that, upon the tender of such a policy, and a demand of the premium, the oral contract should cease. 1 Wood, Ins. § 4; Kelly v. Insurance Co., 10 Bosw. 82; Insurance Co. v. Shaw, 94 U. S. 574; Sanborn v. Insurance Co., 16 Gray, 448; Baptist Church v. Insurance Co., 19 N. Y. 305; King v. Insurance Co., 58 Wis. 508, 17 N. W. Rep. 297; Putnam v. Insurance Co., 123 Mass. 324. That contracts of insurance are not usually made in this way is no evidence that they cannot be so made. As was said by COMSTOCK, J., in Baptist Church v. Insurance Co., supra: "There is nothing in the nature of insurance which requires written evidence of the contract. To deny, therefore, that parol agreements to insure are valid, would be simply to affirm the incapacity of parties to contract where no such incapacity exists, according to any known rule of reason or of law." It seems now well settled that, if an application is made for insurance, whether in writing or by parol, and the risk is accepted, the contract is complete, and the risk attaches from the date of the application or from the time designated as the commencement of the risk, and the company would be liable for loss if it occurred after that and before the contract was consummated by the formal execution and delivery of the policy. 4 Field, Lawy. Briefs, 245, and cases there cited. 1 Wood, Ins. § 20.

The next objection to the complaint is that it is not alleged that plaintiff paid or tendered the premium agreed to be paid, and it is contended that the payment or tender of the premium by him is a condition precedent to his right to recover. From an examination of the cases heretofore cited, when actions have been brought and sustained on preliminary parol contracts to insure, it will be seen that in nearly all of them the premium was not paid or tendered until after the loss, when the premium was tendered, and the policy demanded. It is not considered essential, unless expressly required by the agent, that the premium should be paid at the time the oral contract is entered into, in order to constitute a valid contract to insure. "The rule is," says Mr. Wood, "that in case of a mere oral contract of insurance, supported by a sufficient consideration, which is to take effect forthwith, although it may be entered into contemporaneously with an agreement by the insurer to deliver, and the assured to accept, subsequently, as a substitute therefor, a written policy by the former, in the form usually adopted by them, becomes binding, and remains in force until the delivery or tender of such policy. Until then, the condition usually inserted in such policies, requiring prepayment of the premium to make them binding, unless expressly adopted by the parties in such oral contract, forms no part of the insurance between them. A mere demand of the premium, without insisting upon it, or tendering a valid policy, does not terminate the oral insurance." 1 Wood, Ins. § 30. In a leading case upon this question a defective policy was issued and delivered to plaintiff after a loss had occurred and the premium paid. The plaintiff, admitting that the policy was invalid, brought an action upon the oral contract. The defendant denied its liability under the oral contract because the premium was not paid until after the loss, when the policy required it to be paid before the risk attached. The action was upheld, and a recovery permitted under the oral contract. ROBERTSON, J., speaking on this question, said: "The defendants at the time [of the loss] could have sued him [plaintiff] for the premium, and recovered. There was no reason why they should not be equally held for the insurance, unless, upon a tender of the policy and a peremptory demand by them for the premium, the plaintiff had refused to pay it. * * * It is clear that for such premium the defendants intended to have taken the risk. They had a right to stop the credit for the premium and the oral contract by presenting a perfect policy and demanding the former. They did not exercise the right, and, when a loss occurred, they seek to evade it." Kelly v. Insurance Co., 10 Bosw. 82. See, also, opinion of DENIO, C. J., in Audubon v. Insurance Co., supra, in which he says: "It is true that in this case the consideration was not paid, but the owners of the property were ready to pay it when the policy should be delivered. In the mean time it was a debt against the owners, for which credit was given until delivery of the policy." The current of decisions seem to be that the premium is not payable, unless expressly made so by the contract, until the policy issues; and then the assured must accept the policy and pay the premium. City of Davenport v. Insurance Co., supra; Hamilton v. Insurance Co., 5 Pa. St. 339; Insurance Co. v. Robinson, 25 Ind. 536. It follows, therefore, that plaintiff was not compelled to pay or tender the premium before the loss, in order to recover; but, since this is an action to recover damages for the breach of an alleged oral contract, by which it was agreed that defendant should insure plaintiff's property from the time of making the contract, and that a policy should thereafter be issued by defendant, to take effect from that time, it necessarily follows that before plaintiff can recover for such breach he must allege and prove performance, or an offer of performance, of the contract on his part. The payment of the premium was by the contract a condition precedent to his right to the policy. There could be no breach of the contract on the part of defendant until payment or tender of the premium by plaintiff. The delivery of the policy and payment of the premium were to be concurrent acts, and neither party could insist upon performance by the other without performance or an offer to perform on his part. The defendant had no right to demand the premium until it tendered the policy, nor the plaintiff the policy until he paid or tendered the premium; and hence there could be no breach of the contract by defendant until such payment or tender. The complaint fails to allege the tender or payment of the premium by plaintiff, or any facts which will excuse a tender; and hence does not show a breach of the contract by the defendant, or state a cause of action. From the views already expressed the case must be reversed, but the probability of another trial renders it important that we examine the other assignments of error.

In the ruling of the court sustaining the motion to strike out that portion of the answer alleging that the action was not commenced within six months after loss, and refusing to give the instruction asked by defendant, to the same effect, there was no error. This action is not based upon the terms of any policy, but upon the breach of a contract. Although plaintiff testified that the policy to be issued was to be in terms the same as the former one, except as to length of time and amount of premium, defendant refused to issue or deliver the policy according to contract, and hence this action. Having failed to issue the policy, it can claim no exemption from liability on account of any provisions the policy might or would have contained had it been issued.

The other errors alleged are in giving and refusing certain instructions. In order to a correct understanding of the questions involved, a brief reference to some of the facts is necessary. About July 1, 1889, plaintiff ascertained from agents of other insurance companies that there was some doubt about the validity of the policy issued by defendant in March, because the building was described as a dwelling, when in fact it was an hotel or boarding-house. He applied to Maris, defendant's agent at Newberg, for information about the matter, and was told that the policy was not valid, and the company would not continue the risk. He then told Maris that he would like to cancel the policy, and get his notes back, and Maris said he would write to the company about the matter. Maris was defendant's agent at Newberg, with an office and sign out as agent of State Insurance Company. The evidence tended to show that he was engaged in soliciting insurance, delivering policies, taking applications for insurance, collecting and remitting money, and doing other business in relation to insurance, and generally holding himself out as the agent of defendant. That by his commission of appointment he was given "authority to solicit and receive applications for insurance on such property in such amounts and at such rates as are permitted by the rules and instructions furnished by the company, and not otherwise, and to receive and transmit the premium therefor;" but there was no evidence that plaintiff had any knowledge of this commission, or of any limitation on Maris' authority, except that he did not write policies, but he supposed Maris was the general agent of defendant. In accordance with his understanding with plaintiff, Maris wrote to defendant, inclosing a diagram of the property, and in reply received a letter giving the terms upon which the old policy would be canceled, and also the terms upon which a new one would issue. On July 20th Maris called upon plaintiff, and showed him the letter, and plaintiff agreed to cancel the old policy, and take out a new one, on the terms stated in the letter, and did surrender up the old policy to Maris. The details of the contract or agreement between Maris and plaintiff were questions of fact for the jury, and are not necessary for us to consider, further than stated. On the trial in the court below the defendant denied the authority of Maris to make the contract sued on, and this was one of the principal issues in the case. On this question the court instructed the jury that, "as to whether or not Maris made the contract sued on, and whether he had authority to make it, if made, are questions of fact for the jury to determine from the evidence." Considered by itself, this instruction is not strictly correct. The scope of an agent's authority is not wholly a question of fact, but one of law and fact. 2 Wood, Ins. § 870. But this instruction must be construed in connection with the entire charge of the court, and, viewed in that connection, we think it is unobjectionable. The jury were instructed fully, and, in the absence of objection, we must assume correctly, as to the law of agency applicable to the facts of this case. The detached portion of the charge objected to was in effect saying to the jury that, "whether Maris had authority under the law as given to you, to make the contract sued on, if made at all, is a question of fact for you to determine from the evidence," and in this we think there was no error. The defendant requested the court to instruct the jury: "If Mr. Maris, as agent of the defendant, only had authority to receive applications for insurance, and transmit them to the defendant at its home office, and collect the premium, and was the medium through which policies were delivered to parties insured, the plaintiff would not, upon these facts, be justified in treating him as having authority to make contracts of insurance binding upon the company, because the very fact that the application is required to be made and forwarded to the company is notice that the plaintiff reserves the right to judge and determine for itself whether or not the risk shall be taken." This request may be conceded to be good law, but, as applied to the facts of this case, we think it was properly refused. As we read the record, plaintiff claims that he had no knowledge of the limitation on the powers of Maris, nor that his duties were only to receive applications for insurance, and forward them to the home office. It is true plaintiff knew, perhaps, that Maris did not write policies; but that he knew the reason does not appear. Maris was not the agent through whom the first policy was secured, and therefore plaintiff obtained no information as to Maris' authority in that way. Maris was acting as defendant's agent. To him plaintiff applied for information concerning the validity of the first policy. Maris wrote to the company stating the facts, and received a reply giving the terms upon which it would cancel the old policy and issue the new one. Armed with this letter Maris sought plaintiff, and he agreed to accept the terms, and surrender up the old policy; and, as he claims, Maris made the contract sued upon. The terms were those proposed by the company itself, and it would no doubt have issued the policy to take effect from the date of application if the illness of Maris had not prevented him from making out and forwarding the formal application according to understanding with plaintiff. In the absence of notice to plaintiff of any limitation in Maris' authority, or of facts amounting to notice, we think it was a question of fact for the jury, under proper instructions from the court, as to whether plaintiff had a right to assume that Maris had authority to make the contract sued on, if he did make it; and the request under consideration entirely withdrew this question from the jury. 2 Wood, Ins. § 423; Putnam v. Insurance Co., 123 Mass. 324; Palm v. Insurance Co., 20 Ohio, 537; Cooke v. Insurance Co., 7 Daly, 555; Ellis v. Insurance Co., 50 N. Y. 402. Where insurance companies deal with the community through a local agency, persons having transactions with the company are entitled to assume, in the absence of knowledge as to the agent's authority, that the acts and declarations of the agent are as valid as if they proceeded directly from the company. 2 Amer. Lead. Cas. 922; Insurance Co. v. Wilkinson, 13 Wall. 222. And a person who is clothed with power to act for them at all is treated as clothed with authority to bind them as to all matters within the scope of his real or apparent authority, and persons dealing with him in that capacity are not bound to go beyond the apparent authority conferred upon him, and inquire whether in fact he is authorized to do a particular act. It is enough if the act is within the scope of his apparent authority. 2 Wood, Ins. § 408, and authorities there cited. In Insurance Co. v. Wilkinson, supra, Mr. Justice MILLER, in speaking on this question, uses the following appropriate and very apt language: "The agents are stimulated by letters and instructions to activity in procuring contracts; and the party who is in this manner induced to take out a policy rarely sees or knows anything about the company or its officers by whom it is issued, but looks to and relies upon the agent who persuaded him to effect insurance as the full and complete representative of the company, in all that is said and done in making the contract. Has he not a right to so regard him? It is quite true that the reports of judicial decisions are filled with the efforts of these companies, by their counsel, to establish the doctrine that they can do all this, and yet limit their responsibility for the acts of these agents to the simple receipt of the premium and delivery of the policy. This proposition is not without support in some of the earlier decisions on the subject; and, at a time when insurance companies waited for parties to come to them seeking assurance, or to forward applications on their own motion, the doctrine had a reasonable foundation to rest upon. But to apply such a doctrine in its full force to the system of selling policies through agents, which we have described, would be a snare and a delusion, leading, as it has done in numerous instances, to the grossest frauds, of which the insurance companies receive the benefits, and the parties supposing themselves to be insured are the victims." This rule proceeds upon the theory that, if any party is to suffer by reason of the wrong-doing of such agent, it should be the company who clothed him with apparent authority, and for whom he was acting, rather than the assured, who acted in good faith, and innocently became a party to the contract. The public regard such persons as agents, clothed with authority to make contracts of insurance; and the companies certainly are aware of that fact. They must be held responsible for the acts of such agents within the scope of the business intrusted to them, and cannot limit their liability by any secret limitations or instructions, not known to the party dealing with the agents. City of Davenport v. Insurance Co., 17 Iowa, 276; Insurance Co. v. McGowan, 18 Kan. 300; Ellis v. Insurance Co., 50 N. Y. 402; Palm v. Insurance Co., 20 Ohio, 537. An insurance company which clothes a person with authority to hold himself out to the community as its local agent with authority to effect insurance is bound by the acts of the agent within the apparent scope of his authority. This authority need not be expressed, but may be implied from circumstances, and may thus exist as to third parties, although not as between the agent and the company. As said by Mr. Justice MILLER in Insurance Co. v. Wilkinson, supra: "The powers of the agent are, prima facie, co-extensive with the business intrusted to him, and will not be narrowed by limitations not communicated to the person with whom he deals. An insurance company establishing a local agency must be held responsible to the parties with whom they transact business for the acts and declarations of the agent within the scope of his employment, as if they proceeded from the principal." The decided tendency of the recent decisions, and, we think, properly, is to hold the insurer bound by the acts and conduct of the local agent whenever it can be done consistently with the rules of law. Such local agent is expected, both by the company and the assured, to receive applications, to examine the premises, determine the character of the risk, agree upon the amount to be insured and premium, and in fact to represent the company in the matter of effecting the insurance. He is the only person, from the nature of the case, who can be presumed to have information necessary to act for the company, and is the only person with whom the party applying has anything to do. His principal is usually remotely located. Its patrons in his vicinity naturally look to him for direction, generally, as to the insurance obtained through him; and persons insured in his company, with few if any exceptions, would, in the absence of notice that his powers were limited, regard his statements or contract as to any matter relative to such insurance as authoritative and binding upon the company. They look to the agent through whom they have obtained insurance as the complete representative of the company in everything connected with that insurance. If they did not have a right to so consider the authority of the local agent, it would undoubtedly create distrust, and cripple the business, and contracts of insurance would in many instances prove a snare and a delusion and a fraud of the grossest kind, of which the supposed assured would be the victim. The fact that the agent may not have authority to issue the policy, which is simply the written evidence of the contract, does not of itself prevent him from making a valid preliminary oral contract to insure; and it is said in such cases the courts will take judicial notice of the usage to make such contracts date from the application. Palm v. Insurance Co., 20 Ohio, 529; Fish v. Cottenet, 44 N. Y. 538; Ellis v. Insurance Co., 50 N. Y. 402; Post v. Insurance Co., 43 Barb. 361; Sanborn v. Insurance Co., 16 Gray, 448. Where the authority of an agent is limited, and the person with whom he contracts has notice of such limitation, of course the principal is not bound beyond the agent's authority; but whether plaintiff in this case had notice of the limitation on Maris' authority was a question of fact for the jury. The other instruction, the refusal of which is assigned as error, was, we think, substantially given by the court in paragraph 6. The judgment will be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

DRAINAGE DIST. No. 4 OF WASHINGTON COUNTY v. CROW.

TRIAL BY THE COURT—FINDINGS.

In the trial of an action by the court without the intervention of a jury, there must be findings of fact sufficient to sustain the judgment. All of the material issues made by the pleadings should be passed upon. McFadden v. Friendly, 9 Or. 222, so far as it states a different rule, is overruled.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from circuit court, Washington county; FRANK J. TAYLOR, Judge.

This is an action to recover a tax of $10.30, commenced before a justice of the peace of Washington county. The grounds upon which plaintiff seeks a recovery are stated in its complaint substantially as follows: That plaintiff has been and is now a drainage district, duly organized and existing under the laws of Oregon providing for the drainage of lands in Washington county, Or., said drainage district being organized for the purpose of clearing Dairy creek and Lousignot lake, in said county and state, of driftwood and other obstructions, to the full flowage of water in the channels of said streams. That the defendant is and was, during the year 1889, the owner of 63 acres of land lying within the boundaries of said drainage district, being subject to overflow, and of the assessed value of $588. That during the year 1887 the supervisor of drainage of said district performed certain labor and expended moneys in hiring labor in clearing the obstructions, as aforesaid, from the channels of said streams, and charged up the cost of such work to said district, and the lands lying therein, and said charges are made in proportion to the assessed value of said lands, to-wit, 1½ cents on the dollar on the assessed value of said lands. That the amount so charged against the lands of the defendant herein was $10.30, and that said supervisor of drainage duly reported his proceedings as such, including the charge against the lands of defendant, to the regular meeting of the land-owners of said district held March 5, 1888, and said charges were approved and found to be correct by said meeting. That a copy of said supervisor's report, and a synopsis of the proceedings of said meeting, were thereafter duly filed with the clerk of the county court of the aforesaid county by the secretary of said drainage district. That the defendant has not paid said sum so charged, nor any part thereof; and that there is now due and owing from the defendant to the plaintiff the said sum of $10.30, for which plaintiff prays judgment, etc. The defendant demurred to the complaint, on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and for the further reason that the plaintiff had not legal capacity to sue; which being overruled, the defendant answered, denying each material allegation of the complaint. The defendant had judgment before the justice, from which plaintiff appealed to the circuit court, and upon a trial in that court the defendant again had judgment, from which this appeal is taken.

S. B. Huston, R. Williams, and C. H. Carey, for appellant. Thomas H. Tongue, for respondent.

STRAHAN, C. J., (after stating the facts as above.) There is no bill of exceptions in this case, and therefore the main questions argued upon the trial were not permitted to examine, because the same are not presented by the record. The only question that is presented by the judgment roll is the sufficiency of the findings of fact to support the judgment. The findings of fact are as follows: The court now finds that the allegations of the complaint are not sustained; that said drainage district is not legally organized; that said alleged tax has not been legally levied; and, as conclusions of law, the court finds that the defendant is entitled to judgment against the plaintiff, etc. Section 219, Hill's Code, provides: "Upon the trial of an issue of fact by the court, its decision shall be given in writing, and filed with the clerk during the term, or within 20 days thereafter. The decision shall state the facts found and the conclusion of law separately, without argument or reason therefor; * * *" and section 220 says such finding shall be deemed a verdict. The object of this statute was to enable the parties to have placed upon the record the facts upon which the rights litigated depend, as well as the conclusion of law, separately stated, which the court drew from the facts found. The facts found are conclusive upon the appellate court, but the conclusions of law are reviewable here on appeal. So that we conclude the purpose of this statute is to aid or enable the parties to have the questions of law arising upon the facts found reviewed and re-examined in an easy and expeditious manner. If there is no question as to the admissibility of evidence, a bill of exceptions may, in many cases, be entirely dispensed with. Of course, if questions arise upon the trial, and exceptions are taken, and the findings, either of law or fact, cannot properly show what rulings the court made thereon, the same can only be reviewed on bill of exceptions, as in an ordinary jury trial. This statute received a construction in this court in Fink v. Road Co., 5 Or. 311, and the views here presented are in strict harmony with that construction. It was said in that case: "Where a cause is tried by the court without the intervention of a jury, there must be findings of fact sufficient to sustain the judgment. All the material issues should be passed upon. It is needless to cite authorities upon points so obviously clear and so thoroughly settled." The citation of this case would seem to be all that is necessary, were it not that McFadden v. Friendly, 9 Or. 222, seems to state a contrary doctrine. It is said in the head-note to that case that "a finding of fact in a trial court, which shows that a cause of action set up in the complaint had been made out, and that the defense set up in the answer is untrue, is sufficient." This case seems to state a different rule from that of Fink v. Road Co., supra. There can be no doubt that the safer and better rule of practice is that announced in Fink v. Road Co., supra. These findings take the place of a special verdict, and such verdict must find facts sufficient to support the judgment. Sisson v. Barrett, 2 N. Y. 406; Casey v. Dwyre, 15 Hun, 153. And the rule is distinctly stated in Railroad Co. v. Reynolds, 50 Cal. 90, that, when the facts are found, it must affirmatively appear that they support the judgment. So in Campbell v. Buckman, 49 Cal. 362, it was held, under the Code of that state, that, where findings of fact are made, the court must find on all the material issues made by the pleadings. And in Dowd v. Clarke, 51 Cal. 262, it was held that a judgment could not stand unless there were full findings, which respond to all the material issues made by the pleading. And Watson v. Cornell, 52 Cal. 91; Roeding v. Peraeso, 62 Cal. 515; and Paulson v. Nunan, 64 Cal. 290,—are to the same effect. McFadden v. Friendly, supra, so far as the same conflicts with this opinion, must be regarded as no longer authority. The findings in this case do not in any particular conform to the requirements of the Code, and leave us no alternative but to reverse the judgment and award a new trial.

BEASLEY v. SHIVELY.

DEFECT OF PARTIES—DISMISSAL ON APPEAL.

When it appears from the record that the real merits of the suit cannot be determined without essentially affecting the rights of persons in the subject-matter, who are not parties, and whose names nowhere appear in the record, this court will refuse to examine the facts, but dismiss the complaint for want of parties.

Appeal from circuit court, Clatsop county; FRANK J. TAYLOR, Judge.

Geo. H. Burnett and A. R. Kazaga, for appellant. Sidney Dell, for respondent.

BEAN, J. John M. Shively, being the owner of the donation land claim upon which the city of Astoria is now located, prior to 1881 laid the same out into lots, blocks, and streets, and caused a plat thereof to be duly recorded. The plat of the town as laid out by Shively included, not only his donation claim, but the tide-land on the Columbia river in front of the same. Upon this plat is block No. 4, containing 12 lots, numbered from 1 to 12, respectively. Lot No. 2 of this block is situate and lying on the bank of the river, and extends below the line of ordinary high tide. Immediately in front of block No. 4 is a street named "Hemlock Street," and between this street and the channel of the river is block 146, which is on the tide-land, and extends into the river below the line of ordinary low water. Prior to May 6, 1881, Shively sold and conveyed the whole of block 146, and the purchasers have since acquired tide-land deeds from the state for the same. On May 6, 1881, lot No. 2 of block 4, together with the appurtenances thereto belonging or in any wise appertaining, was conveyed to Elias Hoff, who, assuming that he was the owner of the riparian and wharfage rights in front thereof, conveyed the same to plaintiff. The defendant is the owner by mesne conveyances of whatever riparian and wharfage rights, if any, Shively had after conveying away lot 2 in block 4, and his interest in block 146, and by virtue thereof is laying claim to the riparian and wharfage rights on the Columbia river in front of block 146. The object of this suit is to enjoin defendant from erecting wharves on said property, and that plaintiff be decreed to be the owner of the riparian and wharfage rights lying in front of lot 2, block 4, below the line of ordinary low tide of the Columbia river. From this statement it will be noticed that the property in controversy is not adjoining any land owned by either of the parties to this suit, or by their predecessors in interest. This is not the case of a shore owner claiming the right to erect wharves in front of his property, but is a controversy between plaintiff and defendant as to who shall construct a wharf in front of tide-land purchased of the state, and owned by strangers to this suit. The proposed wharf is to be constructed below the line of ordinary low tide, and in front of block 146, which is held by persons who are not parties to this suit, and whose names nowhere appear in this record under deeds from the state, as tide-lands. A complete determination of this controversy requires the presence of the owners of this tide-land. Their interests are so essential to the merits of the controversy, and may be so affected by the decree, that the court cannot proceed to a final decision of the cause until they are parties. The legitimate result of the contention of the parties to this suit is that the owner of land on tidal waters has vested riparian rights, among which is the right to build a wharf, or use it for any purpose not inconsistent with the right of the public navigation, and that he may sell and transfer the same, and that as a consequence the state holds its title to the tide-land subject to such riparian rights, and cannot sell or use it except for the purpose of navigation or fishing. This must, it seems to us, inevitably be so, or neither of the parties have any interest in the subject-matter of this suit. Where such important interests are involved, certainly this court ought not to decree that either of the parties before it have a right to construct wharves upon the property in controversy, until the rights of the tide-land owners may be decided. They are not parties to this suit, and of course we can make no decree affecting their interests which would be binding upon them. But if this court should decide that either plaintiff or defendant had the right to construct wharves as claimed, it would, to say the least, throw a cloud upon the title of the tide-land owner. A court may determine any controversy between the parties before it when it can be done without prejudice to the rights of others, or by saving their rights; but where a complete determination of the controversy cannot be had without the presence of other parties, it may dismiss the complaint, or cause them to be brought in, as the exigencies of the case may require. Section 41, Hill's Code; Russell v. Clark's Ex'r, 7 Cranch, 69; Young v. Cushing, 4 Biss 450. The better practice in the circuit courts is to order the necessary parties to be brought in, and that should always be done under ordinary circumstances. But we have no such authority, and could only in a proper case, and where the equities justify, remand the cause to the court below for that purpose. While the record before us discloses the fact that there are other parties whose rights will be materially affected by a decree in this case, their names nowhere appear in the record, and we do not feel authorized to remand this case to the court below for the purpose of having them made parties. Nor does it matter that the parties to this suit make no objection on account of a want of parties. Where that fact appears, as in this case, the court will on its own motion refuse to proceed further in the case. A decision of the case now before us in favor of either of the parties would in effect be an adjudication that the tide-land owner does not have the right to construct wharves in front of his property,—a question we are unwilling to examine on this record. In justice to the court below it is proper to say that this cause was determined in that court on a demurrer to the answer, which the record discloses counsel refused to argue, or point out the grounds thereof. The judgment of the court below is reversed, and plaintiff's complaint dismissed.

BUMP V. COOPER.

IRRELEVANCY—ACCOUNT STATED.

1. In proving the commercial value of hops at Independence on a particular day, a witness stated the value at Buena Vista on that day, a town about five miles above Independence, on the Willamette river. Held not error.

2. A witness was asked if he thought he knew what the price of hops was at Independence, November, 1888, and he answered: "Seventeen and a half cents. I knew of one man getting that who lived within two miles of Independence." Held not error to refuse to strike out the answer.

3. In an action to recover the value of hops sold in November, 1888, where there was no issue in the pleadings as to who was the real party in interest, evidence that in December of the same year plaintiff made a bill of sale of the hops to another was irrelevant; and held, further, that the applicability of said evidence to an issue in the cause not being apparent, upon objection being made to its irrelevancy, counsel for appellant should have pointed out to the court the issue to which he claimed such evidence was applicable.

4. Although a paper offered in evidence for a particular purpose may be an account stated, yet, if it has not been pleaded and relied upon by either party as such, it cannot control or limit the rights of the parties as an account stated.

Appeal from circuit court, Benton county; M. L. PIPES, Judge.

This is the second appeal in this case. The opinion of the court on the former appeal is reported in 19 Or. 81, 23 Pac. Rep. 806, where the facts are stated. Other facts necessary to understand the questions presented on this appeal are stated in the opinion.

John Kelsay, and J. J. Daly, for appellant. J. R. Bryson, W. S. McFadden, and John Burnett, for respondent.

STRAHAN, C. J. After reversal of this case upon the former appeal, it was remitted to the court below, where the plaintiff was permitted to amend her complaint by alleging that on the 15th day of November, 1888, the market price of hops in the town of Independence was 17 cents per pound, and that on that day she elected to take that price for said hops, and closed the sale to the defendant at that figure. Upon the second trial in the court below the plaintiff recovered a judgment for $1,753.60, from which this appeal is taken.

1. The appellant took several exceptions to the introduction of the evidence, which will be separately noticed. Joseph Miller a witness for the plaintiff, testified that Buena Vista and Independence were both situated on the Willamette river, and are about five miles apart. He then testified, under an exception by the appellant, that he knew the price of hops at Buena Vista, but not at Independence; that the prices were about that time 17 and 17½ cents in the vicinity of Buena Vista, between there and Independence. Buena Vista and Independence are situated in such close proximity, and both on the river, that there could be no material difference in the market value of a staple production like hops, between the two places. Jurors are practical men, and they could not possibly be misled by such a slight discrepancy. They were bound to know, when they learned the market value of hops at one of those towns, practically the same rates would rule in the other. There was therefore no error in the admission of this evidence.

2. One Robert G. Moore was called as a witness in behalf of the plaintiff, and he was asked: "Do you think you know what the price of hops was at Independence, November, 1888?" And he answered: "Seventeen and a half cents. I know of one man there getting that, who lived within two miles of Independence." The defendant moved to strike out this evidence as not responsive to the question, which was overruled, and defendant excepted. Strictly speaking, Moore's answer was not responsive to the question asked him; but, practically, but few witnesses would observe the form of the question, so as to confine their answer within its precise limits. If a witness were to show a disposition to volunteer evidence by relating facts not required by the questions put to him, he would soon injure the cause his swiftness was endeavoring to serve. Besides, it would be the duty of the court, which it would no doubt promptly do, if requested, to admonish such witness to confine his answers to the questions propounded to him. But where the evidence given is competent, and the witness has volunteered an expression beyond the scope of the question, we cannot see that the appellant is in any manner prejudiced, and for that reason this exception cannot be sustained.

3. Another exception was taken by the defendant to the ruling of the court in refusing to allow M. Merwin to answer the following question: "State whether or not you went with Mr. Lilly under the direction of Mr. Bump, as agent for the plaintiff, to Mr. Cooper, the defendant, and witnessed a tender of money for the picking of the hops in question, and demanded the possession of them under the bill of sale." The witness was not allowed to answer the question, and an exception was taken. Counsel for appellant here offered to prove by this witness that, acting under the instructions of Wilson Bump, as the agent of the plaintiff, he went with Mr. Lilly in the month of December, 1888, to the defendant in Independence, Polk county, Or., and witnessed Mr. Lilly tender to the defendant an amount of money for picking the hops in question in this case; and saw Mr. Lilly then and there tender bill of sale from the plaintiff in this case, conveying said hops to said Lilly, and then and there demanded the possession of said hops under the bill of sale,—all of which was refused by the court, and an exception duly taken. It was argued here that this evidence, if admitted, would have tended to prove that the action was not prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, and therefore would be necessarily fatal to the plaintiff's case; but there was no issue in the pleadings to which this evidence could apply. Besides, it was for the admission of evidence for such purpose, where there was no issue, that this court reversed the court below in Derkeny v. Belfils, 4 Or. 258. The denial in the answer of the sum alleged to be due from the defendant to the plaintiff is no such issue. The allegation in the complaint is a mere legal conclusion, predicated on the antecedent part of the pleading, and the denial in the answer is nothing more. It tenders no issue of fact whatever.

4. It is now argued that such evidence, if admitted, would have had a tendency to rebut the plaintiff's allegation that she exercised the right of election reserved under the contract. Whether such evidence would have had that tendency it is not necessary now to decide. It is sufficient to say that its relevancy to that issue is not apparent to us in the present state of the record, and, if this evidence were offered for that purpose, the court should have been notified of it at the time the offer was made.

5. Counsel for the appellant argued upon the trial before us, that the statement of account sent by the defendant to the plaintiff on the 6th day of March, 1889, not having been objected to by the plaintiff within a reasonable time, became a stated account, and that the rights and liabilities of the parties are to be determined by what is therein contained. We have several times lately had occasion to consider what is a stated account, and its effect upon the rights of the parties, and we adhere to what has been decided on that subject. But the same has no applicability to this record, for the reason that there is no issue in the pleadings in relation to such account. We could not, therefore, give this statement the effect of a stated account if the facts otherwise justified or required it, for the reason that neither party has set it up in the pleadings or relied upon it as a cause of action or defense. Our examination leads to the conclusion that the judgment appealed from must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. June 4, 1891.)

On rehearing. For former report, see 26 Pac. Rep. 569.

PER CURIAM. The point suggested as to the assignee is immaterial. It is the staleness of the proceeding, under the circumstances, which influenced the judgment of the court.

RILEY v. PEARSON et al.

REPLEVIN—PLEADING—EXHIBIT.

In an action of replevin, an exhibit containing a description of the property, in order to become a part of the complaint, must be annexed and attached thereto. It is not sufficient to file the same as a separate paper, although referred to in the complaint, and alleged to be a part thereof.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from circuit court, Wallowa county; MORTON D. CLIFFORD, Judge.

v.26P.no.14—54

BEAN, J. An action was brought in justice court, by respondents against appellant, to recover possession of personal property. A judgment for want of an answer was entered, to reverse which this proceeding was brought. On the return of the writ, the proceedings were dismissed by the circuit court, and the judgment of the justice's court in effect affirmed. The petition for the writ of review contains several assignments of error, and, among others, that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, because it contains no sufficient description of the property to recover the possession of which the action was brought. The property is described in the complaint as "certain personal property, consisting of household goods, furniture, books, pictures, wearing apparel, and sundry other articles, particularly set forth and described in bill of particulars herewith filed, marked 'Exhibit A,' and made a part of this complaint." There appears in the record a list of various items of personal property, and opposite each item are figures supposed to be the value thereof; but this paper is in no way attached to the complaint, and cannot be considered a part thereof. In Caspary v. City of Portland, 19 Or. 496, 24 Pac. Rep. 1036, we held that schedules referred to in a complaint in an action of this kind, but not attached to and made a part of it, could not be used in aid of the description of the property contained in the complaint. We there held that, in actions to recover possession of personal property, a bill of particulars or schedule of the property annexed to the complaint, marked so it could be identified with certainty, and referred to in, and made a part of, the complaint, would constitute a part of the pleadings, not for the purpose of supplying necessary allegations therein, but for the purposes of description and itemizing the values. There are many authorities which hold that, in actions at law, exhibits cannot be made part of the pleading; but, for reasons stated in the case above cited, we have adopted, in cases of this character, a different rule, but are unwilling to carry it any further than as expressed in Caspary v. City of Portland. The statement in the complaint that the paper is "marked 'Exhibit A,' and made a part of this complaint," does not make it so. It should have been attached before it could have become in any sense a part of the pleading. Without this bill of particulars, the complaint, confessedly, does not contain a description of the property sought to be recovered, and hence does not state a cause of action. We do not deem it necessary to notice the other assignments of error, as they will probably be avoided if the cause should proceed anew, further than to say that the proceedings in the justice's court, as disclosed by the record, seem to have been unusual, and somewhat irregular, and not calculated to promote the ends of justice. Judgment reversed, and cause remanded to the court below, with directions to vacate and annul the judgment of the justice's court.

HENSILL v. SPILLMAN.

CANCELLATION OF DEED—MISTAKE OF LAW—EVIDENCE.

Evidence examined, and held insufficient to sustain the allegations of the complaint.

Appeal from circuit court, Multnomah county; L. B. STEARNS, Judge.

This is a suit to cancel and set aside a deed from plaintiff to her husband, S. M. Hensill, to lot 5, in block 137, in the city of Portland. The complaint alleges, in substance, that on September 9, 1886, plaintiff was the owner in fee of lot 5, block 137, but that S. M. Hensill was in possession thereof, collecting the rents and profits. That he represented to her that he desired to raise money for his own use, and asked her to give him power to mortgage the lot. That at first she refused, but that her husband threatened to sue her, and, in order to avoid the annoyance and trouble thereof, she consented to give him such power. That he procured the paper hereinafter set forth to be drawn up and presented to her for her signature. That at the time it was so presented she was told that the same would not convey the land therein described to her husband, but would simply give him the power to mortgage the same, and that, believing and relying upon the said representations, and being ignorant of legal forms, she signed the same, as follows: "Know all men by these presents, that I, Mary Jane Hensill, in consideration of one dollar and other valuable consideration to me paid by S. M. Hensill, do hereby remise, release, and forever quitclaim unto said S. M. Hensill, and unto his heirs and assigns, all my right, title, and interest in and to the following described parcel of real estate, situated in the city of Portland, county of Multnomah, and state of Oregon, to-wit: Lot No. five, (5,) in block No. one hundred and thirty-seven, (137,) with the provision that the above-described property shall not be sold by the said S. M. Hensill, but with the understanding that he may mortgage the said property; to have and to hold the same, together with all and singular the hereditaments and appurtenances thereto belonging, or in any wise appertaining, to the said S. M. Hensill, and to his heirs and assigns, forever." That in January, 1889, S. M. Hensill died leaving a will, by the terms of which he authorized his executors to sell the property at public or private sale. That the executors offered said property at public auction, and that at the time of offering it plaintiff objected, and gave notice that she claimed the same. That, disregarding the said notice, the defendant purchased the property for $3,750, and in due time received from the executors a deed therefor. Defendant denies most of the allegations of the complaint, and sets up six separate defenses. Defendant admits that plaintiff gave the deed because of a threat to begin suit; denies that plaintiff was misinformed or mistaken; denies that there was not full consideration. Defendant claims that the deed was given as a family settlement of a controversy between husband and wife; that plaintiff intended to convey a fee; that she has acquiesced in the transaction for nearly three years; that she has ratified the deed by the following acts: (1) By reacknowledging the deed 13 months after it was given; (2) by secretly bidding at the public auction almost the full value of the property; (3) by offering the defendant to buy the property of him at its full value; (4) by presenting against the estate of her deceased husband a claim on account of a loan to him, she knowing there was nothing with which to pay her claim, unless paid from the proceeds of the sale of this lot to the defendant. Defendant also claims that he is a bona fide purchaser for value without notice. The cause was referred to a referee, who reported that the deed was good and valid, and that defendant is the owner of the property. This report was confirmed by the circuit court; hence this appeal.

J. C. Moreland and W. Y. Masters, for appellant. F. D. Chamberlain, for respondent.

BEAN, J., (after stating the facts as above.) It is conceded by appellant that the provision in the deed from her to her husband, that he should not sell the property, is void, as being in restraint of alienation; but it is insisted that she only agreed to give him the right to mortgage the property, and that at the time she executed the deed she was informed and believed that the provision was valid, and that he could only mortgage the property. It is not alleged in the complaint, nor does the evidence show, a mutual or any mistake in drafting the instrument; nor is there any allegation or evidence of fraud or deceit practiced upon plaintiff; but she admits, both in her complaint and testimony, that she knew the contents of the deed before and at the time she signed, but claims she was misinformed as to its legal effects, and seeks relief on that ground alone. Conceding, without deciding, that a mistake of that kind is sufficient ground for the interposition of a court of equity, we do not think the evidence supports her contention. On behalf of plaintiff, it is contended that her husband, who had a life-estate in this property, was desirous of mortgaging it, for the purpose of raising money for his support, and that she agreed to permit him to do so; that the deed in question was drawn by his attorney, who represented to her that it only gave her husband the right to mortgage the property. The contention of defendant is that in January, 1886, plaintiff gave a mortgage on the property in controversy, and lots 6, 7, and 8 of block 137, to the son of plaintiff and her husband, to secure the sum of $1,150, payable in five years; that the son died in June, 1889, unmarried and intestate, leaving his father his sole heir, and that at the time of the execution of the deed the husband of plaintiff was threatening to institute proceedings to foreclose this mortgage, and that the deed was given in satisfaction of the amount due on the mortgage. The testimony is somewhat conflicting, but the referee who heard the witnesses testify, and saw their appearance on the witness stand, found in favor of defendant, and we think, after a careful examination of the evidence, that the decided weight of the testimony sustains his findings. The plaintiff and her husband were married in 1837, and at the date of the deed in controversy were each about 70 years of age, but had been living separate and apart for some time, and were not on friendly terms. Plaintiff never had any conversation or contract whatever with her husband about the deed, but all the negotiations were with his attorney. That the mortgage, from plaintiff to her son, was an existing obligation, at the time the deed was executed, unless barred by the statute of limitations, is admitted by plaintiff; and she also admits that her husband's attorneys were threatening to institute proceedings to foreclose it. It is true there had been some attempt to release this mortgage prior to that time, but, whatever the effect of such attempted release may have been as to third parties, it could avail this plaintiff nothing; for she was fully cognizant of the circumstances of its execution, and admits in her testimony that nothing had been paid on the mortgage. Her husband was claiming this to be a valid mortgage, and threatening to commence proceedings to foreclose it, while she claimed it was barred by the statute of limitations; and it is evident from the testimony that the deed in controversy was intended as a compromise of this dispute. The provision in the deed against alienation was inserted at her request, because she was afraid that her husband, who seems to have been careless about financial matters, would sell the land, squander the money, and she would have to support him. Hence she desired that he be prevented from selling the land during his life, and to satisfy her this provision was inserted. It is clear that it was the intention of the parties that the fee should pass from plaintiff to her husband by this deed. This conclusion is strengthened by all the circumstances surrounding the matter, as well as by plaintiff's own actions. She demanded and received from her husband, as a condition to the execution of the deed, a release of the mortgage given to her son, as well as a quitclaim deed to lots 6, 7, and 8; reacknowledged the deed in October, 1887, on account of some defect in former acknowledgments; paid no attention whatever to the property, although she lived next door, after the death of her husband, when she learned he had made a will not in her favor; made no objection to the executors taking steps to sell the land; had a secret bidder at the sale, although her attorney had notified persons present that the executors had no title; offered to return defendant the money paid for the land, although it was largely in excess of the amount due on the mortgage given by herself and husband, if he would transfer it to her. These and many other circumstances, which are unnecessary to state, indicate that plaintiff fully understood what she was doing when she executed the deed, and it is in the form she intended it to be, and was executed for the purpose of settling the controversy between her and her husband concerning the mortgage in favor of her son. The decree of the court below is therefore affirmed.

HELMS et al. v. GILROY et al.

PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION—RIGHT OF APPEAL—ASSIGNMENT FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS—FIXTURES.

1. A preliminary injunction is a provisional remedy, the sole object of which is to preserve the subject in controversy in its then condition; and courts of equity, in granting or refusing the same, should in no manner anticipate the ultimate determination of the question of right involved.

2. An order granting or refusing a preliminary injunction does not ordinarily partake of the nature of a final judgment to such an extent as to warrant an appeal therefrom; but when the court not only refused the injunction, but entered a decree settling the rights of the parties, an appeal will lie.

3. An assignee, under the general assignment law, takes no better title than his assignor, and is affected by all the equities existing as against him.

4. As between mortgagor and mortgagee, machinery necessary for, and used in the operation of, a sash and door and planing mill, when affixed to the building by screws, bolts, pulleys, and bands, is a "fixture," and subject to the lien of the mortgage.

Appeal from circuit court, Jackson county; L. R. WEBSTER, Judge.

The property in controversy in this suit is certain machinery, necessary for and used in operating what is known as a sash and door factory and planing-mill, at Ashland, Or. This machinery was purchased on April 22, 1887, of the Parke & Lacy Machinery Company, of Portland, by defendant William Gilroy and one Yule, who were the owners of the real estate, water-power, and building in which the machinery was placed. The agreement between the Parke & Lacy Machinery Company and Gilroy & Yule was, in form, a lease for 12 months, at a stipulated rental of $2,093, payable $900 in cash, and balance at stated times during the year; and, upon the payment of this rent, Gilroy & Yule were to have the right to purchase the property for $2. By this lease, Gilroy & Yule agreed that they would not permit the machinery, or any part thereof, to be affixed to real estate. After said machinery was received at Ashland it was placed in the building prepared for it, and attached thereto by screws, bolts, pulleys, and bands, in the manner such machinery is usually attached to buildings. Gilroy & Yule used and operated said mill and machinery for some time, when Gilroy purchased the interest of Yule, and continued to use and operate the same until May 13, 1889, when he and his wife executed and delivered to one G. F. Pennebaker their mortgage to secure the payment of the sum of $3,500, on or before one year after date, which mortgage was subsequently assigned to plaintiffs. This mortgage, in terms, only describes the real estate upon which said mill is situated and its appurtenances. Two days after the execution of the mortgage, Gilroy made a general assignment, for the benefit of his creditors, to defendant Rogers, of all his property. On January 30, 1890, there remaining due from Gilroy & Yule to the Parke & Lacy Machinery Company, on the purchase price of said machinery, $879.88, Rogers paid the same from money in his hands as assignee, and received from the company a bill of sale of said machinery. On May 13, 1890, no payments having been made on the mortgage, plaintiffs commenced a suit to foreclose the same, making Gilroy and wife and Rogers defendants, but neither of them appeared or made defense thereto. That, on August 11, 1890, plaintiffs filed an amended complaint, which, among other things, particularly described said machinery, and alleged that it was a part of the realty, and subject to the lien of plaintiffs' mortgage; and that defendant Rogers, as assignee of Gilroy, was in possession of the property, and threatened to remove the machinery, sell and dispose of the same, and would do so, unless enjoined by order of the court, and praying for a preliminary injunction. Rogers answered, denying that the machinery was a part of the realty or subject to the lien of plaintiffs' mortgage, and alleging the purchase by him of the Parke & Lacy Machinery Company. A reply having been filed, the cause was heard before the court, on the 26th of August, 1890, and a decree entered adjudging that the machinery was not part of the real estate described in plaintiffs' mortgage, nor subject to the lien thereof; and hence this appeal.

H. K. Hanna and Francis Fitch, for appellants. Hammond & Briggs, for respondents.

BEAN, J., (after stating the facts as above.) This case comes here on appeal from an order denying a preliminary injunction. The record is in a very unsatisfactory condition. In place of trying the issue between the parties in the original suit to foreclose plaintiffs' mortgage, as it should have been done, it seems it was tried in a proceeding for a preliminary injunction in aid of the original suit. In this proceeding the court, after hearing the evidence, not only denied the writ, but entered a decree determining the question as to whether the property in controversy was subject to the lien of plaintiffs' mortgage, thereby splitting up the original cause of suit,—in the original suit entering a decree foreclosing the mortgage, and ordering the real property sold to satisfy the amount due plaintiff, and in the ancillary proceedings for an injunction determining the question as to whether the machinery was part of such realty, where the entire question should have been put in issue either by the original or an amended complaint, and determined by one decree. A preliminary injunction is only a provisional remedy, the sole object of which is to preserve the subject in controversy in its then condition, and, without determining any question of right, merely to prevent the further perpetration of wrong, or the doing of any act whereby the right in controversy may be materially injured or endangered. In granting or refusing temporary relief by preliminary injunction, courts of equity should in no manner anticipate the ultimate determination of the question of right involved. They should merely recognize that a sufficient case has or has not been made out to warrant the preservation of the property or rights in statu quo until a hearing upon the merits, without expressing a final opinion as to such rights. 1 High. Inj. §§ 4, 5; Hill's Ann. Laws, §§ 408, 411. The granting or refusing such an injunction rests largely within the discretion of the court, and, being merely an interlocutory order, made during the progress of the cause, does not, ordinarily, partake of the nature of a final judgment or decree, to such an extent as to warrant an appeal therefrom. 2 High. Inj. § 1693. But in this case the court not only refused the injunction, but entered a decree settling the rights of the parties, and, in effect, determined the suit, so as to prevent a decree therein, so far as this machinery is concerned; and therefore it must necessarily be an appealable order or decree, under section 535, Hill's Ann. Laws; Smith v. Walker, 57 Mich. 456, 22 N. W. Rep. 267, 24 N. W. Rep. 830, and 26 N. W. Rep. 783; Toledo, A. A. & N. M. Ry. Co. v. Detroit, L. & N. R. Co., 61 Mich. 9, 27 N. W. Rep. 715. From what has already been said it follows that so much of the decree of the court below as adjudges and decrees "that the machinery referred to and described in plaintiffs' complaint for injunction is not a part of the real estate in controversy in this suit, and not included in plaintiffs' mortgage," must be reversed. But since the question seems to have been determined in the court below, on a full hearing of the evidence, which is made a part of the transcript, and both parties expressed a desire on the argument that we should examine the case on its merits, we have concluded to do so.

It is argued for respondents that, under the agreement between the Parke & Lacy Machinery Company and Gilroy & Yule, the machinery in controversy did not become "fixtures," but retained its character as chattels, notwithstanding its annexation to the building in which it was placed, and was therefore not subject to the lien of plaintiff's mortgage. Before discussing this question, it will be well to understand the relationship of the parties to this record. The defendant Rogers, who alone is contesting plaintiffs' claim, is the assignee of the defendant Gilroy, plaintiffs' mortgagor, under the general assignment law of this state. As such assignee, he succeeds only to the rights of his assignor, and is affected by all the equities existing as against him. He takes the property subject to all existing valid liens and charges. He acquires no better title than his assignor, and, in this suit, can make no defense to the mortgage that his assignor could not make. Jacobs v. Ervin, 9 Or. 57; Gammons v. Holman, 11 Or. 254, 3 Pac. Rep. 676; Burrill, Assignm. § 391. The fact that he may have paid the Parke & Lacy Machinery Company with funds belonging to him, as assignee, the balance due to it from Gilroy & Yule on the purchase price of the machinery, does not change his relationship to the property in any way. It is, in effect, the same as if Gilroy himself had made the payment. He does not acquire title to this property by virtue of the bill of sale from the Parke & Lacy Machinery Company, but by virtue of the deed of assignment from Gilroy. While the agreement between the Parke & Lacy Machinery Company and Gilroy & Yule was, in form, a lease, it was, in effect, a sale, and whatever rights, if any, the company may have had, as against this property, was never asserted by it. It follows, therefore, that if the property in controversy was subject to the lien of plaintiffs' mortgage, as between them and Gilroy, such lien exists as against this defendant. The question, then, as to whether this machinery became a "fixture" as to the Parke & Lacy Machinery Company is immaterial in this case, and we forbear to express any opinion thereon. It has often been remarked that the law of "fixtures" is one of the most uncertain titles in the entire body of jurisprudence. The line between personal property and fixtures is often so close and so nicely drawn that no precise rule has or can be laid down to control in all cases. Each case must depend largely on its own particular facts. The reports and text-books are filled with decisions and discussions of this question, but none of the rules laid down are infallible, or of universal application. We shall not attempt to quote from them, nor enter into any detailed discussion of the question. We could not hope to throw any new light upon the vexed question. The weight of modern authority, keeping in mind the exceptions as to constructive annexation admitted by all the authorities to exist, seems to establish the doctrine that the true criterion of an irremovable fixture consists in the united application of several tests: (1) Real or constructive annexation of the article in question to the realty; (2) appropriation or adaptation to the use or purpose of that part of the realty with which it is connected; (3) the intention of the party making the annexation to make the article a permanent accession to the freehold, this intention being inferred from the nature of the article affixed, the relation and situation of the party making the annexation, and the policy of the law in relation thereto, the structure and mode of the annexation, and the purpose or use for which the annexation has been made. Henkle v. Dillon, 15 Or. 610, 17 Pac. Rep. 148; Ewell, Fixt. 21; Teaff v. Hewitt, 1 Ohio St. 530; Thomas v. Davis, 76 Mo. 72; Clore v. Lambert, 78 Ky. 224; Southbridge Sav. Bank v. Stevens Tool Co., 130 Mass. 547. Applying these rules to the facts in hand, it is clear that the property in controversy, as between the mortgagor and mortgagee, must be regarded as "fixtures." Its annexation to the realty was sufficiently permanent to enable it to be used for the purposes intended, and was of the character usual with such machinery. It is true the screws and bolts with which it was annexed could have been taken out, and the machinery removed, without serious damage to it or the building, but so, no doubt, could have been the doors and windows. It was, in its very nature, adapted to the business for which the land was used. The party making the annexation must have intended that it should remain as long as it continued servicable, as the convenience and usefulness of the property would have been seriously impaired by its removal. So much of the decree of the court below as adjudges and decrees that the machinery in controversy is not part of the realty, and not subject to the lien of plaintiffs' mortgage, is therefore reversed.

EJECTMENT—EVIDENCE—MAP—PAROL EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. In an action of ejectment, a map or diagram of the premises in controversy, made by a competent surveyor who had surveyed the premises, is competent evidence. It is explanatory of the survey of the premises.

2. A deed which does not refer to a particular survey, that is unambiguous in its terms, cannot be enlarged, changed, or in any manner modified by the introduction of parol evidence tending to prove that one of the parties to it understood its descriptive words to have reference to a particular private survey.

3. It is not error in the trial court to refuse to give instructions which are inapplicable to the case made by the pleadings or to the facts disclosed by the evidence, though correct as abstract propositions of law.

4. In an action of ejectment, it is not error to refuse an instruction asked by the defendant in relation to the statute of limitations, where there is no evidence before the jury tending to prove that the possession of the defendant had been adverse to the true owner for at least 10 years.

Appeal from circuit court, Marion county; R. P. BOISE, Judge.

This is an action of ejectment to recover two small parcels of real estate situate in Marion county, Or., in which it is alleged the plaintiff owns an undivided interest as a tenant in common with certain others who are named in the complaint. The complaint is in the usual form in such case. The answer denies the allegations of the complaint specifically, and then pleads title in the defendant C. W. McCown as to each parcel. The answer further alleges, as a separate defense, that 22 years ago said lands were surveyed by the deputy United States surveyor John W. Meldrum, while acting in his official capacity as such surveyor, and that at the time said survey was made said deputy-surveyor, at the request of the parties then owning said lands, made a survey of various tracts, and among them, at the special instance and request of C. McCown and Josiah Franklin, said John W. Meldrum, as such officer, made an actual survey of the lands in question, and established the center of section 7, township 7 S., range 2 E., at the point claimed and owned by the defendant C. W. McCown; and said lands above described, and the whole thereof, were fenced by the said defendant C. W. McCown when he became the purchaser thereof; and the greater part of the same has been under fence ever since said time, and has always been claimed and owned by the defendant C. W. McCown, and his grantors, ever since; and in all transfers said center corner of said section, as established by said John W. Meldrum, was and is the legal monument which has been known and used by all parties as the center of said section of said township, and all parties interested have conformed thereto without question up to the time of the commencement of this action. Then follows a separate defense of the statute of limitations. The reply denies the new matter in the answer. Both parties claim to deraign title from one Labam Maulding. The plaintiff's deeds from Maulding are dated April and May, 1887, and convey the land by legal subdivisions, being "the N. E. qr. of the N. W. qr., and the S. E. qr. of the N. W. qr., and the N. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. E. qr., of section 7, T. 7 S., R. 2 east, of Willamette meridian, and in Marion county, state of Oregon." The defendant claims under a deed from Maulding dated February, 1884, in which the land conveyed is described as follows: "Commencing in the center of section 7, township 7 S., R. 2 east, W. M., county of Marion, state of Oregon, running thence east 240 rods, north 80 rods, thence west 240 rods, thence south 80 rods, to the place of beginning, containing 120 acres." Other facts appear in the opinion.

STRAHAN, C. J., (after stating the facts as above.) The points argued on the appeal will be noticed in the order in which they were presented.

1. A map of section 7, drawn by two surveyors and testified to by them to be correct, was used upon the trial before the jury without objection; but before the plaintiff closed his case this map was offered in evidence and allowed by the court, to which an exception was taken. Counsel for appellant argue in their brief: "A diagram or a map would be a continual or constant witness always in the presence of the jury. It is the testimony of the witnesses that is the evidence, and that alone. You cannot manufacture evidence by giving a diagram or picture of anything. It can be referred to only for the purpose of demonstration." This reasoning is not supported by authority. On the contrary, the rule constantly observed in practice in this state as well as the one more in consonance with reason is the other way. It was held in Hoey v. Furman, 1 Pa. St. 295, that the draft of a survey proved to be correct is admissible in evidence, as explanatory of what the surveyor testified he had done in making the survey. The following cases authorize the introduction of maps and diagrams in evidence: Stouter v. Railway Co., 6 N. Y. Supp. 163; Goodwin v. McCabe, 75 Cal. 584, 17 Pac. Rep. 705; Tillotson v. Prichard, 60 Vt. 94, 14 Atl. Rep. 302; Armendaz v. Stillman, (Tex.) 3 S. W. Rep. 678; Archer v. Railroad Co., (N. Y.) 13 N. E. Rep. 318; Brown v. Tile Co., (Ill.) 24 N. E. Rep. 522.

In the two following cases, photographs of the locus in quo were admitted in evidence: Dyson v. Railroad Co., 57 Conn. 9, 17 Atl. Rep. 137; Archer v. Railroad Co., (N. Y.) 13 N. E. Rep. 318.

2. The next error assigned is the refusal of the court to give instructions numbered 1, 2, and 3, asked by the appellant. The first instruction refused is as follows: "In this case there is some testimony tending to show that, something over 22 years ago, Mr. Meldrum, at the instance of interested parties, run a line, and established what he represented to be the center of section 7, township 7 S., range 2 E., which is the section in which the land in controversy is situated. There is some testimony tending to show that when the defendant purchased his land, part of which is the subject of this controversy, from Mr. Maulding, he purchased with reference to the said center as established by Meldrum, making that the initial point intended by his deed. I instruct you if you find from the evidence that said Maulding sold said land to the defendant with reference to said line as run by Meldrum to the terminus of the same in the center of the section, and put him in possession of the said land so sold, and allotted to him by measurement, then the plaintiff cannot recover." There is not a syllable in Maulding's deed in reference to the Meldrum survey. On the contrary, the initial point mentioned in the deed is the center of the section without reference to Meldrum's survey. If appellant's contention were to be sustained, the effect would be to introduce additional words in the descriptive part of the deed by parol evidence, which would necessarily give it a different effect from what the language actually used could have, and different from what the maker says he intended. This would clearly be inadmissible where there is no mistake or imperfection in the deed alleged in the pleadings. A question was suggested on the argument whether or not there is enough shown in the evidence to bring the case within the principle of the dictum in Spaar v. McBee, 19 Or. 76, 23 Pac. Rep. 818; but a careful examination of the pleadings and evidence satisfies us that question is not presented. If the defendant had relied upon an equitable title created by a mistake in the description in his deed, since the amendment of the statute referred to in Spaar v. McBee, supra, we must have allowed that defense to have prevailed if the jury, under proper instructions, had been of the opinion that it was made out by the evidence. But that is not the defense relied upon here. The appellant's line of defense is that he has a legal title which can be made to appear by proving the Meldrum survey, and then supplementing that by parol evidence that the deed was executed with reference to that survey. Under the view we take of this case, the court did not err in refusing to give this instruction.

3. The second instruction, which was refused by the court, is as follows: "Under the law applicable to cases of this kind, a grantee cannot be put in a better condition than his grantor was at the time of executing the grant, and, if Maulding sold the land in controversy by warranty deed to the defendant, and put defendant in possession of the same, and described it by metes and bounds in the deeds, then and thereafter Maulding had nothing in said land to convey, and the plaintiff took nothing by operation of any deed which he received from Maulding purporting to convey the same lands which he had subsequently [previously?] deeded to the defendant; and I leave it to you to say whether, as a matter of fact, Maulding did deed by prior conveyance the land in controversy to the defendant." This instruction was inapplicable to the case made by the defendant's pleadings; besides, it is not universally true. A grantee who takes under a warranty deed and for a valuable consideration, without notice of any latent defect in his title, or of any outstanding equity, or of some fraud of his grantor, is always in a better position than his grantor. In such case he takes the estate discharged of the equity with which it was incumbered in the hands of his grantor. Whether the plaintiff stood in such relation to the property we cannot inquire, because the question is not before us; and for that reason the instruction was inapplicable, and was properly refused.

4. The third instruction which was asked by counsel, and refused by the court, is as follows: "I instruct you that if the lands in controversy were intended to be conveyed and were conveyed by said Maulding to the defendant by a prior conveyance, and you find from the testimony that the defendant and Maulding, who was his grantor, was in the peaceable occupation of the particular premises in controversy for a period of ten years or more prior to the commencement of this suit, then the plaintiff is barred by the statute of limitations, and you should return a verdict in favor of the defendant." There is much confusion in this instruction. By the first part of it the appellant apparently wished to submit to the jury the legal effect of Maulding's deed. If the lands in controversy were conveyed by Maulding by prior conveyance, the plaintiff could not recover, without any regard whatever to the statute of limitations. On the other hand, if the defendant thought that his possession was protected by the statute of limitations, it was his right to ask the court to define to the jury what would constitute adverse possession, and how long it must continue to bar an entry. Again, if the appellant's defense rested on his deed, he had the right, and it would have been the duty of the court to have declared its legal effect, and the jury would have been bound by that declaration. The instruction under consideration did neither, and we think was properly refused. It is proper to add that it was properly refused for another reason. The defendant's possession was only seven years, and he was not in privity with any other person who had held adversely to the true owner for the other requisite three years to complete the statutory bar. If, therefore, the instruction under consideration had stated a correct proposition of law in a proper case, it was inapplicable to the facts of this case. These conclusions are reached with the less hesitancy for the reason that it seems to be tacitly conceded that, if the calls in defendant's deed are followed, he is without title to the land in controversy. On the other hand, if he has an equitable title, the result of this litigation will not bar it. Let the judgment appealed from be affirmed.

SPEAKE et al. v. HAMILTON et al.

WATER-RIGHTS — APPROPRIATION ON THE PUBLIC LANDS.

A person has the right to go upon the public lands of the United States, and to appropriate the waters to the purposes of mining, milling, agriculture, or any other lawful purpose, and priority of appropriation gives priority of right, and the rights of the riparian owners, when they attach, are subject to the rights thus acquired.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from circuit court, Baker county; JAMES A. FEE, Judge.

The complaint alleges that in the year 1877 the plaintiffs, and a grantor of the plaintiffs, Mary H. Speake, appropriated 60 inches of the waters of Fox creek for mining, mechanical, and agricultural purposes; that said appropriation was prior in time and right to all other appropriations, except to 15 inches owned by the defendants Hamilton; that in the same year they dug a ditch of sufficient capacity to take and carry away said waters to the lands of the plaintiffs, and used the same for mining and agricultural purposes; and that the plaintiffs and their grantors have used said water ever since said date; that Mary H. Speake is the owner of five-eighths of said ditch and water, and that William H. Speake is the owner of three-eighths of said ditch and water. The answer denies all the allegations of the complaint, and then sets forth that the defendants W. B. and A. N. Hamilton are joint owners in certain farming lands in Baker county, Or., through which said Fox creek flows, in a well-defined channel, for about one-half mile; that said lands will produce no crops without irrigation; that the water of Fox creek is the only water supply to be had on said premises for either domestic or irrigating purposes; that the defendants Hamilton have growing on their said lands about 3,000 fruit-trees, and 100 acres of said lands are under cultivation; that they and their grantors, for 18 years last past, have been riparian owners of the stream, and have used the waters of Fox creek each year during all that time; that, in the year 1875, the ditch claimed by the plaintiffs was dug to carry the waters from Fox creek to certain placer mines on Hibbard creek, known as the "Hibbard Creek" or "Speake and Campbell" diggings, and said ditch was to take the surplus waters of Fox creek only; that said waters were taken by the plaintiffs and their predecessors in interest, by and with the consent of defendants' grantors, for mining purposes only, and that when said mine was worked out all the waters of said creek were to come back to the channel of said creek, and that, at all times when the waters of said creek were not used at the mine, they were to flow in the channel of said creek; that said mines have long since been worked out, and that all said water ought to flow in the channel of said creek; that, shortly prior to the acts of trespass complained of by plaintiffs, said plaintiffs had obtained permission of the defendants to use, for irrigating, a part of the waters of the creek through the old mining ditch, and that, under cover and guise of such permission, plaintiffs took all the water of the creek, and totally deprived the defendants thereof, leaving their crops and domestic animals to suffer. The defendants Hamilton then allege that they and the other defendants, their employees, went up to the point where the plaintiffs were wrongfully diverting the water, and turned it back into the channel of the stream, and that, at the time they so restored the water by the plaintiffs so wrongfully diverted, there were only about 20 inches all told in the creek, and that he needed it all for his use at his farm, and that said acts last named are the trespass complained of, and not otherwise. The reply denies the new matter in the answer. The court found that the plaintiffs were entitled to one-half the water in said creek, and the defendants Hamilton were entitled to the other one-half thereof, and entered a decree accordingly, from which decree the defendants Hamilton appeal.

M. L. Olmsted, for appellants. J. J. Balleray, for respondents.

STRAHAN, C. J., (after stating the facts as above.) For all the purposes of this case, it may be assumed, and I think the facts sufficiently appear from the record, that the land on Fox creek, in the year 1877, was all public lands of the United States; that Fox creek was a small stream, carrying not more than 120 inches of water upon an average; that some of the predecessors in interest of the appellants had diverted about 20 inches of water from said stream prior to 1877, and that the appellants have succeeded to whatever interest the said original appropriators had therein; that, about the year 1877, the plaintiffs or their grantors appropriated 60 inches of water from said stream, which was first used for mining purposes, and afterwards for the purposes of irrigation, for agricultural purposes, and for other purposes; that, for the purposes of appropriating and utilizing said 60 inches of water, the plaintiffs or their predecessors in interest dug a ditch of sufficient capacity to carry said water so appropriated to the plaintiffs' land, and that the grantors of the plaintiffs and plaintiffs have used said water without interruption, except the acts complained of herein, continuously since that time. I think it also sufficiently appears that, at the time of the alleged interruption of the use of said water by the defendants, there were only about 20 inches of water flowing in said stream, all of which was, by the plaintiffs' dam, diverted into their said ditch; and that what the defendants did was to cut a trench around said dam of sufficient depth to allow all of said water then in said stream to flow back into and down the channel thereof. It also appears that, after said water-rights accrued, one of said plaintiffs and one of the defendants acquired homesteads under the laws of the United States, on the respective places where they now reside, and that they have, respectively, perfected their titles thereto; and that the defendants' claim lies on both sides of said Fox creek, at a point below where the plaintiffs' ditch diverts said water. The defendants claim a right by appropriation, and also as riparian owners. They also claim that the plaintiffs can have no right to said water, unless it be by some special usage or custom, which must be pleaded and proven.

1. It is useless to discuss, at this day, the origin of the doctrine which prevails in all the Pacific states and territories in relation to the appropriation of water on the public lands of the United States for mining, milling, agricultural, and other lawful purposes. Its appropriation was first made for mining purposes, and was, step by step, extended until appropriations were made for any lawful uses to which the water might be applied. Vast properties were thus developed and grew up under this system until the courts were compelled to recognize and protect the rights thus acquired. It was claimed that the United States, by acquiescence, had given an implied license to make such appropriations, and, recognizing the justice of this claim, congress passed the act of July 26, 1866. By that act it was provided: "Whenever, by priority of possession, rights to the use of water for mining, agricultural, manufacturing, or other purposes have vested and accrued, and the same are recognized and acknowledged by the local customs, laws, and decisions of courts, the possessors and owners of such vested rights shall be maintained and respected in the same; and the right of way for the construction of ditches and canals, for the purposes herein specified, is acknowledged and confirmed." Rev. St. U. S. § 2339. And by act of July 9, 1870, congress further provided: "All patents granted, or pre-emptions or homesteads allowed, shall be subjected to any vested and accrued water-rights, or rights to ditches and reservoirs used in connection with such water-rights, as may have been acquired under or recognized by the preceding section." Rev. St. U. S. § 2340. In 1874 the case of Atchison v. Peterson, 20 Wall. 507, came before the supreme court of the United States. It involved the right to appropriate water for mining purposes, and the court declared that, "by custom which had obtained among miners in the Pacific states and territories, where mining for the precious metals is had on the public lands of the United States, the first appropriator of mines, whether in placers, veins, or lodes, or of waters in the streams on such lands for mining purposes, is held to have a better right than others to work the mines or use the waters. The first appropriator who subjects the property to use, or takes the necessary steps for that purpose, is regarded, except as against the government, as the source of title in all controversies relating to the property." And in Basey v. Gallagher, Id. 670, the right to appropriate water for the purposes of irrigation was upheld. In the head-note to that case it is said: "In the Pacific states and territories, a right to the running waters on the public lands of the United States, for the purposes of irrigation, may be acquired by prior appropriation, as against parties not having the title of the government. The right, exercised within reasonable limits, having reference to the condition of the country and the necessities of the community, is entitled to protection." And Mr. Justice FIELD, speaking for the court, said: "No distinction is made in those states and territories by the custom of miners and settlers, or by the courts, in the rights of the first appropriator from the use made of the water, if the use be a beneficial one." A long array of authorities might be cited, from all the Pacific states and territories, but these from the highest court in the land must suffice. But it is said by the appellant that this right has its foundation in some particular usage or custom which ought to be pleaded and proven. No doubt it had its origin in usage or custom among miners, but that usage has grown to be a part of the public history of the states and territories where it prevails, and is of such universal application that the courts must take notice of it, and they do that by recognizing and protecting the right. This I understand to be one of the ways in which this customary law may be shown. On this very point it is said in Basey v. Gallagher, supra: "It is very evident that congress intended, although the language used is not happy, to recognize as valid the customary law, with respect to the use of water, which had grown up among the occupants of the public lands under the peculiar necessities of their condition, and that law may be shown by evidence of the local customs, or by the legislation of the state or territory, or the decisions of the courts. The union of the three conditions in any particular case is not essential to the perfection of the right of priority." These rights have been constantly recognized in the courts of this state, whenever they have been assailed or questioned. The principle upon which these rights depend was fully approved and sanctioned by this court in Kaler v. Campbell, 13 Or. 596, 11 Pac. Rep. 301. The complaint admits that the appellants are entitled to 15 inches before the plaintiffs are entitled to take any water from said stream, and that the appellants, and those under whom they claim, acquired this right by appropriation prior in time to the plaintiffs'. The decree will be framed in accordance with this admission. The plaintiffs are next entitled to 60 inches of water to be taken out of said stream, and conveyed to their premises by means of the ditch mentioned in the complaint, and the appellants, their agents and servants, will be enjoined perpetually from interfering with the plaintiffs in the use of said water; and that the appellants' predecessors in interest had appropriated the residue of said water, to whose rights the appellants have succeeded. Of course, what is here said only applies to the facts disclosed by this record and the parties before the court, and could in no wise affect the rights of persons not parties to this suit. The plaintiffs obstructed the appellants in the use of the 15 inches of water to which they admit defendants had a prior right, and in that particular they were not without fault. It further appears that the rights of the parties had become seriously complicated, and perhaps could only be definitely ascertained and declared by means of a suit. Under all the circumstances, therefore, we have concluded that each party to this suit ought to pay one-half of all the costs thereof. The decree of the court below will be modified in accordance with this opinion.

Decree affirmed, upon rehearing, May, 1891.

HOME MUT. INS. CO. v. OREGON RY. & NAV. CO.

FIRE INSURANCE—SUBROGATION OF INSURER—ACTION—PARTIES.

Where property is insured for less than its value, and is destroyed by the negligence of a third party, the insurance companies who have paid the owner the insurance money must, in an action to recover damages for the destruction of the property, be joined with the owner, or if he refuses to join he must be made a party defendant, under the provision of the Oregon Code that an action shall be brought in the name of the real party.

Appeal from circuit court, Multnomah county; E. D. SHATTUCK, Judge.

The complaint states in substance that on the 30th day of April, 1888, the plaintiff had executed to one J. H. Koontz three insurance policies for the aggregate amount of $20,000 on his mill and its contents at Echo, Or.; that on that date the said mill and its contents were totally destroyed by fire caused by the negligence of the defendant; that on May 22, 1888, and June 1, 1888, upon proof of loss, the plaintiff paid said Koontz the amount of said policies in full; and that the value of said property so destroyed was the sum of $39,361.72. Judgment is asked for the full sum of $19,888.14 and interest, and for costs and disbursements. The defendant, after denying the material facts as alleged, set up as a defense, in substance, that on the 21st day of December, 1888, the said Koontz commenced his action against defendant in the circuit court for Umatilla county for the recovery of the sum of $39,361.72 as damages for the destruction of said mill and its contents, and that subsequently a verdict was rendered therein by the jury in favor of said Koontz for the sum of $17,500, which was affirmed on appeal to the supreme court, and that the defendant thereafter in that action paid the said Koontz the amount so found as damages for the destruction of said property, and that by reason thereof the said Koontz was fully compensated for the total amount of the injury to him caused by the defendant, and that said Koontz holds said money in trust for the use and benefit of the plaintiff, etc. And the defendant set up as a further defense that, prior to the commencement of the action of said Koontz against the defendant herein, the plaintiff herein, the Home Mutual Fire Insurance Company, had full knowledge of the circumstances of the destruction of said property, and that an action was about to be commenced by the said Koontz against said railroad company to recover damages for such loss, and was notified by said Koontz and his attorneys of such fact, and was requested by them to prosecute, or join with him in prosecuting, the action against the said company; that the said insurance company neglected and refused to prosecute either severally or jointly with said Koontz, and disclaimed all interest therein, and permitted said action to be prosecuted alone by said Koontz against said railroad company. The defendants in the present action allege that at the time of the commencement of said action, and until after the trial thereof as aforesaid, neither of the defendants had any knowledge that the property alleged to have been destroyed was insured in the plaintiff company, or that said Koontz had received any sum whatever on account of said loss; that after the judgment was recovered, and while said action was pending upon appeal, the defendants for the first time became aware of the fact that the property was insured in said company, and immediately notified the insurance company of the recovery of the judgment in favor of Koontz, and requested it to take such steps as it might deem necessary to protect any interest or claim upon the proceeds of the judgment which it might have; that the insurance company, upon the receipt of such notice, disclaimed any right, title, or interest in the said judgment in favor of Koontz, or the proceeds thereof, and declined to take any steps, legally or otherwise; that by reason of the failure of the insurance company to unite with the said Koontz in the prosecution of said action, and failure to disclose their interest and to take any steps to prevent the collection of said judgment, whereby Koontz was permitted to receive the entire proceeds of said judgment, the insurance company was guilty of a fraud upon the rights of the defendant, and is estopped from prosecuting this action. To these last two defenses, the plaintiff demurred that they were insufficient to constitute a defense, which being overruled by the trial court, the appeal is taken from the judgment rendered therein.

LORD, J., (afte. stating the facts as above.) The question presented by the contention for the plaintiff is that, if a loss under a policy of fire insurance is caused by the wrongful act of a third person, the insurer, upon making payment to the insured pro tanto, is subrogated to the rights and remedies of the insured and may maintain against the wrong-doer an action in his own name, and need not prosecute it in the name of the insured. This action is brought by the plaintiff in its own right upon the assumption that the effect of the insurance was to create in the plaintiff a pecuniary interest in the property insured, and that when it was destroyed by the wrongful act of the defendants, whereby it became liable and was required to pay for the loss to the extent of the insurance to the insured, it became entitled to a legal remedy against the defendants in its own independent right to the extent which it was compelled to pay for such loss occasioned by the defendant's wrongful act. This involves an inquiry into the nature of the rights which the insurer acquires upon the payment of the insurance for a loss caused by the wrongful act of a third person.

The right of the insurance company that has paid a loss to recover of the wrong-doer after payment of such loss rests upon the doctrine of subrogation, in its application to insurance companies. "Every day," said Lord MANSFIELD, "the insurer is put in the place of the insured." Mason v. Sainsbury, 3 Doug. 63. Subrogation is purely an equitable result. It is the creation of equity, is not dependent on contract, and is enforced for the purpose of attaining the ends of justice. It grows out of the relation which the parties sustain to each other; the party subrogated acquires no other or greater rights than those of the party for whom he is substituted. As the contract of insurance is one of indemnity, when a loss occurs by the negligent or wrongful act of a third party, and the insurer pays the insured, he is entitled upon equitable principles to be subrogated to the rights of the insured against the wrong-doer. Hence the general rule that when property which has been insured is lost or destroyed by the negligent or willful act of another an action accrues in favor of the insured, and if the insurer pays the loss he is subrogated to the rights of the insured as against the wrong-doer, with all his rights as well as his remedies.

"Where the property insured," says Mr. Wood, "is destroyed by the negligence of a third person, so that the assured has a remedy against him therefor, the insurer by payment of the loss becomes subrogated to the rights of the assured to the extent of the sum paid under the policy. The assured becomes trustee for the insurer, and by necessary implication the payment of the loss operates as an equitable assignment to the insurer to the extent of the sum paid under the policy." Wood, Ins. § 499. The owner and insurer, in respect to the ownership of the property and the risk incident thereto, are considered but one person, having together the beneficial right to an indemnity against the wrong-doer whose negligent act occasioned the loss or destruction of the property. The liability of such wrong-doer to the owner is first and principal, and that of the insurer secondary; not in order of time, but of ultimate liability. Hart v. Railroad Corp., 13 Metc. (Mass.) 99; Hall v. Railroad Cos., 13 Wall. 370. The insurer standing in no relation of contract or privity with those who are responsible for the loss, his rights arise out of his contract of indemnity, and are derived from the assured.

alone, and can only be enforced in the right of the latter. "In any form of remedy," says Mr. Justice GRAY, "the insurer can take nothing by subrogation but the rights of the assured." Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Erie, etc., Transp. Co., 117 U. S. 321, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 750, 1176. The reason for the doctrine that the insurer must enforce his rights in the name of the owner against the wrong-doer, or party first liable as principal, TENNEY, J., said, was "wholly inconsistent with the principle that the insurer can in his own name recover for money paid on the contract of insurance in an action against the wrong-doer, for, the insurer and assured being in effect one person, each cannot maintain an action at the same time and for the same loss where there can be but one satisfaction." Insurance Co. v. Bosher, 39 Me. 256. "It has long been settled," said DYER, J., "both in England and in this country, that such a cause of action is single and indivisible, and that in a caselike the present the insurer could not at common law sue the wrong-doer in his own name to recover the amount paid the assured, but must bring this action in the name of the assured." First Presbyterian Soc. v. Goodrich Transp. Co., 7 Fed. Rep. 258. Where the insurance company has paid the owner for the destruction of his property by fire occasioned by the fault of a railroad company, and afterwards the owner receives the amount from the company in satisfaction of his damages, he holds it in trust for the insurance company, and it may recover it from him by a suit in equity. So, too, if the railroad company has not paid the owner his damages for the loss, or has paid it to him, knowing that he had received the amount of the insurance from the insurance company, the railroad company is liable to the insurance company in an action at law, which it has a right to bring in the name of the owner, without his consent, to repay it the damages to the amount of the sum paid by it, and that a release from the owner would be no defense to such an action. Monmouth, etc., Ins. Co. v. Hutchinson, etc., Transp. Co., 21 N.J. Eq. 108. The subrogation of the insurer to the remedies of the insured for the destruction of the insured property upon the payment of the loss operates as an equitable assignment to the insurer to the extent of the amount paid. "It is in the nature," said SHAW, C. J., "of an equitable assignment, which authorizes the assignee to sue in the name of the assignor for his own benefit." Hart v. Railroad Corp., supra.

It results, then, that the right, resting on the doctrine of subrogation and not depending upon contract or privity, must be worked out through the right of the insured or the owner of the property destroyed; that the remedy must be prosecuted in his name, unless the Code of Procedure, which permits an action to be brought in the name of the real party, has changed this rule. The case of Connecticut Fire Ins. Co. v. Erie Ry. Co., 73 N. Y. 399, is relied upon to support this position. But in that case the owner had fully settled his claim against the railroad company, but the contract showed that the amount of the policy was deducted from the amount of the loss in the settlement, so that the insurance company was the only remaining party in interest. The action being under the Code of that state, which requires the action to be brought in the name of the real party in interest, by this settlement, the owner having no interest, it was held that the insurance company might properly bring the action. In Ætna Ins. Co. v. Hannibal, etc., Ry. Co., 3 Dill. 1, it was held by DILLON, J., that, in a case where the property destroyed exceeded in value the amount insured, the rule of law had long been settled that the insurance company, on the payment of the loss, cannot sue the wrong-doer in his own name, saying: "The suit, though for the use of the insurer, must be in the name of the person whose property was destroyed. The wrongful act was single and indivisible, and gave rise to but one liability. If one insurer may sue, then, if there are a dozen, each may sue, and, if the aggregate amount of all the policies falls short of the actual loss, the owner could sue for the balance. This is not permitted, and so it was held nearly a hundred years ago." And again: "But it is insisted that the provision of the Missouri statute that every action shall be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, though it declares that the provision shall not authorize the assignment of a thing in action not arising out of contract, changes the rule. However it might be if the amount paid by the insurer to the assured had equalled or exceeded the value of the property, and the assured had made a full assignment, it is plain that this case falls within the reasons of the rule itself as expounded by BULLER and MANSFIELD in the Case in Douglas, above cited, and which is the foundation of the law on this subject." In Marine Ins. Co. v. St. Louis, etc., Ry. Co., 41 Fed. Rep. 644, it was held, under the Arkansas statute providing that "every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest," that an insurance company which has paid the insured the full value of the property destroyed may maintain an action in his own name against the wrong-doer causing the loss. CALDWELL, J. said: "Under the reformed Codes of Procedure, the action of the insurance company, in cases of this sort, may be brought in the name of the insurer, [citing Swarthout v. Railway Co., 49 Wis. 625, 6 N. W. Rep. 314; Connecticut Fire Ins. Co. v. Erie Ry. Co., 73 N. Y. 405.] But, as it is alleged in the complaint that the plaintiff has paid the insured the full value of the property destroyed, it is plain that the latter have no interest in the present controversy, and hence they are not necessary parties." The opinion is, however, expressed in that case, if the value of the property destroyed exceeds the insurance money paid, that the insurer might join or be joined with the owner in the action to recover for its loss, and would not be required, as held by Judge DILLON, supra, in such case, to prosecute the action in the name of the insured. A like view was sustained in Crandall v. Transportation

Co., 16 Fed. Rep. 75, where DYER, J., held that in an action to recover the value of a building destroyed by a fire caused by the alleged negligence of the defendant, the owner of the building and an insurance company that has paid the amount of the insurance of such building, and taken an assignment of the claim from the owner to that extent, may join as parties to the action when the value of the house exceeds the amount for which it was insured. In Swarthout v. Railway Co., several insurance companies united with Swarthout, to whom they had paid the amount of their policies for property destroyed by the negligence of the defendant, in an action to recover for the value of such property. The defendant demurred on the ground that the plaintiffs could not sue in one action, but each must sue separately. The demurrer was overruled, and the correctness of this ruling was the subject of the controversy. The court say: "It is said, if the defendant is liable at all, it is separately and distinctly liable to each insurance company to the amount paid on its policy. But it seems to us that it would be an intolerable rule to allow each insurance company to bring a separate suit. The railroad company might well say, were this attempted: 'The claim is indivisible. There is but one wrongful act complained of, one loss, and one liability.' It might well insist that the whole matter should be litigated in one action. And what objection there can be to allowing the owner to unite with the insurance companies in bringing one action to determine the liability of the defendant, we fail to perceive. Under the old practice the action would probably have been brought in the name of the assured for the benefit of all concerned; but the Code requires the action to be brought in the name of the real party in interest. Now, it appears that Swarthout has made an assignment in writing to each insurance company of a part of his claim against the railroad company for the alleged wrongful destruction of his property. It is obvious, if one of the insurance companies may bring a separate suit for the amount of its claim, each may; and, as the aggregate amount of the policies falls short of the actual loss, Swarthout may sue for the balance. As we have said, a rule of law which would allow this to be done would operate most oppressively upon the railroad companies. For a single wrongful act, which gave rise to but one liability, it might be harassed with a dozen different actions." In a later case, (Pratt v. Radford, 52 Wis. 118, 8 N. W. Rep. 606,) the court, after citing the section of their statute which provides that "every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest," and the further section, that, "of the parties to the action, those who are united in interest must be joined as plaintiffs or defendants, but, if the consent of any one who should be joined as plaintiff cannot be obtained, he may be made a defendant, the reason thereof being stated in the complaint," say: "Under the statutes above cited the insurance companies could maintain an action against such wrong-doer in their own names, or be joined with the insured as plaintiff in such action. * * * Where the common law procedure prevails, the action of the insurance companies would necessarily be brought in the name of the insured. It could be so brought without his consent, and he would have no control over it. But under our Code of Procedure the companies would sue in their own names, joining the insured as plaintiff or making him defendant, according to the exigencies of the case."

It would appear, then, from these last cases, that where the property is insured for less than its value, and is destroyed by the negligence of a third party, the insurance companies, who have paid the owner the insurance money, must be joined with him in an action to recover damages for the destruction of such property, and that, upon a refusal of such parties to join as plaintiffs, they must be made defendants. The action, though, would be brought in their own name, joining the insured as plaintiff or making him defendant, accordingly as he stood related to the facts. From all this the conclusion results that, where the wrongful act is single and indivisible, there can be but one liability or cause of action. Since the Code, the cause of action remains as before, single and indivisible; and the insurer acquires only a right or interest with the owner of the property in the cause of action or liability, and not a new and separate cause of action. He cannot, therefore, sue in his own name alone, in any case, under the Code, except where the amount paid by him has exceeded or equaled the value of the property destroyed, and no interest remains in the owner. When the amount of the insurance money paid is less than the value of the property destroyed by the negligent act, all the authorities agree that the insurer must either sue in the name of the insured or join with him in bringing an action against the wrong-doer. None allow that in such case he can sue in his own name alone, for the reason, that the wrongful act is single and indivisible, and gives rise to but one liability or cause of action. In that cause of action he acquires a joint right with the owner therein, and not a new and separate right of action, and therefore must prosecute it jointly with him. They have a joint interest in a single liability, and, united, are the real parties in interest. Now, the facts disclosed by this record concede that the property destroyed by the wrongful act of the defendant greatly exceeded in value the amount of the insurance money paid by the plaintiff. To the extent of that payment the plaintiff became subrogated to the right of the owner in the property, but the cause of action remained single and indivisible, and the plaintiff acquired only a joint right with the owner therein, and not a new and independent right of action, and could not, therefore, prosecute the action in his own and separate right. Yet this is exactly what the plaintiff has done, and claims it has a right to do. If this were so, it would establish an intolerable rule, and expose the defendant to be harassed by a dozen different actions, which it seems to us would be contrary to legal principles, and be productive of mischief and oppression. The judgment must be affirmed.

RECORD OF PRIVATE CORPORATION—SECONDARY EVIDENCE—JUDGMENT.

1. Before a party can give secondary evidence of the contents of the records of a private corporation, he must show that he cannot produce the original in a reasonable time, and with reasonable diligence.

2. The existence of a judgment or execution cannot be proven by parol, but only in the manner provided in section 730, Hill's Code.

M. L. Olmsted, for appellants. W. B. Gilbert, for respondent.

BEAN, J. Action to recover possession of personal property, both parties claiming title. In November, 1889, the property in controversy belonged to the Eastern Oregon Gold Mining Company, an English corporation operating mines in Baker county. The plaintiff J. R. Bowick, being the general manager of the company, undertook to sell the property to his co-plaintiff, T. G. Rowick, and one Parsons, who were directors of the company, and he now claims to have succeeded by purchase to Parsons' interest in the property. In order to prove the authority of J. R. Bowick to make the sale to his brother and Parsons, plaintiffs, on the trial, offered in evidence what purported to be a copy of the record of the meeting of the directors of the mining company held at the Monumental mine on July 25, 1889, appointing him general manager, with power to buy and sell supplies and machinery at his own discretion. No attempt was made to account for the original record, except that the books of the company and secretary's office were in London; but whether the record of the meeting of the directors held at the mine in July, 1889, when Bowick was appointed general manager, and authorized to sell the property of the company, was at the London office, does not appear. By section 691, Hill's Code, it is provided that "there shall be no evidence of the contents of a writing, other than the writing itself, except in the following cases: * * * When the original cannot be produced by the party by whom the evidence is offered in a reasonable time, with proper diligence, and its absence is not owing to his neglect or default." The record before us does not disclose that any effort whatever was made to procure the original record, and until the diligence required by law is shown, secondary evidence of its contents is not admissible. The fact, if it is a fact, that the original may be in the possession of a person without the jurisdiction of the court, does not excuse a reasonable effort by the party by whom the evidence is offered to procure the original. Wiseman v. Railroad Co., 26 Pac. Rep. 272, (March, 1891, not officially reported.) The next assignment of error is that the defendant was permitted to prove by parol, under plaintiffs' objection, the judgment and execution under which he claims title. It needs no authority or argument to show that such testimony was clearly incompetent, and should not have been admitted. The defendant was claiming title as a purchaser at a sheriff's sale, under an execution issued on a judgment by him recovered against the mining company. The existence of such judgment or execution could not be proven by parol, but only in the manner prescribed in section 730, Hill's Code. Reversed, and new trial ordered, costs to abide the final result.

BARRETT v. FURNISH, Sheriff, et al.

JUDGMENT LIEN—DEATH OF THE PARTY—ISSUANCE OF EXECUTION.

1. Section 269, Hill's Code, makes a judgment, rendered and docketed as therein provided, a lien upon all the real property of the defendant within the county or counties where the same is docketed, or which he may afterwards acquire therein during the time an execution might issue thereon, and such lien is not affected or displaced by the death of the party.

2. When a partnership creditor has, by proceedings at law, acquired a judgment, execution, or other lien upon the separate property of one of the partners, or has taken any proceedings whereby, at law, he has secured the right to appropriate such separate estate to the satisfaction of an obligation incurred by the partnership, equity will not, at the instance of any individual creditor of such individual partner, wrest such right from the partnership creditor, nor compel him to postpone his proceedings until the individual creditors of the partner whose separate estate has been levied upon have first received satisfaction therefrom.

3. Under section 281, Hill's Code, an execution may issue on a judgment rendered against a party in his life-time, notwithstanding his death at any time after six months from the granting of letters testamentary or of administration, and be levied on any real property of the defendant upon which such judgment was a lien.

Appeal from circuit court, Umatilla county; M. D. CLIFFORD, Judge.

The object of this suit is to enjoin the sale of certain real property upon execution owned by John P. Miller in his lifetime. It is alleged that the judgment upon which said execution issued was rendered in the circuit court in favor of one William Noyes and against said John P. Miller, now deceased, and A. B. Robley, formerly partners under the firm name of Miller & Robley, and that said judgment was for a partnership debt; that the plaintiff is administrator of said Miller's estate, and has the same in his possession for the purposes of administration. It is further alleged that said Miller died seised of the real property levied upon, and also owned certain individual property of the value of $1,400, and owed individual debts to the amount of $1,400, and also that he owned an undivided half of all the property of Miller & Robley; that at the time of Miller's death the firm of Miller & Robley were indebted in about the sum of $7,000, and that said A. B. Robley was then and is now the owner in fee of certain real estate in Umatilla county; that said partnership estate is in the hands of the administrator of the partnership, and in course of administration, and is not yet fully administered; that none of the individual debts of Miller have been paid, for the reason that all of the personal estate of said Miller is involved in litigation, and the plaintiff is unable to say when the same will be determined, or whether in favor of or against said estate; that the plaintiff does not know what the costs and expenses of the administration of said individual estate will be, nor whether there will be anything left after paying the individual debts, and the costs and expenses of administration, to apply in payment of the partnership debts; that Ida Miller is the widow of said John P. Miller, and one-third part in value of all said real estate has been set apart to her as her dower by the county court; that Noyes' judgment is a first lien upon the real estate of said A. B. Robley; that, after satisfying all the individual debts of said Miller out of his estate, if any then remain, the balance will be applied to the partnership debts, and then a large part of the partnership debts will remain unpaid; that the individual property of said Robley is much less in value than that of said Miller, and that Robley's real estate, upon which Noyes' judgment is a first lien, is about of the value of $1,000, and that Miller's individual estate is of about the value of $4,000, one-third of which represents the dower of Ida Miller; that Noyes' judgment has never been presented to plaintiff as administrator for approval or rejection. The levy on the property by the sheriff is then alleged, and that the same has been advertised for sale. Various other matters not material to this statement are also alleged. The defendants demurred to the complaint, which being sustained, and final decree entered dismissing the suit, the plaintiff has appealed.

W. F. Butcher, for appellant. J. J. Balleyray, for respondents.

STRAHAN, C. J., (after stating the facts as above.) Several questions were presented on the argument by appellant's counsel, but we will only notice such as we deem material to a proper disposition of this appeal. In Bower v. Holladay, 18 Or. 491, 22 Pac. Rep. 553, this court considered, to some extent, the various sections of the Code in relation to the enforcement of a judgment after the death of the defendant, which was rendered during his life-time, by execution, and the conclusion was reached that the judgment creditor had the right to his execution, at any time after the expiration of six months from the granting of letters testamentary or of administration. Whether the several sections in the Code in relation to the presentment and payment of claims by an executor or administrator, and the order of payment, in any way affect or modify section 281, Hill's Code, which expressly authorizes the issuance of an execution in such case, though somewhat considered, was not decided; nor, in the view we take of this case, is it necessary to be decided here, for the reason that the property levied on is real estate, upon which the judgment became a lien at the time it was docketed, under section 269, Hill's Code. And when such lien attaches it cannot be displaced or affected by the death of the party. The rights of the parties have become fixed by the law, and by the entry and docketing of a judgment pursuant to its provisions, and the accidental circumstances that one of the parties dies before satisfaction of the judgment in no manner impairs or affects the party's rights acquired under it, except to defer its enforcement by the execution for six months after the granting of letters testamentary or of administration. It was insisted by appellant's counsel that the judgment in this case was against Miller and Robley as partners for a partnership debt, and that, therefore, an execution could not be levied upon the individual property of one of the partners until the individual debts of such partner were first paid; but this contention could not prevail without displacing the lien acquired by the docketing of the judgment, under section 269, supra. And this seems to be the effect of the authorities. In a note to McCulloh v. Dashiell's Adm'r, 18 Amer. Dec. 271, the learned annotator observes: "But we apprehend that a levy and sale under a writ, against the members of a copartnership, of the separate property of either member, will pass a title paramount in law to any which can be acquired under a subsequent levy upon the same property, under a writ to enforce the separate and individual debt of the partner to whom the property belonged as his separate estate; and, further, that when a partnership creditor has, by proceedings at law, acquired a judgment, execution, or other lien upon the separate property of one of the partners, or has taken any proceeding whereby at law he has secured the right to appropriate such separate estate to the satisfaction of an obligation incurred by the partnership, equity will not, at the instance of any individual creditor of such individual partner, wrest such right from the partnership creditor, nor compel him to postpone his proceedings until the individual creditors of the partner whose separate estate has been levied upon have first received satisfaction therefrom." And this proposition is supported by a large number of authorities cited at page 283. No doubt cases may arise presenting such persuasive equities that chancery would interfere for the purpose of controlling or preventing an unconscionable use of an execution; but this case is entirely destitute of such equities, and is wholly wanting in any facts or circumstances authorizing or requiring the interposition of equity. It is the ordinary case of a waiting and indulgent creditor, who, having acquired a prior lien upon all the real property of each of the defendants, is now seeking satisfaction by a levy upon the real property of one only of such defendants. No reason has been shown why he may not pursue this remedy. Of course, if the entire claim is collected from Miller's property, his administrator will have a claim for contribution which he may enforce against Robley. This view of the subject disposes of every question necessary to be considered on this appeal, and requires an affirmation of the decree appealed from.

CARROLL V. GILHAM et al.

VENDOR'S LIEN—BONA FIDE PURCHASER.

Facts examined, and held, that defendant is a bona fide purchaser of the property in controversy, for value, without notice of the latent equity set up by the plaintiff, and that the defendant took said property freed from such equity.

Appeal from circuit court, Union county; M. D. CLIFFORD, Judge.

This is a suit to enforce a grantor's lien on real property for the purchase money. One Stansell, in his life-time, sold the real property in controversy to the defendant J. G. Berry, which was about June 17, 1881. Afterwards said Stansell died intestate, in Union county, Or., and the plaintiff was appointed his administrator. At the time of the sale of said land to Berry, he executed his promissory note to said Stansell for $700, due on the 1st day of October, 1882, to secure the purchase money. The defendant demurred to the complaint, which being overruled, Berry refused to answer further. The defendant Gilham filed his separate answer denying the material allegations of the complaint, and then, for a separate defense, pleaded that he was a bona fide purchaser of said premises for value, and without notice of the alleged lien. This part of the answer concisely stated all the facts necessary to protect the interest of defendant as a bona fide purchaser in said premises. He also pleaded the statute of limitations. The cause was referred by the court below, and, the findings of the referee being in favor of the defendant, the same was confirmed by the court, and a final decree entered dismissing the suit, from which the plaintiff has appealed.

J. W. Shelton, for appellant. R. Earkin, for respondents.

STRAHAN, C. J., (after stating the facts as above.) We do not deem it necessary in this case to say anything in relation to the grantor's lien, or whether the defense of the statute of limitation was waived by pleading over. The sole question necessary for us to determine arises upon the separate answer of the defendant Gilham. That answer brings defendant within the principles of law defining a bona fide purchase, for value, without notice, heretofore stated and recognized in several cases in this court, (Wood v. Rayburn, 18 Or. 3, 22 Pac. Rep. 521; Weber v. Rothchild, 15 Or. 385, 15 Pac. Rep. 650; Hyland v. Hyland, 19 Or. 51, 23 Pac. Rep. 811;) and the only question under these authorities is one of fact. We have carefully looked into the evidence, and think the defendant has fully and satisfactorily sustained his plea. The evidence shows that Berry was in possession of the premises at the time he sold to the defendant under a warranty deed from Stansell; that he sold the same to Gilham, and gave a warranty deed therefor, and that defendant entered into possession thereunder, and paid the consideration agreed upon, which was $1,200; that at no time before or pending any of said negotiations or proceedings did the defendant have any notice of the fact that Berry had not paid the purchase price of said land. Under these facts, we have no hesitancy in saying Gilham is a bona fide purchaser, and is entitled to be protected. We have assumed, without deciding, that the grantor's lien exists in this state, but as to that the members of the court are not agreed; but the decision of the question is not necessary in this case, for the reason that, conceding its existence, the plaintiff could not prevail against Gilham, who holds the legal title freed from such latent equity. Let the decree appealed from be affirmed.

APPEALABLE ORDER — DENYING MOTION TO DISSOLVE INJUNCTION.

An appeal will not lie from an order overruling a motion to dissolve a preliminary injunction and to vacate an order appointing a receiver, in a suit for the dissolution of a partnership and for an accounting.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from circuit court, Baker county; JAMES A. FEE, Judge.

Williams & Smith, for appellants. M. L. Olmsted, for respondent.

BEAN, J. On February 10, 1891, plaintiff commenced a suit for the dissolution of a copartnership existing between him and defendants, and for an accounting. On the filing of the complaint the court ordered a preliminary injunction to issue, enjoining and restraining defendants from in any manner interfering with the property or assets of the copartnership, and appointing a receiver thereof. After answering the complaint, the defendants moved on the pleadings, and certain affidavits filed, before the judge of said court at chambers, for the dissolution of the injunction, and the vacation of the order appointing a receiver, which being denied, defendants appeal to this court. "An order or judgment from which an appeal will lie must be one affecting a substantial right, and which, in effect, determines the action or suit, so as to prevent a judgment or decree therein. It is one which concludes the parties as regards the subject-matter in controversy in the tribunal pronouncing it. It must be one which not only affects a substantial right, but which, in effect, determines the action." Hill, Code, § 535; State v. Brown, 5 Or. 119. The order from which this appeal is taken is not such final judgment. The object and purpose of the preliminary injunction and the appointment of the receiver was only to preserve the property pending the final determination of the suit. It did not in any manner determine, or attempt to determine, the rights of the parties, nor does it in any way preclude a final decree upon the hearing on the merits. It follows, therefore, that the appeal must be dismissed.

DIVORCE—DISPOSITION OF PROPERTY.

Under Code Wash. § 2007, providing that, "in granting a divorce, the court shall also make such disposition of the property of the parties as shall appear just and equitable, having regard to the merits of the parties, their condition after divorce, and to the party through whom the property was acquired," the court has power to dispose of the separate, as well as the joint, property of husband and wife.

Appeal from superior court, King county.

DUNBAR, J. The main question to be decided in this case involves the construction of section 2007 of the Code of Washington, which is as follows: "Sec. 2007. In granting a divorce, the court shall also make such disposition of the property of the parties as shall appear just and equitable, having regard to the respective merits of the parties, and to the condition in which they will be left by such divorce, and to the party through whom the property was acquired, and to the burdens imposed upon it for the benefit of the children, and shall make provision for the guardianship, custody, and support and education of the minor children of such marriage." This statute was passed in 1863, prior to the passage of the community property law, and has ever since been the law of the territory, and of the state. It is contended by appellant that this must be construed to mean that the court shall make such division of the joint property of the parties as shall appear just and equitable, and that the separate property of either spouse is not to be considered in making such disposition. We are unable to see how this construction can be sustained by any rule for the interpretation of statutes. The language of the statute seems to be plain and unambiguous, and the words must be given their ordinary meaning. The statute does not say that the court shall make such disposition "of their joint property," etc., but shall make such disposition "of the property of the parties." This language is comprehensive; it is an equitable division of the property rights of the parties that the court is authorized to make. One statute defines what separate property is, another what community property is, and who shall have control of separate property, and who of real property, both separate and community; but these statutes relate to property rights during coverture. This statute, however, provides that when coverture is to be broken, and the marriage relations dissolved, that the parties shall bring into court all their property, and a complete showing must be made. Each party must lay down before the chancellor all that they have, and, after an examination into the whole case, he makes an equitable division. This view is strengthened, and it seems to me established beyond controversy by the succeeding provision of the section, "having regard to the respective merits of the parties, and to the condition in which they will be left by such divorce, and to the party through whom the property was acquired." If the court has no jurisdiction over the separate property, and cannot take it into account in making the division, that portion of the statute which says it shall have regard to the party through whom the property was acquired is meaningless. The law does not require an equal division of the property, but a "just and equitable" division, and as no general rule for a just and equitable division can be laid down, but each case must be adjusted according to its own merits and the particular circumstances surrounding it, the court investigates all of the circumstances—First, as to who is to blame, or, if neither party is blameless, the degree of blame to be attached to the respective parties; second, who is the more proper party for the custody of the minor children, if any; third, if there is a disposition of the property to be made, the manner in which it was acquired, whether derived principally from the husband, or the wife, or by their joint exertions, the condition of the parties as to age and health, and a great many considerations which will necessarily enter into the discretion of the court in making the division. The separate property of the husband or wife is simply a circumstance for the court to take into consideration in making the division. This subject is now regulated very largely by statute, and there is great similarity in the statutes, all of them investing the court with large discretionary powers. In Iowa, under a statute substantially like ours, which provides that, "when a divorce is decreed, the court may make such order in respect to the children and property of the parties, and the maintenance of the wife, as shall be right and proper," it is held that, when a divorce is in favor of the wife, a part of the husband's lands may be set off to her to be held by her in fee-simple. Jolly v. Jolly, 1 Iowa, 9. In Kentucky and Alabama, the courts have refused to divide the separate property of either spouse; but, in the statutes of each of those states which give the court substantially the same discretion that ours does, there is a special provision or saving clause, to the effect that "nothing herein contained shall be construed to authorize the court to compel either party to divest himself or herself of the title to real estate." This very provision is, at least, a legislative recognition that without it the court would have power to divest the title; and even these courts, in the exercise of their discretion, award the use of the separate estate of one spouse to the other for life. In Alabama the wording of the statute is: "The court pronouncing a decree shall order and decree a division of the estate of the parties in such a way as to it shall seem just and right, having due regard to the rights of each party, and their children, if any;" with the provision quoted above. And the supreme court, in construing this statute in Lovett v. Lovett, 11 Ala. 763, says that the estate of the parties was the estate held by either husband or wife, or by them jointly.

We are clearly of the opinion that section 2007 of the Code confers upon the court the power, in its discretion, to make a division of the separate property of the wife or husband. With this view of the law of the case, and seeing no abuse of discretion by the court in its findings or conclusions, we are of the opinion that the judgment should be affirmed. The point raised by the appellant, in regard to the refusal of the court to discharge the receiver after the appeal in this case had been taken, we think is not properly before us, and we have therefore not considered it. Judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

KILROY v. MITCHELL.

EQUITY—TRIAL BY COURT—FINDINGS—MECHANIC'S LIENS.

1. While findings of fact and law are necessary in an action at law tried by the court without a jury, they are not essential to the validity of a judgment in a suit in equity.

2. A suit to foreclose a mechanic's lien is equitable in its nature, and is not transformed into an action at law by defendants interposing a legal defense by way of counter-claim.

Appeal from superior court, Pierce county.

Suit by D. A. Mitchell against J. B. Kilroy to foreclose a mechanic's lien. There was judgment for plaintiff and defendant appeals.

Judson, Sharpstein & Sullivan, for appellant. G. W. Van Fossen and Parker & Williamson, for appellee.

HOYT, J. The sole ground upon which it is sought to reverse the judgment entered in this cause in the court below is that there were no findings of fact and law to support the same. That such findings are necessary in actions at law, when tried by the court without a jury, is clear from our statute, and has become the established law of this state. See Bard v. Kleeb, 25 Pac. Rep. 467, (decided at the last session of this court.) We think, however, that such findings, although orderly and proper in cases in equity, are not essential to the validity of the judgment. Judgments at law are founded upon general or special verdicts of juries, or findings of the court which take the place thereof. Without such verdicts or findings, there is nothing to support the judgment. Cases in equity stand upon a different basis. The decrees therein, while founded upon facts the same as in cases at law, are placed upon a broader basis than any technical determination of what has been proven by the testimony; such judgments really stand upon the entire evidence in the cause. It will thus be seen that the reasons for holding findings essential in a law case do not obtain in a cause in equity. Besides, on review in this court, a judgment at law will usually stand or fall upon the verdict or findings, without any reference to the evidence as a whole; while in equity it is the duty of this court to retry the cause, not upon verdicts or findings, but upon the testimony introduced in the court below. Section 451 of the Code of Washington is reasonable and proper, if held to apply only to suits in equity, and we think should be thus construed. Appellant, seeing the force of the reasoning above suggested, sought to show that this action, though commenced as a suit in equity, was, by the action of the defendant in setting up a legal defense by way of counter-claim transformed into a suit at law. We do not think that this view of the case is warranted. A court of equity, having once obtained jurisdiction of a cause, will retain it until final determination thereof. See Loan Co. v. Wentworth, 25 Pac. Rep. 298, (decided at last October session.) It follows that findings of fact and law were not necessary to the jurisdiction of the court in rendering judgment in this cause, and that the judgment of the court below must be affirmed.

STATE ex rel. ROHDE v. SACHS, Judge.

CONTEMPT—PUNISHMENT—MANDAMUS.

Where the trial court has fined an attorney for contempt in using disrespectful language, it has no authority to further order that he shall purge himself of the contempt by apologizing; and mandamus will lie to compel the vacation of an order denying him the right to practice until he does so apologize, the fine having been duly paid.

Application for writ of mandamus.

R. A. Ballinger, for relator. John Trumbull, for defendant.

HOYT, J. By his demurrer to the alternative writ issued herein the respondent admits the entry of an order, as follows: "On this 28th day of March, A. D. 1891, in open court, while the Hon. MORRIS B. SACHS, a judge of the superior court of the state of Washington, was engaged as such judge in deciding a motion pending in the case of Nickelsburg v. Stencil et al., then pending in the superior court of Jefferson county, Wash., over which the said MORRIS B. SACHS was then presiding as judge thereof, one William J. Rohde, an attorney of record of said court, and an attorney for the defendants in said cause, interrupted the said judge in said proceedings, and, while said judge was deciding said motion, addressed said judge, and spoke in a disorderly, contemptuous, and insolent manner, the following words: 'I wish the court would not talk to me.' And whereas, the said William J. Rohde in said matter was guilty of disorderly, contemptuous, and insolent behavior towards the said judge, while holding said court, which said behavior of said William J. Rohde tended to impair the authority of said court, and of said judge thereof, and to interrupt in an unbecoming, disorderly, contemptuous, and insolent manner the due course of the said proceedings before said court: Now, therefore, it is ordered by the said court that said William J. Rohde be and he is hereby, by reason of the aforesaid behavior, declared guilty of contempt of said court, and that he pay a fine of twenty dollars, and that he stand committed to the custody of the sheriff of Jefferson county, Wash., until the same is paid; and that it is further ordered that said William J. Rohde purge himself of said contempt." That, upon the entry thereof, the relator, the said William J. Rohde, fully paid the fine therein imposed. That afterwards the said William J. Rohde, in behalf of a certain client, appeared in said court, and asked to be heard as to the matter therein pending. Whereupon the judge thereof refused to allow said Rohde so to be heard therein, and caused to be entered on the records of the said court the further order, as follows, to-wit: "This court having on the 28th day of March, A. D. 1891, duly entered of record, and which said order adjudged and decreed, that the said William J. Rohde, an attorney of record in this court, was guilty of contempt of court, and adjudged that said William J. Rohde be fined the sum of twenty dollars, and is ordered to purge himself of such contempt; and whereas, afterwards, to-wit, on the said 28th day of March, A. D. 1891, the said William J. Rohde paid to the clerk of this—the fine assessed against him in said matter, and has neglected, failed, and refused to comply with the said order of said court, and failed, neglected, and refused to purge himself of said contempt, by apologizing for his said disrespectful conduct: Now, on this 21st day of April, A. D. 1891, the said William J. Rohde appeared in open court, before the judge thereof, and the judge thereof, to-wit, MORRIS B. SACHS, thereupon called the attention of said William J. Rohde to the order of this court so as aforesaid made and entered on the 28th day of March, A. D. 1891, and further called the attention of said William J. Rohde to the fact that he had so failed, neglected, and refused to comply with said order; and thereupon the said William J. Rohde, still failing, neglecting, and refusing to comply with said order: Wherefore it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that said William J. Rohde has violated his official oath of office as an attorney at law, and has failed to maintain the respect due to this court, and the judicial officer thereof; and it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the said William J. Rohde is and will not be permitted to appear as an attorney or counselor before this court until he does comply with said order, and until the further order of this court."

The question presented is as to the validity of said orders, and the regularity of the action of the court in said matter. The contention of the respondent is that, although the latter part of the first order above set out, and all of the second order, may be irregular, and the action of the court in entering the same may be ground of reversal on appeal, yet as the court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and of the person of the relator, there can be no relief against such orders by mandamus. This contention is doubtless correct, if the orders entered were such as, under any state of facts connected with the proceedings, the law would authorize. We think however, that the latter part of the said first order, if it required anything at all more than the payment of the fine mentioned in said order, required something which the court had no right, under any circumstances, to order, and that this portion of said order was therefore not only voidable, but absolutely void, and that for that reason there was absolutely no foundation for any of the proceedings which led to the entry of the second order, and that the said second order was therefore absolutely void as an entirety. This being so, we think this court could properly intervene, and by its writ of mandamus require said court to vacate and set aside said last-named order, especially where, as in this case, the effect of said order was to deprive the relator of his right to appear in said court as an attorney thereof. His right so to appear was property, and could not be taken from him excepting by due process of law, and this court can intervene by this writ to prevent such deprivation. It follows that the peremptory writ of mandamus, commanding substantially the same as the alternative writ, must issue, and it is so ordered.

CARRIERS—ACCIDENTS TO PASSENGERS—NEGLECT—PLEADING.

1. In an action by a passenger against a railroad company for injury received by the falling of a berth while she was away from her seat and standing by the stove, it is not necessary for her to allege and prove necessity for her absence from her seat; contributory negligence being a matter of defense.

2. The accident happened on a car on which it was understood that the passengers should look after their own berths, and were accordingly charged a low rate of fare. Soon after the accident, plaintiff wrote the company that she was injured by the carelessness of one of its employees. Shortly afterwards, in a letter to the company, she said that it was a newsboy who pushed the berth up. On the trial she testified that she thought it was a brakeman. Held, that there was sufficient evidence that the injury resulted by reason of the negligence of an agent of the company to sustain a verdict for plaintiff. ANDERS, C. J., and STILES, J., dissenting.

3. An allegation of the complaint that plaintiff had been compelled to expend a certain amount for medical treatment and nursing was sufficient without pleading it as a distinct cause of action.

Appeal from superior court, Lincoln county.

Mitchell, Ashton & Chapman and N. T. Caton, for appellant. Blevins & Neal, for appellees.

SCOTT, J. Appellee was a passenger from St. Paul to Sprague on one of appellant's cars, which was one of a class known as "free emigrant cars;" and during the passage she was injured by the falling of an upper berth while away from her seat, and standing by the stove. Just before she left her seat at that particular time, some person passed through the car and raised the upper berth nearest to the stove, but did not push it up far enough so that the fastenings caught or locked. The berth might remain in such a position temporarily, but would be in constant danger of falling. The fastenings of such berths were so arranged as to be further secured by locking with a padlock. As to whether it was customary to keep them so locked when raised, was not shown, but this one was not locked in this way at the time. The conductor testified, however, that if the berth had been pushed up high enough for the fastening to catch it could not have fallen. Appellee testified that she left her seat and went to the stove, and that while standing there the train started, giving a quick jerk; that she put out her hand and caught hold of the post by one of the berths, when the upper berth came down and caught two of her fingers and crushed them; that the injury caused her a great deal of pain, and one of the fingers was in danger of remaining permanently stiff; and that she thought her medicine and nurse bill would amount to $200. On cross-examination she testified that she thought it was a brakeman who pushed up the berth. The testimony of the physician who treated her was introduced. He said that her forefinger might remain permanently stiffened as an effect of the injury.

Appellant contends that appellee had no right to leave her seat unless there was a necessity for so doing, and that such necessity should have been pleaded in her complaint and supported by proof, and that without such an allegation any proof thereof was inadmissible. Appellee testified that she went to the stove for the purpose of getting warm. This testimony was objected to by appellant upon the ground aforesaid, that there was no allegation thereof in the complaint, which objection was overruled. This point was subsequently again raised by a request to charge, submitted by appellant, that "the seats constructed in the cars used in the operation and running of trains by defendant railroad company are constructed for the convenience of passengers, and by such passengers to be occupied while the train is moving, and not to be left or deserted while the train is in motion except where a necessity therefor arises; and if an injury occurred to any passenger after having left his or her seat which would not have occurred had such passenger remained in his or her seat the railroad company would not be liable except when a necessity arose for leaving the seat, which necessity should have been pleaded and sustained by evidence." This instruction was refused by the court, and rightfully so. Of course, if the plaintiff's proof had shown that she was guilty of any negligent act which contributed to the injury, she could not recover unless the defendant, with knowledge of the situation, could by reasonable care and diligence have prevented the accident. Her leaving her seat as she did, according to her testimony, was not negligence upon her part, under the circumstances, and she was not bound to show in making her case that she was not guilty of contributory negligence. This was a matter for the defense to establish, if it was relied upon, and consequently there was no necessity for an allegation in the complaint of the kind contended for, and the proof of the plaintiff as to why she left her seat was incidental and immaterial. As to the burden of proof being upon the defense to show contributory negligence, see Hocum v. Weltherick, 22 Minn. 152; Railroad Co. v. Hoehl, 12 Bush, 41; Railroad Co. v. Gladmon, 15 Wall. 401; Railway Co. v. Pointer, 14 Kan. 37. We are aware that there is a conflict of authority upon this point, but deem the above rule the better one, after an examination of many authorities thereon pro and con submitted to us.

Appellant further contends that the following instruction given to the jury is erroneous, to wit: "You are instructed that if you find from the evidence that the bunk in question was so arranged that it might be raised up, and when so raised would so remain temporarily without being fully locked, and when so raised was in a dangerous condition, and was so at the time plaintiff was injured, and the injury was caused thereby, you may from this find negligence upon the part of defendant,"—because it does not contain the further requirement that the berth must have been so raised by an employee of the company, or by the direction of one of its agents or employes, in order to make it liable, unless by due care and diligence it could have known of its unsafe situation had it been raised by another party. Standing alone, this instruction may be faulty in the particular claimed, but from the whole charge we do not think that the court intended to eliminate that condition from the elements of liability, or that the jury could have so understood it, for the court elsewhere in its instructions expressly told the jury that the mere occurrence of the accident did not raise a presumption of negligence on the part of the railroad company; that it must appear that the injury was the result of negligence on the part of the defendant, its agents or employes; and that if the berth, the falling of which caused the injury, was loosened or negligently pushed up by some person not in the employ of the company that it would not be liable,—and said further that the defendant was bound to exercise the highest degree of care and skill to preserve the safety of the passenger.

Taken as a whole, these instructions were as favorable to the defendant as it could ask, and there was no error therein that it could complain of, either as to the point above mentioned, or as to the degree of care required. It is a fundamental principle of the law pertaining to passenger carriers that those thus engaged are under an obligation, arising out of the nature of their employment, and on grounds of public policy, to provide for the safety of passengers whom they have assumed for hire to carry from one place to another. Public policy and safety require that they be held to the greatest care and diligence in order that the personal safety of passengers be not left to chance or the negligence of careless agents; that, although the carrier does not warrant the safety of passengers against all events, yet his undertaking and liability as to them go to the extent that he, or his agents where he acts by agents, shall, so far as human care and foresight can go, transport them safely, and observe the utmost caution characteristic of careful, prudent men; that he is responsible for injuries received by passengers in the course of transportation which might have been avoided or guarded against by the exercise upon his part of extraordinary vigilance, and this caution and vigilance must necessarily be extended to all agencies or means employed by the carrier in the transportation of passengers.

It was claimed that no one was appointed to look after cars of this class, and for this reason a less rate of fare was charged upon them than upon other passenger cars; that this fact was generally known, and was understood by plaintiff at the time she bought her ticket; and that she selected this class of cars from choice by reason of the cheapness of the fare. But this would not excuse the company from liability for any negligence imputable to it, and it was a part of its duty to use due care to see that the berths were properly secured, and that the passengers therein were reasonably protected from injury. It was further contended by the company that it would not be liable unless the injury in question resulted from the carelessness or negligence of one of its agents or servants in raising the berth, and that the proof showed that it was raised by a newsboy; that, although the appellee testified upon cross-examination that she thought it was a brakeman who raised it, she also testified that she would have known better soon after the accident occurred as to who did it than she would at the later time of the trial. Certain exhibits were offered in evidence by the defendant below, being letters written by appellee to the superintendent of the company, in one of which she stated she was injured by the carelessness of one of the company's employees, which was written a short time after the injury. A few days later she wrote another letter, stating therein that it was a newsboy who pushed up the berth. Appellant contends that this testimony showed clearly that it was a newsboy who raised the berth, and that there was no evidence that it was raised by an employee of the company, and consequently the company would not be liable, there being no evidence to sustain the claim that the injury resulted by reason of the neglect of an agent of the company. We think, however, that there was sufficient evidence in this particular to sustain the verdict. The jury might have believed the testimony of the plaintiff where-in she stated that it was a brakeman who raised the berth. No proof was introduced as to the duties of a newsboy or brakeman in this particular. The plaintiff did state in one of her letters to the superintendent of the company that the act was performed by an employee of the company, and a few days later she stated that it was a newsboy who raised the berth. This, also, was some evidence that it was an employee of the company who performed the act.

It was claimed in the argument of the cause here that the damages allowed were excessive; that the injury could not have been serious, as the appellee was able to write with the injured hand soon after the accident. But this point was waived in consequence of its not being saved or raised in appellant's brief. There was no proof, however, as to which hand was injured, or that she used the injured hand in writing the letters aforesaid.

It was further argued that the evidence of the amount incurred for medical treatment and nursing was inadmissible under the pleading; that it was in the nature of special damage, and should have been specially pleaded. Appellant moved to strike this testimony, but the record does not show that any ground was stated for the motion. The court denied it. The evidence was admissible, as the complaint did contain an allegation that the plaintiff had been compelled to expend $150 for medical treatment and nursing. It was not necessary that it should have been separately pleaded as a distinct cause of action, but, unless an amendment was asked and permitted, the amount of the recovery therefor should have been limited to the sum claimed in the complaint. But the appellant did not ask to have this done, either by a ruling of the court at the time, or by requesting an instruction to that effect to the jury; and no point over it, of which this court can take notice, was raised. The charge does seem to have been exorbitant, and no special circumstances appear to account for it; but the matter was not inquired into upon cross-examination, nor was the amount claimed to have been incurred disputed or questioned in any way except by the motion, as stated, nor do we know what the jury in fact allowed therefor. None of the points claimed by appellant are well taken, and the judgment is affirmed.

HOYT and DUNBAR, JJ., concur.

STILES, J., (dissenting.) The car in which the plaintiff was injured was one of a peculiar, cheap class, run for the accommodation of persons who did not wish to pay the usual first-class passenger rates; and it was understood that passengers traveling in it were to serve themselves, at least so far as taking care of the sleeping berths provided were concerned. It was not the duty of any railroad employee either to raise, lower, or secure the berths. Therefore the fact that the berth in question fell, carries with it no presumption that any agent of the company was the cause of its falling, in the absence of any showing that its construction was faulty. Therefore I dissent from the opinion of the majority of the court in this case, because it seems to me that, considering the instructions of the lower court as on the whole harmonious, and therefore not objectionable in those parts wherein he instructed the jury as to the facts necessary to constitute negligence towards the defendant, the jury by their findings seem to have entirely disregarded the charge, and to have rendered a verdict not justified under its instructions. The testimony was not brought up to this court, but the evidence is here in the form of a narrative statement of facts. This statement shows very clearly that the plaintiff below, shortly after the accident to her, wrote a letter to an agent of the railroad company, and complained that she had been injured by the negligence of one of the company's employees. The agent to whom she wrote immediately requested further particulars. Whereupon she replied, stating the manner of her injury, and that it was a newsboy who had raised the berth, and left it either not fastened at all, or insufficiently fastened. Upon the trial she did not state with any degree of positiveness, or to the best of her knowledge and belief, that it was a brakeman who so insufficiently raised the berth, but simply that she thought so; and, upon her attention being called to the letter she had written in which she stated that it was a newsboy, she admitted having written the letter, and stated that her recollection as to who it was that raised the berth would probably have been better when she wrote the letter than at the time she was testifying. This, it seems to me, left the matter substantially as though the plaintiff had not testified at all on the subject. When she wrote the letter, she had no definite knowledge, and she stated nothing which could have warranted the jury in supposing that she had been better informed since; and therefore her testimony as to the person whose act indirectly caused the accident was entirely worthless. In such case, under the charge of the court, it was for the plaintiff to make out with reasonable certainty, by a preponderance of the evidence, that it was an agent of the company whose negligent act caused her injury. This she failed to do, and I think the court should have set aside the verdict upon that ground. This court in its opinion says that the jury might have believed the testimony of the plaintiff wherein she stated it was a brakeman who raised the berth. If she had stated that, perhaps the jury might have been warranted in doing so, but she did not so state. She simply stated she thought so, which, in the presence of her earlier—and, as she admitted, better—statement, carried no force with it. The jury had no right to disregard her admittedly better statement, and base their verdict upon the inferior one. The court charged the jury over and over again that if the berth, the falling of which caused the injury complained of, was loosened or negligently pushed up by some person not an employee of the defendant, and over whom the defendant had no authority or control, then in that case the plaintiff had failed to establish her allegation; and it also charged that a news agent was not an employee of the railroad company, or a passenger thereof, and that if it appeared from the evidence that the berth was pushed up by a news agent at his own motion, or at the request of some person not in the employ of the defendant, then their verdict should be for defendant. When a jury thus disregards the law as given to it by the court, the latter should instantly set its verdict aside.

Mitchell, Ashton & Chapman and Griffiths, Moore & Felghan, for appellants.
William A. Taaffe and Thomas B. Higgins, for appellees.

SCOTT, J. This proceeding was commenced in July, 1890, by petition under sections 2473 to 2476, inclusive, of the Code of 1881, before a justice of the peace of Spokane county by the appellees, who were residents of the city of Spokane Falls, to obtain damages from appellant for its appropriating a certain street, or a portion thereof, in said city, for the purpose of laying its railroad track thereon, said street adjoining certain land within said city, of appellees', which was claimed to have been damaged thereby. Section 11 of the charter of Spokane Falls, to be found at page 304 of the Session Laws of 1885-86, empowered the city to authorize the locating of railroad tracks upon its streets, and contained a provision that any person or corporation laying down such railway should be liable, to the owners of property abutting on such street, for all damages or injury caused thereby, to be ascertained on petition of the property owner or owners in the manner provided by the sections of the Code aforesaid. An act of the legislature approved February 1, 1888, (see Sess. Laws 1887-88, p. 58,) provided a general and complete method of ascertaining and obtaining damages in consequence of the appropriation of land or other property by corporations for railway or other purposes, and required the proceeding therefor to be instituted in the district court of the district wherein the land was situated, or before the judge thereof, and purported to make the same exclusive of all other remedies, but did not refer expressly to the special provisions of said or any other city's charter. Appellant appeared before the justice of the peace, and objected to his jurisdiction in the premises, claiming that the proceedings must be had in accordance with the provisions of the latter act, which objection was overruled. Appellees contend that the sections of the Code aforesaid were, in effect, adopted in the city charter by the reference thereto in the provision of section 11, and, inasmuch as the last act did not expressly refer to said provision, that the same, and said Code sections, are still in force as to such matters arising in said city, and cite several authorities bearing more or less upon the proposition, and supporting their contention. As a rule, it will not be held that a special act is repealed by implication by a general one upon the same subject. The intention of the legislature, however, in enacting the several laws, is what is to be arrived at; and, if it sufficiently appears that it was intended that a subsequent general law should supersede all prior legislation upon the same subject, general or special, though not expressly so stated, effect should be given to such purpose. It was at first, and for quite a long time, customary, in our territorial legislation, to grant special charters to different cities with widely varying provisions, both in respect to each other and to the general laws of the state. Later, such a course, as is usually the case, was found to be unsatisfactory, and there was a tendency to enact general laws to supplant such special provisions, which were becoming recognized as contrary to public policy. This general sentiment has subsequently found further expression by the limitation in our state constitution preventing the legislature from granting corporate powers or privileges by special acts, and prohibiting special legislation in many other instances. The said sections of the Code, while in force, prescribed the general law of the state upon that subject. The legislature, by referring to them in the provision of section 11 of the charter of the city of Spokane Falls, showed an intention to provide the same particular remedy for residents of that city as existed there and elsewhere in the state in cases where land was taken for railway purposes, being the remedy provided by the Code upon the same general subject. The later general law in force when this proceeding was instituted provided a remedy in all cases for the taking of land, or injuriously affecting it, for such purposes. Under it, proceedings could have been commenced before the district court or its judge for lands so taken or damaged within the limits of said city. There is no reason why the additional remedy should exist in said city of proceeding before a justice of the peace according to the sections of the Code formerly generally in force. It is contrary to public policy that the special law should continue, the general law affording a complete remedy; and, in view of all the circumstances, we must hold that the act of 1887-88 was intended to supplant or repeal the special provision relating to the remedy or procedure in such cases, and that the justice of the peace had no jurisdiction in the premises. As to the effect of general acts upon special ones,

GERLACH V. TURNER. (No. 13,222.)

PRESUMPTION OF MARRIAGE—PHYSICIANS—EMPLOYMENT BY HUSBAND TO ATTEND WIFE.

1. In an action against a husband for medical treatment of his wife, it appeared that the parties had been formally married and cohabited until they learned that a divorce from a former wife was invalid, whereupon they discontinued cohabitation, but still acknowledged each other as husband and wife. The evidence as to the invalidity of the divorce, and that the first wife was living, was elicited by defendant on cross-examination, and was hearsay. Held not sufficient to rebut the presumption of marriage, although no objection to the evidence was made.

2. A physician called by a man to attend a woman, supposed to be his wife, can recover for his services from the person summoning him, although the parties are not in fact legally married.

3. One who calls a physician to attend a person whom he represents to be his wife is estopped to deny that fact in an action for services rendered on the faith of such representation.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. H. REARDEN, Judge.

A. P. Needles, for appellant. A. N. Drown, for respondent.

BRATTY, C. J. This is an action to recover $850 for medical services alleged to have been rendered at the special instance and request of the defendant in attending his wife, or reputed wife, Mary J. Turner, during her last illness. In a former action against the administrator of Mary J. Turner for the value of the same services, the plaintiff was defeated by proof of her marriage to this defendant, and of an employment by him; from which it followed that he, and not her estate, was liable for the demand. Gerlach v. Terry, 75 Cal. 290, 17 Pac. Rep. 207. Thereupon this action was commenced in which the plaintiff has been nonsuited upon the ground that Mary J. Turner was not the wife of defendant, although so reputed, and that plaintiff's services were rendered at her request, and solely upon the faith of her promise to pay for them out of her separate estate. In other words, the plaintiff has lost his suit this time because, in the opinion of the superior court, he did not prove a marriage or an employment by the reputed husband, while he lost it before because such marriage and employment was proved. Certainly this is a hard case, but it is one that is legally possible. The defendant, not having been a party to the first suit, is not estopped by the decision therein made that he was the husband of Mary J. Turner, and contracted with the plaintiff; and if in this suit the contrary appears the plaintiff cannot claim to recover merely because in the former action the representative of Mary J. Turner succeeded in evading her just obligation by the false pretense that the defendant, as her husband, was the party bound for the debt. It will be necessary, therefore, in order to determine whether nonsuit was properly granted, to confine our attention exclusively to the evidence produced by the plaintiff on the trial of this action.

Before considering the evidence, however, we will notice briefly a preliminary objection of counsel for the respondent, who contends, as we understand him, that the appellant has not specified the ruling of the court granting the motion for a nonsuit as an error of law, and consequently that it cannot be reviewed. Schroeder v. Schmidt, 74 Cal. 460, 16 Pac. Rep. 243. But in this contention counsel is evidently mistaken, for, in fact, the statement of the case not only shows that plaintiff duly and in time excepted to the order granting a nonsuit, but also distinctly specifies the ruling as an error of law, in both of which particulars it totally differs from the record in Schroeder v. Schmidt. The question is therefore properly presented whether upon the evidence a nonsuit should have been granted.

The evidence shows that in 1872 a clergyman, in pursuance of a regular license, performed the ceremony of marriage between defendant and Mary J. Mason, afterwards and until her death known as Mary J. Turner. But there was some testimony—hearsay and incompetent, as it appears to us, but admitted without objection—that at the date of this supposed marriage defendant had a wife living from whom he erroneously supposed himself to have been divorced; and it was upon the assumption of the truth and sufficiency of this testimony that the judge of the superior court held that he had never been the husband of Mary J. Mason. But it appears that for about eight years after the marriage ceremony they both believed themselves to be husband and wife, and so conducted themselves towards each other, and before the world. At the end of that time the defendant testifies that he discovered that no decree divorcing him from his former wife had been entered; that he communicated this discovery to Mary J. Turner; that they took advice of counsel, and, finding they were really not husband and wife, they ceased to live together in that relation, and he gave her the sum of $6,000 for her support. It appears, however, that, although they may have put an end to their conjugal relations as between themselves, they still continued, for the purpose of avoiding scandal and publicity, to hold themselves out to the world as husband and wife. They lived on his ranch in Sonoma county, where, he says, he paid her to act as his housekeeper, but she retained and was known by the name of Mrs. Turner; and when in November, 1882, she was attacked by the fatal illness which occasioned the employment of the plaintiff, the defendant came with her to San Francisco, took her to the house of Mrs. Beanston, her daughter by a former marriage, and himself called the plaintiff to see her. The plaintiff wrote down the name and address of the house where he was directed to call, writing Vincent by mistake for Beanston, and, without waiting to inquire by whom he was to be paid for his services, commenced and continued his attendance. For a whole month—from November 3d to December 3d—he noted his daily visits in his account-book under the name of Vincent; after that, under the name of Mrs. Turner. He says that he did not at any time feel any concern about his bill. His patient was in the house of a daughter, and constantly attended by the defendant, who demeaned himself as her husband, and spoke of her to the plaintiff and to the nurse and others as his wife. He supposed he would be paid, of course, and never thought of inquiring by whom. He says it would have made no difference who came for him or sent for him he would have rendered his services just the same. He seems, indeed, during his long attendance, and it is much to his credit, to have been intent only upon the relief of his patient, and wholly oblivious to the collection of his fees. During the latter part of Mrs. Turner's illness—from three to six weeks before her death—the plaintiff was informed of the peculiar relation between her and the defendant, and was at the same time informed that she had plenty of means of her own to pay him for his services. This information seems to have been volunteered by both the defendant and by Mrs. Turner, and not to have been elicited by any inquiries from the plaintiff, who continued his attendance as before. After Mrs. Turner's death the defendant claimed a portion of her property as heir, and actually applied for letters of administration on her estate, describing himself in his sworn petition, as her surviving husband. He abandoned his application, however, when he found himself opposed by her son, Mr. Terry, who received the appointment as administrator. The plaintiff having been convinced, apparently, that Mrs. Turner's estate was liable to him for his services, presented his claim to her administrator, and upon its rejection sued Terry, with the result above stated, i. e., that he was defeated, on the ground that her husband, this defendant, owed the debt, and that her promise to pay it was invalid.

Upon this state of facts, we think, the superior court erred in granting a nonsuit, for two reasons: First. There was abundant evidence of a marriage between the defendant and Mrs. Turner, and nothing to rebut the conclusion that they were, in fact, husband and wife, except hearsay evidence that he had a former wife living at the date of their marriage. And this hearsay evidence was not put in by the plaintiff, but was called out on cross-examination, and allowed in the absence of any objection by the plaintiff, who might properly have objected that it was not cross-examination, but a part of the defendant's own case. Second. Even if it had been clearly proven by competent evidence that defendant was not the husband of Mrs. Turner, he is still liable, if he employed the plaintiff to attend her; and the evidence shows that he did. A man may employ a physician to attend a total stranger, and a fortiori one whom he chooses to have known as his wife. And, besides, the defendant's conduct—at least, up to the time when Mrs. Turner, towards the last of her sickness, promised plaintiff that she would pay him—was such as to amount to an explicit representation that he was her husband, and, after the plaintiff has rendered services on the faith of such representation, defendant is estopped to assert its falsity. We are not unmindful of the claim that plaintiff's own testimony shows that he did not rely on the defendant. But we do not think his testimony shows any such thing. He expected confidently to be paid, and he simply did not consider the legal aspects of his contract. He was entitled to rely on the defendant, and must be presumed to have done so. He may not have a right to invoke this principle of estoppel as to the value of services rendered after he was informed that defendant was not Mrs. Turner's husband, but, even as to these services, the defendant is liable if he originally employed the plaintiff, and did not plainly and unequivocally put an end to that employment at the time he informed him of his true relation to the woman he called his wife. The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

RANKIN v. AMAZON INS. CO. (No. 12,807.)

FIRE INSURANCE—REPRESENTATIONS.

1. In an action on a fire insurance policy running to O. & Co., (owners,) loss payable to R. & Co., (plaintiffs,) it appeared that, at the time of making application for insurance, plaintiffs promised to furnish a survey and diagram, without which the company refused to take the risk. A rider to the policy provided: "Reference is hereby made to a survey and diagram on file in the office of M. & Son, [insurance brokers acting on behalf of plaintiffs,] which is made a part of this policy, and a warranty on the part of the assured." The policy also provided: "For further particulars, reference is hereby made to an application and survey, No. —, furnished by, and a warranty on the part of the assured, which is hereby made a part of this policy." Held, that the admission in evidence of the survey and diagram, consisting of questions and answers, could not be objected to on the ground that the insurance was effected before it was furnished to the company; as, if it was thereby deprived of its force as a warranty, it still had effect as a representation of facts made as an inducement for the issuance of the policy, the falsity of any material part of which would warrant the rescission of the insurance.

2. The survey having been furnished in accordance with plaintiffs' agreement, they could not object to it on the ground that the parties furnishing it had no authority from the owners of the property.

3. The provision of the policy that "it is understood and agreed that, during such time as the above mill is idle, a watchman shall be employed by the insured, to be in and about the premises day and night," being free from ambiguity with respect to the time the premises were to be watched, it was error to submit the question to the jury whether plaintiffs had complied with the condition; it appearing that while the mill was idle for two months but one watchman was hired, and he was not instructed to watch the mill at night, and, as a matter of fact, slept every night in a building several hundred feet from the mill.

4. If it was material whether the watchman was on duty at the time of the fire, the burden of proving it was on plaintiffs, defendant having shown that the mill was idle.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. W. ARMSTRONG, Judge.

Huggin, Van Ness & Dibble, for appellant. Doyle, Galpin & Zeigler, (Philip A. Galpin, of counsel,) for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is an action on a fire insurance policy to recover the sum of $548.24. The policy contained the following clause: "Reference is hereby made to a survey and diagram on file in the office of J. C. Mitchell & Son, which is made a part of this policy, and a warranty on the part of the assured." The application for the policy was made on November 21st, but was not countersigned or delivered until November 24, 1884. Mitchell & Son, who were insurance brokers, acted on behalf of plaintiffs in procuring the policy, and they promised at the time the application was made to furnish the survey and diagram. The company refused to take the risk unless the brokers would agree to furnish such a survey. A survey and diagram was made by the owners of the property, and a copy thereof dated December 4, 1884, was presented to the agents of the defendant, but at what precise time it was presented does not appear. On December 3, 1884, the policy was taken to the office of the defendant and the written portion thereof was changed, increasing the amount of the insurance, and another rider, which was duly authenticated and attached, was substituted, which contained the same reference, quoted above. The survey and diagram consisted of many questions and answers. It was written on the blank form of another insurance company, and was signed, "Owens River M. G. & S. Co., by Hoyt & Son, applicants." The policy ran to the Owens River Iron & Smelting Company, (owners,) "loss, if any, payable to Rankin, Brayton & Co." When this document was offered in evidence, plaintiffs objected to it on the grounds that the insurance had been effected prior to the time the survey was presented to the company, and that Hoyt & Son had no authority to act on behalf of the mining and smelting company. The objection was sustained. The defendant excepted. The ruling was erroneous. The loss was not payable to the owners of the mine, but to their creditors, Rankin, Brayton & Co., and the question as to the authority of Hoyt & Son is immaterial. Plaintiffs promised to furnish the survey, and it was furnished in accordance with their agreement, and became a part of the contract. The admissibility of the evidence does not depend solely upon the reference contained in the rider. The policy itself provides: "For further particulars reference is hereby made to an application and survey, No. —, furnished by and a warranty on the part of the assured, which is hereby made a part of this policy." The delay of the plaintiffs in furnishing the survey should not be held to entirely destroy its efficacy as a part of the contract. The fact that the survey was not furnished until after the policy was delivered may have deprived it of any force or effect as a warranty, under section 2005 of the Civil Code; but conceding this to be true, it does not destroy its effect as a representation of facts made as an inducement for the issuance of the policy, and as such it is evidence which the jury should consider on the issue as to rescission. If any of the material representations were false, the defendant's tender of the premium and notice that the policy was canceled before the commencement of the suit operated to rescind the contract. Sections 2580, 2583, Civil Code.

The policy, as first printed and written, contained this clause: "It is understood and agreed that, during such time as the above mill is idle, a watchman shall be employed by the insured to be in and upon the premises day and night." At the request of the plaintiff, this provision was changed by inserting the word "about" in lieu of the word "upon." The object of the change doubtless was to avoid any controversy, in case of loss, as to whether it was necessary that the watchman should be actually upon the premises on which the insured buildings stood. The change, however, did not accomplish the full purpose intended, for the watchman slept a distance of 300 or 400 feet from the mill; and the word "about," as used, is so uncertain in signification that it cannot be determined therefrom exactly what territory was intended to be covered by it. But, however uncertain the promissory warranty may be as to the premises upon which the watchman was required to be, there is no ambiguity in the language with respect to the time he was required to watch the premises. Where the language of a policy may be understood in more senses than one, it is to be construed most strongly against the insurer, because he frames it, and is supposed to make it as potent as possible in his own favor; but, where there is no imperfection or ambiguity in the language, it must be construed, like any other contract, according to the intention of the parties.

The court instructed the jury that, "If the assured employed a watchman to be in and about the premises day and night while the mill was idle, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover," and submitted to them for determination the question whether plaintiffs had performed the conditions of the contract. Cases are cited by respondent in support of the action of the court which hold that under certain watchman clauses it is proper to receive evidence of usage, and to submit to the jury the question whether the insured employed a watchman to look after the property in the manner in which men of ordinary care in similar departments of business manage their own affairs of like kind. But they all go off upon the proposition that the terms of the warranty are not explicit as to the time and manner of keeping a watch. Thus in the Massachusetts case (Crocker v. Insurance Co., 8 Cush. 79,) the language of the clause was, "a watchman kept on the premises;" and in the Illinois case (Insurance Co. v. Shipman, 77 Ill. 189,) "a watchman to be on the premises constantly during the time until September 1, 1872." In the latter case plaintiff had employed a day watchman and a night watchman, and the only question considered was whether it was necessary for the watchman to be actually on the premises on which the insured buildings were situated. In the case before us the terms of the warranty are explicit as to the time of keeping a watch, and, on the undisputed evidence, we think the court ought to have held that the plaintiffs had not complied therewith. The mill was idle for two months prior to the destruction thereof by fire, and the evidence shows that plaintiffs did not employ a watchman "to be in and about the premises day and night." A watchman was employed, but he was not instructed to watch the premises at night, and, as a matter of fact, slept every night in a building distant 300 or 400 feet from the mill. Mr. Minear, the superintendent, testified that McMurray, the watchman, was not instructed to watch the premises during the night; that his instructions were not special, "either at day or night." In the nature of things, it could not be expected that one man could watch the buildings day and night, (only one watchman was employed,) but, if it be assumed that he could, no one was employed to do so. There is no ambiguity in the phrase "day and night." "We do not need a dictionary, nor a law-book, nor the testimony of an expert, to tell us that a man who is employed to watch in the day-time, and who is permitted to sleep at night, is not a watchman at night." Brooks v. Insurance Co., 11 Mo. App. 349; Glendale Woolen Co. v. Protection Ins. Co., 21 Conn. 39. It is not a case of mere negligence. If a loss is occasioned by the mere fault or negligence of the watchman, unaffected by fraud or design on the part of the insured, it is within the protection of the policy; but, to entitle the insured to recover, it must appear that he has in good faith employed a watchman to perform the duties required by the terms of the warranty. Trojan Min. Co. v. Fireman's Ins. Co., 67 Cal. 27, 7 Pac. Rep. 4; Wenzel v. Insurance Co., 67 Cal. 438, 7 Pac. Rep. 817; Cowan v. Insurance Co., 78 Cal. 181, 20 Pac. Rep. 408; Waters v. Insurance Co., 11 Pet. 219. It does not appear whether the watchman was actually on duty at the time the fire occurred. If the fact be considered as material, it is sufficient to say that, defendant having shown the mill was idle, the burden of proving a compliance with the warranty rested upon the plaintiffs. Cowan v. Insurance Co., supra; Wood, Ins. (2d Ed.) p. 1136. The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial.

WE CONCUR: GAROUTTE, J.; HARRISON, J.; DE HAVEN, J.; MCFARLAND, J.

BEATTY, C. J. I concur in the judgment, and in the conclusion that the evidence does not show that a watchman was employed as stipulated.

BULL v. BRAY et al. (No. 12,695.)

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—INTENT—FINDINGS.

Civil Code Cal. § 8439, provides that "every transfer of property * * * made * * * with intent to delay or defraud any creditor * * * is void." Section 3442 provides that in all cases arising under this section "the question of fraudulent intent is one of fact and not of law," and that no transfer shall be adjudged fraudulent solely on the ground that it was not made for a valuable consideration. Held that, in an action to set aside a conveyance, although a court has found that it was made without consideration by an insolvent debtor, and that his creditor was thereby defrauded, a failure to also find a fraudulent "intent" is fatal.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; W. E. GREENE, Judge.

Action by Alphens Bull against Watson A. Bray, Julia A. Bray, Emma B. Cohen, and Alfred H. Cohen to set aside certain conveyances as fraudulent. After trial by the court and judgment for plaintiff, a new trial was granted. Plaintiff appeals.

Wm. H. Sharp and J. F. Wendell, for appellant. Chickering & Thomas, (J. P. Phelan and Garber & Bishop, of counsel,) for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an appeal from an order granting defendants a new trial. The action was brought by plaintiff, a judgment creditor, to set aside two certain deeds of gift made by defendant Watson A. Bray, the judgment debtor, to Julia A. Bray, his wife, May 20, 1880, and August 8, 1881, respectively, of lands in Contra Costa county, as being void against prior creditors. Plaintiff's debt had been reduced to judgment; execution was issued thereon, and returned wholly unsatisfied. In the lower court, plaintiff had judgment, as prayed for, declaring said deeds null and void as against his judgment, and that he be entitled to enforce his execution against the property in said deeds described. Defendants moved for a new trial, and their motion was granted upon the ground that the findings as filed omitted to find upon the issue of intent raised by the pleadings in the case; that is to say, there is no finding on the issue made by the pleadings, whether the conveyances from Bray to his wife, referred to in the pleadings, were made or accepted with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud the plaintiff or other creditors of said Bray. The question presented by this appeal is, therefore, whether, in view of the facts found by the court, it was necessary to make a further finding as to the fraudulent intent; for, if the facts found by the court necessarily establish the fraudulent intent, that satisfies the law. If probative facts only are found, yet, if the ultimate fact flows as a necessary conclusion therefrom, the findings are sufficient. Osborne v. Clark, 60 Cal. 623; Biddell v. Brizzolara, 56 Cal. 381; People v. Hagar, 52 Cal. 189; Coveny v. Hale, 49 Cal. 555. The only findings of the court necessary to consider in the investigation of this most important question are as follows: (1) That said deeds were entirely voluntary, and there was no valuable consideration whatever for the making and delivery of the same, and said deeds were deeds of gift. (2) That at the times of the making of said deeds the defendant Watson A. Bray was insolvent, and has ever since remained insolvent. (3) That defendant Bray, at the time he made and delivered said deeds, was not fully aware, and did not know his actual financial condition, and his inability to pay and discharge in full his then outstanding debts and liabilities. (4) That by the making and delivery of said deeds Watson A. Bray did hinder, delay, and defraud this plaintiff in the collection of his debt.

This action rests upon section 3439 of the Civil Code: "Every transfer of property * * * made * * * with intent to delay or defraud any creditor * * * is void." "Every transfer of personal property * * * is conclusively presumed if made by a person having * * * the possession or control, * * * and not accompanied by an immediate delivery * * * to be fraudulent and therefore void against those who are his creditors, while he remains in possession." Civil Code, § 3440. Then, to exclude all possibility of misconception arising out of the conflicting decisions of other states as to whether the question of intent is a matter of law or of fact, section 3442 provides that in all cases arising under section 3439 "the question of fraudulent intent is one of fact, and not of law." It further provides that no transfer shall be adjudged fraudulent solely on the ground that it was not made for a valuable consideration. It also expressly excepts transfers of personal property arising under section 3440, for that section makes the question one of law by providing that transfers made in a certain way shall create a conclusive presumption of fraud. The general contention of appellants in this case is fairly illustrated by the doctrine laid down by Bump, in his work on Fraudulent Conveyances, (8d Ed. 271, 272:) "If the act necessarily delays, hinders, or defrauds his creditors, then the law presumes that it is done with fraudulent intent. The intent is to be assumed from the act. The circumstances of the act, or rather the act itself, is conclusive evidence of fraud, for no man is permitted to say that he does not intend the necessary consequences of his own voluntary act. The law will not speculate about what is actually passing in the donor's mind, for the act need not be immoral or corrupt. The law does not concern itself about the private or secret motives which may influence the debtor. * * * He may make a conveyance with the most upright intentions, really believing that he has a right to do so, and that it is his right and duty to do it, and yet, if the transfer is voluntary, and hinders, delays, or defrauds his creditors, it is fraudulent. * * * The presumption in such a case is conclusive, and against it all other evidence is unavailing. The debtor may have some other purpose in view, but the intent to defraud is a part and parcel of his act. It is upon these principles that the law relating to voluntary conveyances rests. In the construction of the statute, they are deemed within its operation, when they necessarily tend to defeat the just rights of creditors, even though they are made bona fide and with the intention of conferring a gratuitous benefit upon some meritorious object. The law stamps a man's generosity with the name of fraud when it prevents him from acting fairly towards his creditors, and presumes fraud if he disables himself from paying his debts. In such case the presumption of fraud arises and may exist without the imputation of moral turpitude. The principle is, that persons must be just before they are generous, and that debts must be paid before gifts can be made." This doctrine, ever since the celebrated case of Reade v. Livingston, 8 Johns. Ch. 500, decided by Chancellor KENT, has been recognized and accepted by many judges in many states of the Union.

Respondents insist that "the question of intent is a question of fact, and that the intent or purpose of the grantor in making the transfer in all cases is a question for the jury, and that it is material to the issue to determine whether the act done is a bona fide transaction, or whether it is a trick or contrivance to defeat creditors." "That the question of solvency or insolvency of the grantor at the time of the making of the deeds is a matter of evidence to be given its due weight in determining the ultimate fact as to the fraudulent intent of the grantor; that a rich man may make a fraudulent deed as well as one who is insolvent; and that while a voluntary conveyance by an insolvent may be prima facie fraudulent, it cannot be conclusively fraudulent, for that would make the question of intent a question of law, and thus be in violation of that provision of the Code which says it shall be a question of fact." These views, to a great extent, are supported by the exhaustive case of Seward v. Jackson, 8 Cow. 450, and by other authority, both English and American. The cases in this country passing either directly or indirectly upon the questions involved in this litigation are practically numberless, and, as we have already seen, are greatly at variance. But, as has been said by Bigelow on Fraud, (Preface, iv. and v., Ed. 1877): "The law here to be applied is statutory law, and, as to the statutory law concerning fraud on creditors and purchasers, each state of the Union, with few exceptions, has a Code of its own, interpreted by independent tribunals, and enforced by distinct and diverse penalties and procedure. With deference to the views of others who have attempted to present a harmonious view of the statutes of the different states, the author is satisfied that such efforts are both unsatisfactory and dangerous. The decisions of the courts of New York concerning the interpretation of an ambiguous statute of that state,—that is, concerning the intention of the legislature of that state in the passage of the act,—cannot be safe authority in another state, even upon a question of the meaning of a statute framed in the very same words. The legislature of New York meant one thing by the language used, and the legislature of another state may have meant something else, and so the courts of each state may have declared, and rightly. To say, therefore, that the decisions are in conflict is incorrect, and to attempt to deduce the true rule of law as applicable to both states is vicious." Without attempting to deduce the true rule from the many authorities of many states, we will discuss this case by the authority of our statutes and Codes, and in the light of the decisions of our own judicial tribunals.

Having found the fact that the conveyances were voluntary conveyances, that the defendant Watson A. Bray was insolvent at the time he made the conveyances, and that these conveyances delayed and defrauded the plaintiff in the collection of his debt, was it still necessary for the court to find the further fact that the intent of the grantor in making the conveyances was to delay and defraud creditors, and was the court justified in granting a new trial by reason of its failure to make such finding? Appellant contends that the absence of a finding of intent is immaterial, because the conveyance being voluntary, the grantor being insolvent, and the conveyance having defrauded the creditor, the intent to delay and defraud follows as an absolute and conclusive presumption, and the intent, being the ultimate fact, necessarily results from such probative facts. In order to support this contention the ultimate fact must follow necessarily—that is, as a matter of law—from the other facts. In Coren v. Hale, 49 Cal. 556, the court said: "Of course, it is only when the conclusion follows as a matter of law that such a finding will be held sufficient." "The only inferences which we can draw from the findings," said the court in De Cella v. Porter, 65 Cal. 10, 2 Pac. Rep. 257, and 3 Pac. Rep. 120, "are inferences of law. We are not allowed to draw inferences of fact from the facts found. If this court would infer a fact from other facts, it would be usurping the province of the trial court, which alone can find the facts in issue. This is the rule with regard to special verdicts, and we are of opinion that the same rule applies to findings of fact." To the same effect are the cases of Chandler v. Bank, 65 Cal. 499, 4 Pac. Rep. 502; Salisbury v. Shirley, 66 Cal. 228, 5 Pac. Rep. 104; Hibberd v. Smith, 67 Cal. 556, 4 Pac. Rep. 473, and 8 Pac. Rep. 46. It may be conceded that it would have been perfectly proper for the trial court to have drawn an inference of fact as to the fraudulent intent of the grantor from the other facts found; that this court might be justified in setting aside a finding to the contrary as not being supported by the evidence, (Judson v. Lyford, 84 Cal. 505, 24 Pac. Rep. 286;) but that does not dispense with the necessity of an actual and express finding as to the ultimate fact, as a fact, by the lower court, nor authorize this court to exercise what would be original jurisdiction by supplying a finding upon this most vital and essential matter. As section 3442 of the Civil Code declares that the question of fraudulent intent is "one of fact and not of law," it is not entirely plain that this court can under any state of facts, however plain they might be, hold that the ultimate fact might flow from the probative facts as a matter of law. But, assuming that the ultimate fact of "intent to defraud" may flow as "matter of law" from the probative facts, yet to obviate a finding of this ultimate fact the facts found must necessarily and conclusively indicate that the grantor was possessed of the intent to defraud at the time the conveyances were made. If the facts found do not absolutely exclude all possibility of the absence of fraudulent intent in the mind of the grantor, then the want of the finding of such intent cannot be dispensed with in this court. Thus, in the case of Emmal v. Webb, 38 Cal. 204, the court, in considering whether it could infer a fact from other facts, said: "To warrant us in so doing, the fact to be inferred must follow inevitably from the facts found, or, in other words, the non-existence of the fact to be inferred must, upon every conceivable theory of which the case will admit, be inconsistent with the existence of the facts which are found." And to the same effect are Coveny v. Hale, 49 Cal. 556; Younger v. Pagles, 60 Cal. 520; Walker v. Buffandeau, 63 Cal. 312; Coglan v. Beard, 35 Cal. 63, 2 Pac. Rep. 737; Water Co. v. Richardson, 72 Cal. 601, 14 Pac. Rep. 379. We then proceed to consider whether there is any possible state of facts consistent with the findings of the court heretofore quoted, and also consistent with the absence of fraudulent intent in the mind of the grantor at the time of the making of the deeds sought to be set aside in this action. The finding of the court "that the defendant Bray by the making of these deeds did hinder, delay, and defraud the plaintiff in the collection of his debt" throws no special light upon the solution of the question as to the actual intent of the grantor; while important as evidence of the intent, by reason of the presumption that every man intends the usual and ordinary consequences of his voluntary acts, yet our statute requires that a conveyance shall not only delay and defraud creditors, but that it was made with the intent to delay and defraud, and the statute appears to recognize the intent as the prevailing and controlling element in measuring the bona fides of the transaction. Bray did actually defraud Bull in the making of the deeds, by depriving him of property which would otherwise have been applied to the satisfaction of the execution; but it does not necessarily and conclusively follow therefrom that the intent was present in his mind to defraud, or that in making the transfer he may not have been actuated by the most honest motives.

Appellant insists that the existence of the facts, to-wit, "that the grantor was insolvent at the time of the transfer, and that the conveyances were deeds of gift, render the inference of fraudulent intent absolute and conclusive, and a conveyance under such circumstances, therefore, would be void under any and all conceivable states of facts; and this is the important and determinative question in this case." Very many of the authorities from other states relied upon by appellant to support this contention rest in whole or in part upon the presumptions "that every man intends the usual and natural consequences of his voluntary act," and that "every man is presumed to know the condition of his own business;" and, applying those presumptions, it is said that the natural consequence of an insolvent giving away his property is to defraud his creditor, and that, therefore, the insolvent must have intended to defraud; and, again, "a man is presumed to know the condition of his own business affairs, and therefore if, as a matter of fact, he is insolvent, he must know of such insolvency." Best, in his work on Evidence, section 307, speaking of the changes which this subject of presumptions has undergone in our legal history, says: "Certain presumptions which in earlier times were deemed absolute and irrebuttable have, by the opinion of later judges, acting on more enlarged experience, either been ranged among presumptiones juris tantum, or considered as presumptions of fact, to be made at the discretion of the jury. On the whole, modern courts of justice are slow to recognize presumptions as irrebuttable, and are disposed rather to restrict than to extend their number. To conclude a party by an arbitrary rule from adducing evidence in his favor is an act which can only be justified by the clearest expediency and soundest policy, and some presumptions of this class ought never to have found their way into it." According to the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, (sections 1961-1963,) the foregoing presumptions are disputable presumptions, and may be controverted by other evidence; and, indeed, the presumption that every man knows the condition of his own business affairs has no standing in this case, for the trial court has found as a matter of fact that "the defendant Bray did not know that he was insolvent." And, not knowing his insolvency, how can it be presumed from the existence of his insolvency that he intended to defraud? For no man can be presumed to intend a consequence which he does not know, of which he is ignorant, and which, therefore, he cannot contemplate. It may be conceded that one who acts recklessly and regardless of consequences is not to be exonerated. The fraud in this case rests upon the insolvency of the grantor; for, while there is no allegation, proof, or finding as to the value of the property conveyed, still, if he was solvent, a gift of this character, in the absence of an actual fraudulent intent, would be upheld. If defendant Bray did not know that he was insolvent, then he did not know that this property was required to pay his debts, and the finding of the court that he was ignorant of his insolvency is absolutely inconsistent with the presumption that he intended the consequences of an act, which consequences depended upon insolvency. Appellant's counsel insist that a voluntary conveyance by an insolvent is void under all circumstances, and that the intent to defraud is conclusively presumed. If that be so, it must be by reason of some presumption of law; but, if it be said that fraud can be conclusively presumed in any case, except as provided by section 3440, Civil Code, then fraud is again made a question of law, and this would amount to an abrogation of section 3442, Id., which provides that "fraudulent intent is a question of fact," and would be creating a class of conclusive presumptions not recognized or justified by either section 3440, Id., or section 1962, Code Civil Proc.

As has been remarked at the inception of this opinion, the great number of cases from the courts of other states, cited by appellant's counsel to support this contention, will not be reviewed. Some of them directly sustain such position; others merely affirm the decisions of nisi prius courts, that a gift by an insolvent is sufficient evidence to justify the setting aside of a conveyance by a creditor; others hold the insolvent guilty of a fraudulent intent as a matter of law; and many others are based upon the two presumptions heretofore referred to, and holding that such presumptions were conclusive presumptions, and that therefore the fraudulent intent necessarily resulted therefrom; and this was the reasoning adopted by this court in the case of Swartz v. Hazlett, 8 Cal. 118. The court held in that case that "every man must be held to know the law and the facts regarding his own business." In other words, if the debtor is insolvent, he is conclusively presumed to know that fact; and, the necessary consequences of a transfer of his property being to delay and defraud his creditors, the fraudulent intent follows in all cases. The important distinction between that case and the one at bar is that in this case the lower court not only recognized the presumption that "every man is presumed to know the condition of his own affairs," as being rebuttable, but absolutely rebutted it by finding as a fact that "the defendant Bray did not know the condition of his own affairs, and did not know that he was insolvent." In 1 Whart. Cont. § 377, subd. 4, is used this language: "As a condition of fraudulent intention, insolvency known to the grantor must be shown. A party who believes himself to have the pecuniary ability to make a gift can make such gift without the risk of its being subsequently impeached, supposing his belief is not negligently adopted." In the case of Swartz v. Hazlett, supra, this court really held that a transfer of property by a grantor who knew of his insolvency was conclusively fraudulent; and, while we are not inclined to even adopt that view of the law under our statutes, yet, from the reasoning of the court in that case, if there had been a finding as to the grantor's ignorance of his insolvency, it does not appear that the case could have been reversed, and judgment ordered for the plaintiff. As we have already seen, (Emmal v. Webb, supra,) if, upon any conceivable theory, the inference of fraudulent intent would be inconsistent with the fact of insolvency, then this court cannot find the intent as matter of law. Now, it appears from the record in this case, in addition to the findings already discussed, that the liabilities and assets of the defendant Bray approximated three-quarters of a million dollars, respectively; that he continued in business for years after these deeds were made, and before he made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors; and, in addition to these facts, we will suppose that he honestly believed at all times that he had ample property remaining to pay his debts after this property was transferred, and that the property transferred was of merely nominal value. A state of facts could be imagined even much more favorable to the grantor, Bray, than the foregoing, and which would be perfectly reconcilable with the fact of actual insolvency, and the absence of fraudulent intent at the time of the making of the conveyances; and, conceding the trial court would be justified in drawing the inference of fraudulent intent from such a state of facts, this court would not and could not say that such intent would flow therefrom as a matter of law. It is difficult to see how trivial gifts, made with fair, honest intentions, can be adjudged to have been made with a fraudulent intent, when intent is declared to be a matter of fact in all cases.

In the case of Carpentier v. Mendenhall, 28 Cal. 484, it was held that a finding of a demand by one tenant in common to be let into possession, and a refusal by his co-tenant, was not a finding of ouster. The court said: "The law will not presume from either the one or the other, nor from both combined, that there was an intent to oust. That intent must be established as a fact by the finding of the jury. Conversion is one of the points to be established in actions of trover, but it is settled that demand and refusal is not conversion, but only evidence of it, for the consideration of the jury. In the absence of all explanation, the court would be justified in directing or advising the jury to infer a conversion or an ouster, in a case like the one at bar, from the fact of demand and refusal, but the inference is to be made by the jury and not by the court." There appears to be no reason why the legal principles declared by this court in the criminal case of People v. Mize, 80 Cal. 44, 22 Pac. Rep. 80, are not applicable here. The defendant was charged with an assault with intent to commit murder. It is a statutory offense, and the intent is the essential ingredient. The trial court gave the following instruction. "The jury are instructed that the natural and probable consequence of every act deliberately done by a person of sound mind is presumed to have been intended by the author of said act; and if the jury believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendants, or either of them, did shoot at said Henry Coffey, as charged in the information, and that the natural and ordinary consequences of said shooting would be the death of said Henry Coffey, then the presumption of law is that the defendant so shooting did shoot at said Coffey with intent to kill him." This court said: "It is doubtless true that a man is presumed to have intended the immediate and natural consequences of his act, but, when an act becomes criminal only when it has been performed with a particular intent, that intent must be alleged and proved. It is for the jury, under all the circumstances of the case, to say whether the intent required by the statute to constitute the offense existed in the mind of the defendant." This charge withdrew from the jury the consideration of the question whether the defendants intended to kill Coffey. The defendants claimed that they were acting in self-defense, and upon real and apparent danger. To tell the jury, therefore, if they believed that the defendants had shot at Coffey, and that the natural and ordinary consequences of the shooting would be the death of Coffey, the law would presume them guilty of an intent to kill, was erroneous, because it entirely disregards the question whether the defendants acted in good faith, and to defend themselves against real or apparent danger. So, in the case at bar, if a voluntary transfer by the defendant insolvent carries with it a conclusive fraudulent intent, the defendant would be precluded from showing his motives and good faith in making the conveyance, and the question of intent, which a jury may have been called to try, which in all cases is a question of fact, and which is the fact in the case, would be driven from the case by the court calling to its aid presumptions which, as we have already seen, are not only liable to attack, but are put to flight at the moment they come in contact with a substantial fact. The case of Hager v. Shindler, 29 Cal. 58, 59, holds that insolvency is but a circumstance from which fraud may be inferred or argued; evidence of fraud, but not by any means conclusive or irrebuttable evidence. In that case the court said: "In a case like the one at bar, insolvency is not a fact of jurisdictional consequence, nor is it per se a condition of relief. * * * A complaint framed for the purpose named, while stating that the deed was without consideration, should aid or help out the averment, not by averring insolvency, for that is but a circumstance, not by averring generally that the deed was fraudulent, for that is but a conclusion of law, but by averring the fact superadded by the statute, to-wit, that it was made with 'intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors.' The state of the grantor's worldly affairs may be used as evidence to elucidate the intent, if disputed; but as matter of pleading it is not necessary that insolvency should be averred in the complaint, and for the obvious reason that the fact does not enter as a term into the legal proposition. A rich man may make a fraudulent deed as well as one who is insolvent."

The Civil Code provides that the mere want of consideration does not of itself render a conveyance fraudulent as to creditors; and considering this section in connection with the presumptions recognized by the court in Swartz v. Hazlett, supra, the distinction between sales for an inadequate consideration and voluntary conveyances is entirely imperceptible, and the question in both cases at once becomes one of intent to be decided from all the evidence in the case. The difference in these two classes of conveyances is only in degree; for as the grantor must upon appellant's theory be presumed to know his condition, and to know that the consideration is inadequate, and that he is thereby depriving his creditors of the portion of the "fund" which is represented by the difference between an adequate and inadequate consideration, he must be presumed conclusively to intend to defraud them pro tanto, for the conveyance is voluntary to that extent. But McFadden v. Mitchell, 54 Cal. 629, holds that inadequacy of price and insolvency of the debtor are only circumstances more or less potential in the determination of fraud as a question of fact; and, referring to certain instructions given by the trial court, Justice McKee says: "By these instructions the court in effect took away from the jury the consideration of fraudulent intent as a question of fact, and as they are contrary to the plain rule established by the Code the cause is remanded for a new trial." Appellant's position in this case takes away from the jury the consideration of fraudulent intent as a question of fact. In Jamison v. King, 50 Cal. 138, the court, speaking through Justice McKim, said: "Doubtless the concurrence of insolvency on the part of the assignor, and inadequacy of price, would be a circumstance strongly tending to establish fraud; but inadequacy or failure of consideration is not of itself sufficient, even as against the creditors of an insolvent assignor, to authorize a court to find fraud as a conclusion of law. By our statute it is provided: 'The question of fraudulent intent, in all cases arising under the provisions of this act, shall be deemed a question of fact and not of law; nor shall any conveyance or charge be adjudged fraudulent as against creditors or purchasers solely on the ground that it was not founded upon a valuable consideration.' In the case before us the district court did not find fraud as a fact or as a conclusion of law, nor does the amended complaint allege it." In Miller v. Stewart, 24 Cal. 504, the court uses this language: "Whether the transactions in question were entered into by the Millers with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud their creditors is a question which the statute leaves to the determination of the jury upon such evidence as may be presented for their consideration. The intent is expressly declared to be a question of fact, and must therefore be for the jury, and not the court. In the instruction above quoted the court in effect takes the question from the consideration of the jury, and assumes the decision thereof." In Harris v. Burns, 50 Cal. 141, it appears, the trial court instructed the jury that certain facts, if proven, were conclusive as to the intent of the assignor to hinder, delay, and defraud his creditors. In the opinion of this court, Chief Justice WALLACE says: "This instruction cannot be supported. The question of fraudulent intent is a question of fact; it is so declared by the statute. * * * The instruction, in effect, took away from the jury the decision of the question of fact, and established the fraudulent intent by mere legal conclusion from an isolated circumstance. This we held erroneous in Jamison v. King, Id. 132, at the present term." This decision is not based upon the theory that the facts referred to by the trial court in the instruction were in themselves too weak to justify a conclusive presumption of a fraudulent intent; but it decides that, the intent being a question of fact, such a presumption could not be indulged in under our statute.

If the legislature had intended a gift by an insolvent to constitute a constructive fraud or fraud in law, it was easy to have said so. Instead of that, they expressly legislated away all the reasons upon which the decisions so holding profess to stand. When the legislature did intend to preserve the doctrine of fraud in law, they did so in express language, by section 3440, Civil Code, and then provided that in all other cases the question of fraudulent intent is one of fact, and not of law. It is impossible to comprehend how any decision or series of decisions of other states can make the question of fraud in this state, and in this character of action, a question of law. No decision or series of decisions can repeal a statute. Let the order be affirmed.

We concur. DE HAVEN, J.; HARRISON, J.; MCFARLAND, J.; PATERSON, J.

BEATTY, C. J. I concur. It does not seem possible to avoid the conclusion that the law of California on the subject of voluntary conveyances by insolvent debtors is such as in the opinion of Justice GAROUTTE it is declared to be. But I cannot refrain from expressing the belief that it is most unfortunate that the court should be forced to that conclusion. When an insolvent debtor makes a gift of his property to a donee of his own selection, there can be but one result, so far as his creditors are concerned. They are necessarily deprived of what is rightfully theirs, and the law ought to pronounce such a transaction ipso facto fraudulent and void as to them. Our legislature, however, has deliberately chosen to make the rights of creditors in such case depend, not upon the proof of facts susceptible of demonstration, and from which the injury is a necessary result, but upon proof of the secret intent of the debtor; in other words, upon the whim of a jury. Such a law invites fraud, puts a premium upon perjury, and multiplies fruitless litigation. It ought to be changed, but the legislature alone has the power to change it. In the mean time the courts should give the utmost force and effect to so much of the law for the protection of creditors as remains. There should be no hesitation in stating, and in every where insisting upon, the proposition that a voluntary conveyance by an insolvent debtor is prima facie proof of a fraudulent intent, which throws upon the donee the necessity of rebutting the inference of fraud; and it ought not to be held or intimated that such inference will be rebutted by the mere fact that the debtor was at the date of the conveyance ignorant or uncertain as to his insolvency. It ought to be made clear, on the contrary, that he believed, and had good reason to believe, that his property remaining after the conveyance would be amply sufficient to enable him to meet and discharge his obligations as they matured.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES — SETTING ASIDE BY GRANTOR'S ADMINISTRATOR.

In an action by an administrator under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1589, to recover property fraudulently conveyed by his intestate in his life-time, the fraudulent intent of the grantor must be alleged in the complaint, and it will not be inferred from the facts set out therein that the conveyance was voluntary, and that intestate was insolvent. BEATTY, C. J., dissenting.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Placer county; B. F. MYRES, Judge.

F. P. Tuttle, for appellant. Hale & Craig, for respondent.

FITZGERALD, C. Appeal from a judgment of the superior court of Placer county. This action was brought by plaintiff as the administrator of the estate of Robert N. Scott, the deceased husband of the defendant, to compel her to convey to him certain real property described in the complaint, and alleged therein to have been conveyed to her as a gift by her said husband on the day preceding his death, while fatally ill, and when he was indebted largely beyond his ability to pay. It is further alleged that the whole of the said property so conveyed should be restored to the estate, in order that the value and proceeds thereof may be applied in due course of administration to the payment of the debts and claims due and payable out of the funds of the said estate. The defendant demurred to the complaint, upon the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer was overruled by the court below, and, upon defendant filing her answer, judgment was given for the plaintiff on the pleadings in the case, upon which judgment defendant prosecutes this appeal.

A question as to pleading, of much importance, is here raised by the demurrer in this case, which seems to have been overlooked by counsel, as no reference whatever is made to it in their briefs, and that is whether the fraudulent intent of the grantor when he executed the conveyance, and which must be proved before plaintiff will be entitled to recover, is a fact necessary to be alleged in the complaint. The power of the administrator to bring this action is derived solely from section 1589 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and in the exercise of it he is expressly limited by its provisions to actions for the recovery of property fraudulently conveyed by the decedent in his life-time. And the question here naturally suggests itself whether the fraudulent intent, which is expressly declared by our statute to be a question of fact, is one, the allegation of which is necessary to the sufficiency of the complaint. We think it is, for the very obvious reason that the allegation of fraudulent intent is indispensable for the purpose of showing the plaintiff's authority under the law to bring the action. Nor will such fraudulent intent, which is itself a question of fact, be inferred from the facts stated in the complaint, either for that or any other purpose, for the further reason that a voluntary conveyance by an insolvent debtor is not necessarily fraudulent and void as to creditors. Jamison v. King, 50 Cal. 136; McFadden v. Mitchell, 54 Cal. 628; Bull v. Bray, (No. 12,695,) 26 Pac. Rep. 873, (filed May 23, 1891.)

Hence it follows that the fraudulent intent is a fact necessary to be alleged in the complaint. As the complaint in this case contains no such allegation, we are of the opinion that the court erred in overruling the demurrer. We therefore advise that the judgment be reversed, with direction to the court below to sustain the demurrer.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

I dissent: BEATTY, C. J.

MCLAUGHLIN v. MENOTTI. (No. 12,475.)

PUBLIC LANDS — RAILROAD GRANTS — RIGHTS OF SETTLERS.

1. Act Cong. July 1, 1863, provides "that there be and is hereby granted" to a certain railroad company certain sections to be afterwards located, depending on the route to be established, and that after the company has designated the general route of its road, and filed a map thereof with the secretary of the interior, he shall cause the lands to be withdrawn from pre-emption, private entry, and sale. Held, that the filing of such map, and the order of the secretary withdrawing the lands, precluded the subsequent incision of any rights in favor of any one else.

2. After such order of the secretary of the interior the land department had no authority to hold that the land was subject to selection by the state.

3. After the company had accepted the terms of the grant, and acted upon them, congress could not divest it of its rights in the lands.

4. To entitle a person to the exception in favor of a bona fide settler contained in a land grant, (Act Cong. July 2, 1864,) it is not enough to show that he occupied and improved the land.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JAMES D. THORNTON, Judge.

A. L. Rhodes, for appellant. T. H. Lane & Hatch, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is an action of ejectment. The complaint is in the usual form, and the answer is a general denial. The plaintiff claims title under a patent from the United States to the Central Pacific Railroad Company issued April 3, 1872, and a deed from that company to plaintiff's testator dated April 3, 1873. The defendant claims under a patent from the state of California dated February 25, 1875.

The facts, which are not disputed, are in substance as follows: In 1863, when the land was unoccupied public land of the United States, Philip Hiram settled on the land, and built thereon a dwelling-house, fences, and corrals, cultivated a portion of it, and remained in possession until he conveyed to one Jean Peter, March, 1866. The latter went into possession of the land, and held the same until it was conveyed by him to the defendant herein, March 29, 1867. On June 13, 1864, Hiram applied to the locating agent of the state to locate the land in controversy under the provisions of the act of the legislature of April 27, 1863, entitled "An act to provide for the sale of certain lands belonging to the state," as a lieu school-land location. This application was in due form, and accompanied by the affidavit of loyalty, and was accepted on the 16th day of June, 1864. At some time prior to January 30, 1865, (the exact date is not found,) the Western Pacific Railroad Company filed a map in the office of the secretary of the interior, designating the general route, and a copy of this map was received at the land-office in San Francisco on the 30th day of January, accompanied by the proper order to the register and receiver, withdrawing the odd-numbered sections, including the lands in controversy, from pre-emption, private entry, and sale. The official map of the township was filed by the United States surveyor general in the local land-office on February 27, 1865. The assignment which the Central Pacific Railroad Company had made and executed in 1864 to the Western Pacific Railroad Company of its right to the land in controversy was affirmed by the act of congress of March 3, 1865. On February 28, 1865, the state's agent located, in lieu of a portion of the school lands of the state which had been lost, the land in controversy, at the request and for the use of Hiram, by filing an application for the same in the name of the state in the United States land-office at San Francisco, and the location so made was filed in the state land-office on the 4th day of April, 1865, and was approved by the surveyor general of the state May 13, 1865. On June 24, 1865, Hiram made payment to the treasurer of the 20 per cent. of the purchase money, and one year's interest on the balance, as required by law; and on the 31st day of August, 1865, a certificate of purchase for the land was issued to him by the state. The line of the Western Pacific Railroad Company was definitely located not earlier than the 1st day of September, 1866. On June 22, 1870, the two railroad companies referred to were consolidated under the name of the Central Pacific Railroad Company. On March 13, 1872, the defendant applied to the officers of the United States land department for a confirmation of the right of the state to the land under the provisions of the act of congress, entitled "An act to quiet land titles in California," approved July 23, 1866. The Western Pacific Railroad Company, and parties claiming under it, were notified; and after proceedings had in the department, the commissioner of the general land-office, under the direction of the secretary of the interior, on May 15, 1874, listed over and certified to the state the land as confirmed to the state of California. A patent of the lands issued from the United States to the Central Pacific Railroad Company April 3, 1872, and on April 3, 1873, the company conveyed the land to the plaintiff. On December 31, 1874, full payment was made to the state by Hiram, and on February 25, 1875, he received from the state a patent of the same.

The question is, upon these facts, which party has the better title? The defendant claims that the act of congress to quiet land titles in California, passed July 23, 1866, confirmed the state location, and granted the land in controversy to the state and her assigns, the state having prior to the passage of the act, and prior to the definite location of the line of the road, made a selection of the land, in lieu of school lands which had been lost, and disposed of the same to defendant, who purchased it in good faith; that the patent to the railroad company is void as to the land in controversy, because at the time the grant to the company took effect the land had been "otherwise disposed of by the United States," within the meaning of section 3 of the act of July 1, 1862. These contentions are the logical result of the defendant's erroneous views as to the operation and effect of the Pacific Railroad acts of July 1, 1862, and July, 1864. Although the amendatory act of 1864 enlarged the grant of 1862, it was done in such a way as to give the same operation and effect to the grant of the enlarged quantity as if it had been included in the provisions of the original act, and there is no longer any question as to the operation and effect of the act of 1862. Referring to a similar grant, the supreme court of the United States, in Railroad Co. v. U. S., 92 U. S. 741, said: "There be and is hereby granted" are words of absolute donation, and import a grant in presenti. * * * They vest a present title in the state of Kansas, though a survey of the lands and a location of the road are necessary to give precision to it, and attach to it any particular tract." In Missouri, etc., Ry. Co. v. Kansas Pac. Ry. Co., 97 U. S. 491, Mr. Justice FIELD, delivering the opinion of the court, considered very carefully the purposes of the act of 1862, of the amendatory act of 1864, and the nature and effect of the grant, and said: "The act of July 1, 1862, passed to the company a present interest in the lands to be designated within the limits there specified. Its language is, 'that there be and is hereby granted' to it the odd sections mentioned, words which import a grant in presenti, and not one in futuro, or the promise of a grant. * * * The grant was of sections to be afterwards located, and their location depended upon the route to be established. When that was settled the location became certain, and the title that was previously imperfect acquired precision and attached to the lands." Section 7 of the act of July 1, 1862, provides that the "said company shall designate the general route of said road as near as may be, and shall file a map of the same in the department of the interior, whereupon the secretary of the interior shall cause the lands * * * to be withdrawn from pre-emption, private entry, and sale." This map was filed in the office of the secretary of the interior prior to January 30, 1865, and on the day last named a copy thereof was filed in the United States land-office at San Francisco, with an order of the secretary withdrawing the lands from pre-emption, private entry, and sale. The purpose of this requirement and the effect of the withdrawal are to preclude the acquisition or initiation of any right other than that of the company in any of the odd-numbered sections of land until the line of the road has become definitely fixed, and when so definitely fixed the grant becomes specific by attaching itself to every odd-numbered section. If, therefore, Hiramman had no lawful claim at the time of the withdrawal,—which at the latest was January 30, 1865,—he never had any, for he could not acquire or initiate any thereafter. Buttz v. Railroad Co., 119 U. S. 55, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 100; Van Wyck v. Knevals, 106 U. S. 360, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 336. In those cases the court held, giving convincing reasons therefor, that the route is definitely fixed so that the grant attaches when a map, approved by the directors, designating the route of the proposed road, is filed with the secretary of the interior, and that no right could be initiated between the time it was so filed and the time when notice of the order was received at the local land-office.

Hiramman's application to the state locating agent was made and accepted in June, 1864. At that time the lands were unsurveyed, and the application and approval were therefore void. Collins v. Bartlett, 44 Cal. 380. It is true the application was on file when the agent made application to the United States land-officers to locate the land, February 23, 1865, one day after the official map of the township had been filed by the surveyor general; but this did not make the application or location valid. The lands had been withdrawn by the secretary, and thereafter no right of any kind could attach to the lands through any act of the state, or its agent. On January 30, 1865, if not before, the company's grant attached in such a manner that its indefeasible right to the land depended only upon the filing of the map of definite location, and the completion of the road. For the same reasons the decision of the officers of the land department in approving and listing the land to the state was void. The title had passed to the company before the listing. The definite location of the line of the road identified the odd-numbered sections within the limits of 25 miles on each side of the road, and the patent to the company took effect by relation as of the date of the passage of the act of July 1, 1862. Missouri, etc., Ry. Co. v. Kansas Pac. Ry. Co., supra. The application to the land department for confirmation under the act of July 23, 1866, was made on March 13, 1872. The land had passed out of the public domain several years prior to that time, and the grant thereof to the company could not be divested or in any manner limited by the action of the officers of the land department.

It is claimed by respondent that the question as to whether the land was subject to selection by the state was a question of fact within the jurisdiction of the land department, and that its decision cannot be attacked in this action. In Smelting Co. v. Kemp, 104 U. S. 641, the court held that if the lands had been previously disposed of, or if congress had made no provision for their sale, or had reserved them, the department would have no jurisdiction to transfer them, and its attempted conveyance would be inoperative and void, no matter with what seeming regularity the forms of law may have been observed. In establishing any of these particulars the judgment of the department upon matters properly before it is not assailed. Its authority to act at all is denied, and shown never to have existed. Wright v. Roseberry, 121 U. S. 519, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 985; Doolan v. Carr, 125 U. S. 618, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1228. The act of August 3, 1854, provides that, if the lists embrace lands not granted to the state or territory, "said lists, so far as these lands are concerned, shall be perfectly null and void, and no right, title, claim, or interest shall be conveyed thereby." 10 U. S. St. 346.

The confirmatory act of July 23, 1866, did not give to defendant's claim any additional assurance. There is nothing in that act indicating an intention on the part of congress to make its provisions applicable to any lands which had been withdrawn from sale; and, if there were, it would be a nullity so far as the lands granted and withdrawn from sale under the Pacific Railroad acts are concerned, for congress could not, after the company had accepted the terms of the acts of 1862 and 1864, and acted upon them, divest the company of its right in the lands.

Some of these questions have been considered recently in the United States circuit court, ninth circuit. In a thorough and elaborate opinion by Judge SAWYER, (Justice FIELD concurring,) the decisions of the national courts and the provisions of the several acts of congress bearing on the subject were carefully reviewed, and the conclusions reached which we have expressed above. U. S. v. Curtner, 38 Fed. Rep. 1.

Section 4 of the act of July 2, 1864, provides that "any land granted by this act, or the act to which this is amendment, shall not defeat or impair any pre-emption, homestead, swamp land, or other lawful claim, nor include any government reservation or mineral land, or the improvements of any bona fide settler, or any lands returned and denominated as mineral lands," etc. Defendant insists that if the lands were not "otherwise disposed of by the United States" (section 3, Act July 1, 1862,) through the selection made by the state, he acquired at least a "lawful claim" and became a "bona fide settler," within the meaning of those words, by the listing over to the state and by operation of the act of July 23, 1866, and therefore the patent to the company was issued without authority of law and is void. The language of the act shows that the "other lawful claim" referred to is a claim which has become in some way so connected with the paramount source of title as to be recognized as a claim by the laws of the United States. A pre-emption claim is a lawful claim because regularly initiated under the laws of the country; so are homestead and swamp-land claims; and the "other lawful claim" referred to must be of equal dignity and force. "Lawful claim" would include a Mexican grant, or the claim of the state to lands granted to it after selection of the lands and before patent; but one who has simply entered upon a parcel of public land, and improved it, without complying with the laws providing for the acquisition of the title, cannot be said to be possessed of a "lawful claim." Railroad Co. v. Tevis, 41 Cal. 494.

Was the defendant a "bona fide settler?" Counsel for appellant said at the argument that the act as enrolled reads, "or the improvements of a bona fide settler on any lands returned and denominated as mineral lands," etc., but assumed that the court would be bound to read it as printed in the volumes of the United States Statutes at Large, and that, if the defendant was a bona fide settler at the time the land was withdrawn from sale by the secretary of the interior, the judgment of the court below should be affirmed. We consider the case from this stand-point. No case was referred to, nor have we been able to find one, in which the words "bona fide settler" have been construed. We think, however, that they must refer to one who has done something more than merely occupy the land, and put a few improvements upon it; and that is all the court has found here. It cannot be said that every one who enters upon land, and builds a fence and a cabin or a house, is a bona fide settler. If congress had intended to exclude from the grant all lands upon which there were settlers having improvements, without regard to the question whether their entry and possession were lawful, it is not likely that it would have employed the term "bona fide." Some effect must be attributed to those words. There certainly must be shown an intention in good faith to proceed diligently to comply with the laws, and acquire title. Appellant contends it must be shown that the settler entered upon the land for the purpose of acquiring title thereto from the government, and that he possessed the necessary qualifications to entitle him to connect his claim with the paramount source of title, and in support of his contention cites the case of U. S. v. Railroad Co.,¹ recently decided in an oral opinion by Judge SAWYER, in the United States circuit court. There appears to be sound reason in the contention, but the exigencies of the case before us do not require us to hold that it must always be shown that the settler was 21 years of age, or the head of a family, or had served the requisite time in the army or navy, and that he was a citizen of the United States, or had declared his intentions to become such. The question whether a settler is a bona fide settler is one of fact. In this case the ultimate fact is not found. Hiramman went upon the land and made improvements thereon in 1858, seven years prior to the time the land was reserved from sale, but for what purpose it is not found, except inferentially. Whether he was possessed of the qualifications necessary to enable him to initiate a valid claim is not found. It is true, it was in the power of congress to exempt from the grant to the companies lands occupied by aliens, and that the legislation of congress has been very liberal in enabling them to qualify themselves to acquire title to the public lands,—perhaps too liberal; but it has never been the policy of the government to encourage settlement without an intention on the part of the settler in good faith to proceed diligently in all the steps necessary to be taken in order to obtain the title. The facts that a settler has occupied and improved the land are merely evidentiary matters. Good intentions alone, added to settlement and improvements, will not establish the ultimate fact. A party who has entered upon public land to acquire the title from the government must show his good faith by diligently complying with the requirements of the law under which he expects to secure the title. Mott v. Hawthorn, 17 Cal. 58; Railroad Co. v. Tevis, supra. The evidence fails to show that the defendant has done so. The failure of the court to find the ultimate fact referred to left the question as to which party has the better title uncertain and unsettled, and entitled the plaintiff to a new trial. The appeal from the judgment was taken more than six years after the entry of the judgment. It is therefore dismissed. Langan v. Langan, (Cal.) 26 Pac. Rep. 764, (filed May 25, 1891.) The order appealed from is reversed.

WECONCUR: MCFARLAND, J.; GAROUTTE, J.; HARRISON, J.

DE HAVEN, J. I concur in the judgment. There is no finding in this case of the ultimate fact of ownership of the land in controversy, nor is it found as a fact that Hirleman, under whom the defendant claims, was a bona fide settler on the land in controversy on January 30, 1865, at which date there was filed in the United States land-office at San Francisco the order of the secretary of the interior, withdrawing from sale and location lands within 25 miles on either side of the general route of the Western Pacific Railroad Company, as shown upon its map of such general route, theretofore filed. If he was such settler, then the land in controversy did not pass to the railroad company; otherwise, it did. The court, therefore, should have found, in addition to the other evidentiary facts, either that he was or was not a bona fide settler, in so many words. A bona fide settler, within the meaning of section 4 of the act of congress of July 2, 1864, is one who has made an actual settlement upon public land, intending in good faith to acquire the title therefrom to the United States. The words should be held to apply to any actual settler upon land affected by the act at the date of the order of withdrawal, provided for in section 7 of the act, and who had settled thereon and made improvements with the intention, in good faith, of taking at the proper time the necessary steps to acquire the title of the government in any of the modes allowed by the laws of the United States, and, as thus defined, are broad enough to include one who has made a settlement with the intention of procuring its location in part satisfaction of any grant made by the United States to the state, and then purchasing from the state. This reservation of land occupied by bona fide settlers is not a grant to such persons. They must show themselves entitled to enter it before they are permitted to acquire the title, but it is a withdrawal of such occupied land from the grant made to the railroad company.

I think, also, that as there was no evidence tending to show that Hirleman was not a citizen of the United States the court would have been justified in finding, from the facts before it, that he was possessed of the qualifications entitling him to purchase land from the state, and that upon January 30, 1865, he was a bona fide settler upon the land in controversy, within the meaning of the act of July 2, 1864.

CASHMAN v. ROOT et al. (No. 13,152.)

GAMBLING CONTRACTS—SPECULATION IN STOCKS—MARGINS—ACTION TO RECOVER MONEY LOST.

Const. Cal. art. 4, § 26, providing that "all contracts for the sale of shares of the capital stock of any corporation or association, on margin or to be delivered at a future day, shall be void, and any money paid on such contracts may be recovered," applies to a transaction wherein a broker purchases stock for a customer with his own money, charging only commissions and interest thereon, and retaining the stock as security until its sale, the customer putting up only a certain margin, and receiving the profit or paying the loss.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. H. REARDEN, Judge.

Action by William F. Cashman against George B. Root and one Hooker, to compel a conveyance of certain real estate. From a judgment for defendants plaintiff appeals.

P. Reddy and W. H. Metson, for appellant. Pillsbury & Blanding, M. C. Baum, and Chas. J. Heggerty, for respondents.

TEMPLE, C. This action is brought to compel a conveyance to plaintiff of certain real estate, which it is averred was conveyed by plaintiff to defendant Root on the 18th of June, 1884, in trust to secure the payment by plaintiff to defendant Hooker of any indebtedness which might exist within six months after the 14th of July, 1885. The complaint alleges that plaintiff was not, at the commencement of the suit, and for a long time prior had not been, indebted to Hooker in any amount whatever. Demand for a deed and refusal are also averred. The answers admit that the conveyance was made in trust, as charged in the complaint, but charge that plaintiff is still indebted to the defendant Hooker in the sum of $2,347. Defendant Hooker was a stock broker engaged in buying and selling mining stocks in San Francisco, on margin or otherwise, as required. Plaintiff had been a regular customer of Hooker for many years, and had lost heavily in stock speculations. Being, as Hooker testified, rather short of money, he conveyed the property sued for in trust to defendant Root, who was in Hooker's employ, to cover margins, and to enable plaintiff to continue his speculations in stock. Hooker states that he valued it at about $3,000, and to that extent plaintiff could buy on margin without actually putting up money. They continued to deal together until Hooker's business was closed by his insolvency in December, 1886, at which time Hooker held certain stocks for plaintiff, and, according to Hooker's books, plaintiff owed him $2,347. Plaintiff does not dispute the correctness of the account according to the course of dealing between the parties or their understanding at the time, but claims that the debt is illegal, and the contract to pay void, under section 26 of article 4 of the constitution of this state. It reads as follows: "All contracts for the sale of shares of the capital stock of any corporation or association, on margin or to be delivered at a future day, shall be void, and any money paid on such contracts may be recovered by the party paying it by suit in any court of competent jurisdiction." Plaintiff's dealings with Hooker were altogether on margin. When the estimated value of the land did not afford sufficient margin, it was put up in cash, and was kept good as the market fluctuated. Upon purchasing stock, the cost price was charged to plaintiff, less the amount of margin put up in cash. When sold, his account was credited with the amount realized. He was, of course, charged with the broker's commissions and the interest on the money advanced. The result, of course, was that plaintiff, aside from the commissions and interest, simply received or paid the differences between the buying and selling values. It was not contemplated that he should ever receive the stock, although he might, had he been able, have paid his debt and demanded the securities at any time. Stock ordered was always purchased by Hooker, paid for in full, and delivered to him, except when he had orders to sell the same stock for another customer, in which case the stock was simply transferred from one account to the other at market rates. The account was generally balanced monthly, when, as Hooker testified, plaintiff could tell whether he had lost or won in stocks. Hooker did not keep the stock of his customers separate, or preserve its identity, but always had under his control sufficient to satisfy the claims of his customers.

It is evident from these facts that the only purpose of these dealings was to enable plaintiff to speculate in the fluctuations of the market. If there were no break in the proceedings, it was indifferent to plaintiff whether any stock was bought or not, provided the entries were made in his account according to the market rates. It was quite a different matter, however, to Hooker. Had he not purchased, the transaction would have been a continuous wager between himself and his customer as to the future of the market. By purchasing he secured himself, and had no other interest than his commissions and the interest on his money. So, too, had there been a break anywhere in the deal, it might have been important to determine whether the stock was purchased by Hooker as agent and belonged to plaintiff, or was purchased for himself simply to make himself safe upon his contract to give plaintiff the advantage of the fluctuations of the market. The respondent contends that the relation of vendor and vendee did not exist between plaintiff and Hooker; that they neither bought nor sold stock to each other; that Hooker, as agent for plaintiff, purchased and paid for the stock, receiving immediate delivery for plaintiff, and thereafter held it subject to his order upon the payment of the price and commissions. The further contract, by which he held it as security for a loan, constituted the relation of pledgee and pledgor, which is not prohibited by the constitution. This view was adopted by the learned judge of the trial court, and the findings are carefully drawn upon that theory. They find that the stock was purchased by Hooker as agent of and belonged to plaintiff, and that Hooker never sold stock to, or bought from, plaintiff. No part of the indebtedness, therefore, arose from the sale of stock on margin or otherwise.

This view of the relation between the broker and his customer in such a transaction is sustained by the weight of authorities, in this country and in England, but the decisions are by no means uniform. The first prominent case on the point is Markham v. Jaudon, 41 N. Y. 235. The question there was whether the stock in the hands of the broker was a pledge. In order to determine this question, an analysis is made of the contract relations, separating the powers and obligations of the parties. It was held that the broker undertook (1) to purchase for his customer; (2) to advance the money required beyond the margin; (3) to carry the stock, the margin being kept good, the customer to receive the gain or suffer the loss; (4) to retain the stock, or an equal amount of the same kind of stock; (5) to deliver to customer when required, upon payment; or (6) to sell when required, accounting for the proceeds. That the customer contracts: (1) To pay the stipulated margin; (2) to keep the margin good; and (3) to take the shares when required, and pay the amount due the broker. This statement of the rights and obligations of the parties has been generally followed in other cases, in which similar questions have arisen; and stockboards and brokers have adopted it as correctly stating the nature of the relation between broker and customer. It is evident, however, that the court in this analysis assumes the conclusion which it desired to reach. Its correctness has been questioned. In that case there were two strong dissenting opinions, in which the relation between the broker and his customer was regarded simply as a contract relation, by which the fact of agency was ignored or denied. Mr. Justice GROVER says: "The contract contemplated that the title should at all times remain in the defendants (brokers.)" Mr. Justice WOODRUFF refers for his views of the relation to his opinion in Morgan v. Jaudon, 40 How. Pr. 366. He there states his opinion to be that "it does not contemplate, in the first instance, that the customer shall ever acquire the title to the stock. It is a pure speculation in the rise and fall of stocks, * * * and the broker is employed to provide the means, either from his own funds, * * * or by borrowing in his own name and on his own credit, by pledge of the very stock which he buys, the required amount; and the whole expectation and intention of the parties is satisfied, if, when directed to sell, he produces the required number of shares, and sells them for the very purpose for which the speculation is made, viz., to realize the profits or determine the loss which results to the party employing him for that purpose. It is entirely clear that in these transactions the party employed, though he belongs to a class commonly called 'brokers,' does not act as broker merely. In such business they are more than brokers; and all arguments imputing to them a mere agency, so far as they rest upon the facts that they are called 'brokers,' are unsound and fallacious." In Pennsylvania it has been held that the relation of principal and agent does not exist between the broker and his customer, but both are principals. Ruchizky v. De Haven, 97 Pa. St. 202; North v. Phillips, 89 Pa. St. 250; Dickson v. Thomas, 97 Pa. St. 278; Gheen v. Johnson, 90 Pa. St. 38. In Ingraham v. Taylor, 58 Conn. 503, 20 Atl. Rep. 601, it was held that the broker, under such a contract, was not bound to purchase the stocks at all. It was enough if he could procure them when called for, at the market rate, when ordered. It is said: "By such contracts the plaintiff bought the right to demand at his option as to the time the delivery of shares at the price of the day of agreement. The defendants, in consideration of his payments upon margins, assumed the risk of an undertaking to deliver shares upon demand at that price." These citations are made to show that it is not universally admitted that the broker in such transactions purchases the stock as the agent of the customer. Looking at it from the point of view of the customer only, it is clear that by this device he has been able to purchase stock on margin. This phrase has come to have a peculiar or technical meaning among stock dealers, and it is applied to just these transactions between broker and customer.

It is a matter of public history that the constitutional provision was adopted just after a period of remarkable stock speculation, in which a large part of the community had been set wild with the apparent prospect of great gain, and the rapid fluctuations of stock afforded unusual inducement to stock gambling. By skillful manipulation of the markets, a few fortunate ones had been able to take advantage of the existing mania, and make large fortunes for themselves, at the cost of wide-spread financial ruin and distress. People of small means were enabled by brokers to speculate largely at that time, through these very purchases on margin. Of these matters this court will take judicial notice, and, doing so, cannot doubt that this inhibition was intended to strike down this practice. If it does not do this, it simply beats the air. Although an isolated case or two might occur, where a transaction directly between vendor and vendee is upon like terms, certainly we know there was no practice of that kind which could have been regarded as an evil of sufficient importance to be prohibited in the fundamental law. Such a prohibition is of little worth if it can be evaded by so simple a device. A party wishing to purchase on margin has but to interpose his broker, who is to carry the stock instead of the original owner. This would not diminish the evil. In fact, it is the very form of the evil mainly intended to be prohibited. It may be said that if the relation be not one of principal and agent, but simply a contract relation, by which the broker agrees to speculate in stocks, the customer indemnifying him against loss, and taking the profits, still there is no sale. It would be, it may be said, a contract to enable the customer to speculate in differences of market values. It is only sales on margin that are prohibited and made void. It is not easy to characterize by a name the relation between the broker and his customer. For all ordinary purposes, it may be admitted that the broker purchases as the agent of his customer, and then holds the stock as a pledge to secure a debt; but if by the transaction the customer is enabled to do that which is prohibited, to-wit, purchase stock on margin, it must be held to be within the prohibition; and, if Hooker did not himself sell to plaintiff, but was only the instrument through whom the illegal end was accomplished, he being privy to the design, the same result would follow. Irwin v. Williar, 110 U. S. 510, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 160. In the accomplishment of the unlawful purpose, he took the place of the vendor, and carried the stock as the vendor might have done; and the end was thus reached per interpositum personam. The end attained, and not the form of the transaction, must determine the question. It is claimed that it does not appear that the stock was the capital stock of a corporation or an association; but it is so found, and the respondent is in no position to complain of the finding. We think the court erred in holding, from the evidence, that plaintiff was indebted to Hooker or his assignee. We therefore recommend that the order and judgment be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order and judgment are reversed, and a new trial ordered.

McVERRY v. BOYD et al. (No. 12,916.)

STREET IMPROVEMENTS — ASSESSMENTS — VALIDITY — ENFORCEMENT OF LIEN.

1. Acts Cal. 1871-72, § 7, relating to the granting of contracts for street improvements by the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco, provides that, if the contractor desires to have the time for completing his contract extended, he must make application to the board of supervisors, and "under the direction of the board" the superintendent of streets may extend the time, and that on passage of the resolution by the board, the superintendent shall cause the same to be recorded. Held, that the duties of the superintendent are ministerial only the extension being granted by the board, and his failure to record the resolution of extension during the life of the contract does not render the extension invalid, if the resolution was passed in time.

2. After a contract for street improvement has been completed, a property owner cannot, in an action to enforce the lien of the assessment, question the sufficiency of a power of attorney under which the contract was entered into.

3. Where a statute gives the board of supervisors authority to order a street "graded or regraded," they may order the regrading though the property owners have already borne the expense of grading.

4. St. Cal. 1869-70, p. 483, and Civil Code Cal. § 498, requiring the owners of a railroad to improve a certain portion of the streets over which their track is laid, do not require that they shall be assessed with any portion of the expense of improving the street under a contract between the city and contractors.

5. Where a property owner contests the validity of an assessment for street improvements on the ground that the expense of improving a portion of the street occupied by a railroad should have been assessed against the railroad company, the burden is on him to show that such expense was included in the assessment against him.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WALTER H. LEVY, Judge.

W. W. Cope, for appellant. J. M. Wood, (J. C. Bates, of counsel,) for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action to foreclose the lien of a street assessment upon a lot on Clay street, in the city of San Francisco. The appeal is by defendant Boyd from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial. Findings of fact were waived. April 3d was the day upon which the contract of plaintiff for the completion of the work expired, and upon that day the board of supervisors passed the following resolution: "Resolved, that the superintendent of public streets, highways, and squares, be and is hereby directed to grant the following extensions of time on street contracts, viz.: To property owners or assigns, 30 days for regrading Clay street from Jones to Leavenworth." The street superintendent did not, in pursuance of the foregoing resolution, issue a certificate of the 30-day extension until April 10th. The extension must be granted within the life of the contract in order to be valid. Ralsch v. City and County of San Francisco, 80 Cal. 1, 22 Pac. Rep. 22; Beveridge v. Livingstone, 54 Cal. 54.

1. It is contended by the appellant that the extension to the contractor is granted by the street superintendent, and that the resolution of the board of supervisors is merely permissive or directory of such action, and that therefore in this case the contract was dead upon the 10th day of April, the date upon which the superintendent acted upon the resolution of the board. But upon a careful consideration of section 7 of the acts of 1871-72 it would seem that such contention is untenable. The law vests in the board of supervisors, acting judicially, the right to determine when additional time should be granted to the contractor; and whatever the statute requires the street superintendent to do under an order of the board directing an extension, he does as a ministerial act, and the statute is merely directory in that respect. Section 6 of the Act (St. 1871-72, p. 807,) provides that before the awarding of any contract by the board of supervisors the clerk shall cause to be posted a notice inviting sealed proposals, "which notice shall specify the time within which said work is to be performed," and also provides that prior to the publication of that notice the superintendent of streets shall furnish specifications "and the time within which the contract must be completed." These acts of the superintendent are not conclusive upon the board of supervisors in the matter of awarding the contract, but are merely advisory to it. The board is the legislative body, and the authority by which the contract is finally awarded. The time within which the work is to be completed is as much a part of the contract as is the manner of its performance. The superintendent, in entering into the contract, is but the ministerial officer of the board and can enter into only such contracts as have been authorized by it. After the contract has been awarded, he has no power to change the specifications, or the time within which the work shall be completed. If the contractor desires to have the time for its completion extended, he must make application to the board of supervisors, "and under the direction of the board of supervisors" the superintendent may extend the time originally fixed for the completion of the contract. After such "direction" the superintendent has no discretion in the matter, but may be compelled to carry out the "directions" of the board. The statute does not specify in terms the mode in which such extension shall be made; the only requirement being that, "on the passage of a resolution by the board of supervisors directing an extension of time to be granted to complete a contract," he shall "cause the same to be recorded in the office of the county recorder." This is the only act which the statute requires of the superintendent in the matter of extending the contract after he has been so "directed" by the board of supervisors. The statute, however, implies that the extension may be indorsed upon the original contract, but there is no direct requirement that such indorsement be made. Such indorsement, however, is not the extension of the contract, but merely an evidence of the fact that the contract has been previously extended by the board of supervisors, the only party having authority to grant the extension. In causing this resolution of extension to be recorded in the office of the county recorder, as well as in making an indorsement thereof upon the contract itself, the superintendent is but giving expression to the act of the board of supervisors, and not in the exercise of any original authority conferred upon him. The statute does not say that the extension shall not be effectual until it is indorsed upon the contract, and the fact that such indorsement was not made for several days "could not, as we concede, prejudice defendant's rights, and should not be permitted to prejudice the rights of plaintiff, who had no control of the matter." Himmelmänn v. Reay, 38 Cal. 165. This construction of the statute is corroborated by a subsequent clause in section 7, which provides that the county recorder shall keep books of record in which "all extensions of time granted by the board of supervisors, as certified to by the superintendent, shall be recorded."

2. We do not think that the appellant can question in this action the sufficiency of the power of attorney from Jones to Jackson to enter into the contract with the superintendent of streets. After the board of supervisors have acquired jurisdiction to order the work done, and a contract has been awarded at a fixed price, unless the property owner himself desires to do the work, it is a matter of indifference to him by whom it is done, provided it is completed in accordance with the terms of the contract to the satisfaction of the superintendent. The burden upon his land is not affected in any respect by the fact that the work has been done under the contract with one person rather than with another. If there was any controversy between different property owners concerning their respective rights to enter into contract with the superintendent, or if the person to whom the contract had been awarded disputed the right of those claiming to be property owners to enter into the contract, the sufficiency of the power of attorney might be questioned; but after the contract has been completed, and the work accepted, the defendant in an action to enforce the lien of the assessment cannot make this objection as a defense. Miller v. Mayo, 28 Pac. Rep. 364, (No. 13,978, filed April 1, 1891.)

3. The objection by the appellant to the jurisdiction of the supervisors to order the work done, upon the ground that the street had been previously graded, is untenable. The statute in question (section 3)¹ gives to the board of supervisors the same authority for regrading as for grading a street. There is no limitation upon its powers in this respect. It is left to the discretion of the board to determine what work it will order done in any particular instance. Section 14 of the act does not in terms purport to give to the superintendent exclusive or any jurisdiction to order the regrading of a street; but is limited to the improvement of a street in front of individual lots. Whenever the condition of a street is such as, in the estimation of the board of supervisors, it is proper that the burden of regrading the same should be borne by the entire block, it has authority to order such improvement, even though a similar expense has previously been borne by the property owners.

4. Appellant urges that the assessment is void for the reason that no part of the expense was assessed against the railroad company whose track occupied a portion of the street. The statute referred to, (St. 1869-70, p. 482,) as well as the Civil Code, § 498, provides that the owners of the railroad shall improve a certain portion of the street over which their track is laid, but does not require that any portion of the expense incurred under a contract with the municipal authorities shall be assessed to it. Indeed, under the provision that the expenses shall be assessed "upon the lots and lands fronting" upon the work, such portion of the expense could not be assessed to the railroad company. There is nothing, however, upon the face of the assessment, from which it can be determined that any portion of the expense of regrading that portion of the street occupied by the railroad company was included therein. Being prima facie correct, it was incumbent upon the appellant to show wherein it was defective. The mere fact that a portion of the street was occupied by a railroad company whose duty it was to improve, or to bear the expense of improving, a part of the street, does not impair the prima facie correctness of the assessment. The apportionment of the expense of the work is given by the statute to the superintendent of streets; and the defendant, if dissatisfied with the assessment, should have appealed to the board of supervisors, as provided by section 12 of the act in question. Having failed to do so, he cannot now complain of any matters from which he could have obtained relief by applying at the proper time to the proper authorities. Hewes v. Reis, 40 Cal. 264; Himmelmänn v. Hoadley, 44 Cal. 279; Dorland v. McGlynn, 47 Cal. 51; Boyle v. Hitchcock, 66 Cal. 129, 4 Pac. Rep. 1143; Blair v. Luning, 76 Cal. 135, 18 Pac. CRIMINAL LAW—SECOND CONVICTION—SENTENCE—HABEAS CORPUS.

1. Pen. HARRISON, J. Application for discharge on habeas corpus. In his return to the writ issued herein, the warden of the state-prison produces, as his authority for the detention of the petitioner, a certified copy of the judgment of conviction, as follows: "Commitment. In the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, state of California. Department No. 11. Saturday, February 19, 1887. Present: Hon. D. J. Toohey, Judge. The People of the State of California vs. Gus Williams, convicted of burglary in the second degree. The district attorney, with the defendant and his counsel, Mr. O'Brien, came into court. The defendant was duly informed by the court of the information duly presented and filed on the 26th day of January, 1887, by the district attorney of the city and county of San Francisco, charging said defendant with the crime of burglary, and three prior convictions; of his arraignment and plea of 'not guilty as charged in said information;' of his trial and the verdict of the jury on the 16th day of February, 1887, 'Guilty of burglary in the second degree;' and defendant's motion for a new trial having been denied by the court, and said prior convictions having been admitted by defendant, the defendant was then asked if he had any legal cause to show why judgment should not be pronounced against him, to which defendant replied he had none; and, no sufficient cause being shown or appearing to the court, thereupon the court renders its judgment that whereas, the said Gus Williams having been duly convicted in this court of the crime of burglary in the second degree, it is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the said Gus Williams be punished by imprisonment in the state-prison of the state of California, at San Quentin, for the term of ten (10) years. The defendant was then remanded to the custody of the sheriff of the city and county, to be by him delivered into the custody of the proper officers of said state-prison at San Quentin. Office of the county clerk, city and county of San Francisco. I, William J. Ruddick, county clerk of the city and county of San Francisco, and ex officio clerk of said superior court thereof, do hereby certify the foregoing to be a true and correct copy of a judgment entered on the minutes of said court in and for the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, in the above-entitled cause, as appears of record in my office. Attest: My hand, and the seal of the said superior court, this 19th day of Feb'y., 1887. [Seal.] WILLIAM J. RUDDICK, Clerk. By BERT McNULTY, Deputy-Clerk." To countervail the effect of this, the petitioner presented the following document: "In the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, state of California. Department No. 11. Saturday, February 19, 1887. Present: D. J. Toohey, Judge. The People of the State of California vs. Gus Williams, convicted of burglary, second degree. This being the day set for sentence, the defendant and counsel being present in court, the defendant was asked if he had any legal cause to show why judgment should not be pronounced against him, to which defendant replied that he had none. Thereupon the court renders its judgment that whereas, the said Gus Williams having been duly convicted of the crime of burglary, second degree, it is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the said Gus Williams be punished by imprisonment in the state-prison at San Quentin, for the term of ten (10) years. The defendant was then remanded to the custody of the sheriff of the city and county, to be by him delivered into the custody of the proper officers of said state-prison at San Quentin. I, Wm. J. Blattner, county clerk of the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, and ex officio clerk of the superior court in and for said city and county, hereby certify the foregoing to be a full, true, and correct copy of the original minute entry of judgment in the above-entitled cause, filed in my office on the 19th day of February, A. D. 1887. Attest: My hand and seal of said court this 27th day of January, A. D. 1891. [Seal.] WM. J. BLATTNER, Clerk. By B. F. JONES, Deputy-Clerk."

It is claimed on behalf of the petitioner that the latter document must be taken as the judgment in the case, and, inasmuch as the maximum term of imprisonment for burglary in the second degree is fixed by the statute at five years, that, with proper deductions for good behavior, that term has expired, and he is entitled to his discharge. We cannot, however, in proceedings upon habeas corpus, determine that the document under which the petitioner is detained, and which is certified by the clerk to be a "true and correct copy of the judgment entered on the minutes of said court," is to be disregarded, or held of no effect, by the production of another document certified by the same officer to be a "full, true, and correct copy of the original minute entry of judgment, filed in the clerk's office." A stipulation by the attorney for the petitioner and the attorney general was filed herein at the hearing to the effect that the information upon which the petitioner was convicted, in addition to the charge of burglary, charged him with three prior convictions; and that upon being arraigned he pleaded not guilty to the crime charged, and admitted the prior convictions; that such plea and admission were entered in the minutes of the court; that the cause was thereupon set down for trial upon a subsequent day; and that the judgment roll made up by the clerk included copies of these entries in the minutes, as well as copies of the judgment and minute entry hereinbefore set out. It is thus seen that it appears upon the record of the case that the court did not exceed its jurisdiction in sentencing the prisoner to imprisonment in the state-prison for the term of 10 years. Ex parte Young Ah Gow, 73 Cal. 438, 15 Pac. Rep. 76.

It was not necessary that the entry of the judgment in the minutes should repeat the entries that had already been made in previous proceedings in the case. These had already become a part of the record, and would obtain no greater validity by being a second time recited in the minutes. "From the mere fact that these several papers are taken into and made a part of the record, it is clear that each one was intended merely to tell its own story, or, rather, to relate its particular branch of the whole history. Thus, the indictment states the jurisdictional facts, the nature of the offense, and the facts and circumstances so far as they are material. The other papers give the history of the trial, including the verdict; and the judgment, which constitutes the last chapter, merely finishes the account by stating of what offense defendant was finally convicted, and the penalty imposed by the court. The judgment need not, and it was not intended that it should, repeat anything contained in the papers which precede it, for, in view of the fact that they go into the record and make a part of it, such repetition would be idle and serve no useful purpose. The only material parts of a judgment are the statement of the offense for which the defendant has been convicted, omitting therefrom all that is contained in the previous papers, and therefore not necessary to be repeated, and the sentence of the court." In re Ring, 28 Cal. 253. It therefore appearing that the petitioner is detained in custody by virtue of process issued upon the "final judgment of a competent court of criminal jurisdiction," the provisions of section 1486 of the Penal Code require that he be remanded, and it is so ordered.

RIVERSIDE WATER CO. v. GAGE. (No. 13,-426.)

WATER-RIGHTS — IRRIGATION — PLEADING — FINDINGS.

1. An allegation in a complaint that plaintiff is owner of and entitled to all the water above defendant's dam in excess of 200 inches, and that by its construction, and a ditch diverting the flow, he has been deprived of over 450 inches of water, does not limit his claim to 450 inches, nor in any way qualify it.

2. A finding that plaintiff is the "owner" of all the water above defendant's dam in excess of a certain quantity is not in conflict with the rule that an appropriator of water does not become the owner until he has acquired its control by diverting it into conduits, when plaintiff is not seeking to recover the value of the water, but is seeking the determination of defendant's claim of a right to divert it.

3. Where the complaint alleged ownership and right of use in a certain portion of the waters of a river, an adverse and unfounded claim by defendant to, and a wrongful diversion of, a portion thereof, and the answer admits defendant's adverse claim, alleges that it is valid, and denies the wrongful diversion, a judgment that plaintiff has acquired a prescriptive right is not affected by a failure to find the facts as to prescription and the statute of limitation, since these issues are not raised by the pleadings.

4. An answer alleging that defendant was the owner of land through which the river flowed for a distance of about three miles, and that most of it was susceptible of, and would be benefited by, irrigation, is insufficient to raise any issue as to his right to take water by virtue of his riparian ownership, in the absence of an allegation that he was entitled as riparian owner to any definite amount of water, or what portion of the stream he could exhaust for irrigating, nor whether his land was located above or below the point of plaintiff's diversion.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; JAMES A. GIBSON, Judge.

Byron Waters, (Kellogg & King, of counsel,) for appellant. Curtis & Otis, (R. E. Houghton, of counsel,) for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. The plaintiff, a California corporation organized for the purpose of appropriating, owning, selling, and distributing water for the irrigation of lands, and for domestic and other purposes, brings this suit to determine the adverse claim of the defendant to a portion of the waters of the Santa Ana river, and for an injunction restraining the defendant from diverting water in excess of his right. The findings and decree of the superior court were in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals from the judgment, claiming that the findings do not correspond with the allegations of the complaint, and that they are insufficient to support the decree. The substance of the decree is that the plaintiff is, as against the defendant, the owner and entitled to the use of all the water flowing in the Santa Ana river at the head of defendant's ditch during the irrigating season of each year, i. e., the months of May, June, July, August, and September, except 200 inches, which the defendant owns and is entitled to use, and the defendant is perpetually enjoined from diverting or obstructing the flow past his ditch of any water in excess of that quantity.

It is contended, in the first place, that this decree is erroneous because it goes entirely beyond the case made by the allegations of the complaint. But we think counsel for appellant misconstrues the complaint. It alleges very clearly and explicitly that the plaintiff at the commencement of the action was, and for more than 10 years prior thereto had been, the owner and entitled to the use of all the waters flowing in the Santa Ana river, at the point where defendant's dam was erected, in excess of 200 inches, measured under a 4-inch pressure; that defendant claimed some estate, title, or interest in said waters in excess of said 200 inches, which claim was wrongful and unfounded; and that he had wrongfully and without right placed obstructions in the river which prevented the water from flowing down to plaintiff as it was of right accustomed to flow, whereby plaintiff had been deprived of the use of upwards of 450 inches of water. This is not a claim, as appellant's counsel contends, that the plaintiff is owner and entitled to the use of 450 inches, and no more, of the water flowing in the Santa Ana river at the defendant's dam, but on the contrary is a claim of all the water flowing at that point except 200 inches, and that the defendant's claim to any water in excess of that quantity is wrongful and unfounded. The allegation that plaintiff has been deprived of the use and enjoyment of upwards of 450 inches of water by the acts of defendant in erecting the dam does not limit the plaintiff's claim to that quantity, or in any manner qualify the allegation that it owns all the water in excess of 200 inches. The issue tendered on this point was very clearly defined by the express admission of the defendant in his answer that he did claim all the water flowing in the Santa Ana river at the point of his dam, and his allegation that his claim was lawful and valid. The findings of the court were exactly responsive to this issue, and the decree follows the findings.

The second point made by appellant is a refinement upon the first, and consists of a criticism upon the allegation and finding that the plaintiff was the owner of a quantity of water at the defendant's dam. It is urged that an appropriator of water does not become the owner of the very body of the water as his personal property until he has acquired the control of it in conduits or reservoirs of his own. Citing Canal, etc., Co. v. Hoyt, 57 Cal. 46. The proposition, as stated, is undoubtedly correct; and if in this case, as in the case cited, the plaintiff's right of action depended upon its ownership of the corpus of the water at defendant's dam as its personal property, the objection to the findings would be material. But in this case the plaintiff is not seeking to recover the value of water which had become its personal property. It is seeking the determination of the adverse claim of defendant to the right to divert and use a portion of the stream; and the allegation and finding of ownership and right of use of all water flowing in the stream at defendant's dam in excess of a certain number of inches is only a mode, and a very apt and sufficient mode, of designating the quantity of water, to the unobstructed flow of which the plaintiff is entitled.

The remaining points urged by the appellant all relate to various specific findings of the court to the effect that plaintiff has acquired by prescription certain rights as against the defendant, and the defendant is barred by certain sections of the statute of limitations from the assertion of any rights he may have had as a riparian owner.

It is contended by the appellant that it is not enough to find that the plaintiff has acquired a prescriptive right to water as against the defendant, but that the facts must be found from which a prescriptive right arises; and it is further contended that, although the bar of the statute of limitations may be pleaded by a bald allegation that a claim or defense is barred by a particular section of the Code, a finding upon such issue is not sufficient unless it shows the existence of every fact necessary to bring the party pleading the statute within the provisions of the section relied on. All this may be so in a case where the fact of prescription or the bar of the statute is directly and necessarily in issue; but if a finding on these points is not necessary to support the decree, and is not made necessary by the pleadings, as we think is the case here, the insufficiency of the finding becomes immaterial. The complaint in this case alleges ownership and right of use in a certain portion of the waters of the Santa Ana river, an adverse and unfounded claim by defendant to, and a wrongful diversion of, a portion of such waters. The answer admits defendant's adverse claim, alleges that it is valid, and denies the wrongful diversion. The findings of the court are as broad and as specific on these points as the pleadings themselves, and contain everything necessary to support the judgment. If the findings as to prescription and the statute of limitations are not sufficient as findings on those points, they may be left out of consideration, and still the judgment is sustained by the findings that remain. Of course, if there was anything in the findings in question inconsistent with those which are required to support the judgment, they could not be left out of consideration, but they present no such inconsistency. They also support the judgment, so far as they go, and the only fault found with them is that they are not sufficiently specific. It may be contended, however, and no doubt that is the view of appellant's counsel, that the matters alleged by the defendant in his answer rendered full and specific findings on those points necessary. The answer of defendant sets up the facts, among others, that the Santa Ana river rises in the mountains, and flows through a narrow canon for about 30 miles to the point where it debouches into San Bernardino valley; that immediately below the point where it enters the valley, its waters were diverted by appropriators, not parties to this suit, as early as 1857, who have ever since continued so to divert and use such waters; that other appropriators made subsequent appropriations lower down on the stream by means of ditches, and for purposes sufficient to more than exhaust its entire flow; that the plaintiff's pretended claim is subsequent and subordinate to all these appropriations, and his point of diversion below them on the stream. To certain of these earlier rights by appropriation the defendant claims to have succeeded, and by reason thereof to have a right superior to that of the plaintiff. He plants himself, in other words, upon the ground of prior appropriation and prescriptive right. As to all these matters the findings of the court are full and specific. It is found that there were such earlier appropriations; that the defendant has succeeded to the rights of certain of the appropriators, and the water awarded to him by the decree is the quantity which it is found was appropriated by his grantors prior to the appropriation under which the plaintiff claims. There can be and there is no complaint that the findings are insufficient as to the rights of the defendant as an appropriator. But, in addition to the appropriations, upon which the defendant seems mainly to have relied, he did allege in his answer that he was the owner of a tract of land, containing about 2,600 acres, through and over which the Santa Ana river flowed for a distance of about 3 miles, and that most of the tract was susceptible of, and would be benefited by, irrigation. He did not, however, allege that he was entitled as a riparian owner to any definite quantity of water for the irrigation of his riparian lands, nor did he allege any facts showing or tending to show what proportion of the waters of the stream he could reasonably exhaust for that purpose. Nor is it alleged whether his land was above or below the point of plaintiff's diversion. In short, we think the answer insufficient to raise any issue as to the extent of defendant's right as a mere riparian proprietor to divert and exhaust any portion of the waters of the stream. The finding on this point is as full as and no fuller than the allegation, and does not conflict with the general finding in favor of plaintiff as to ownership of the water decreed to it. It was not necessary, therefore, to support the conclusions and judgment of the court, to find that the plaintiff had gained a prescriptive right, or that the defendant was barred of his riparian right; and, conceding these findings to be as insufficient as appellant contends they are, we think the other findings cover all the material issues, and fully support the judgment. Judgment affirmed.

BATES v. GREGORY et al. (No. 18,168.)

MUNICIPAL BONDS — CHANGE OF CORPORATION — LIMITATION OF ACTION.

1. By Act Cal. March 26, 1851, the city of Sacramento was incorporated, and provision made that it might sue and be sued under its corporate name of the "Mayor and Common Council of the City of Sacramento." Under provisions of acts of April 26, 1853, and April 10, 1854, it issued bonds payable July 1, 1874. By Act May 1, 1858, the city and county of Sacramento were united under the name of the "City and County of Sacramento," the act providing that the city and county was thereby made the successor of the mayor and common council, and the property and rights of the latter corporation transferred to and vested in the former. It was also provided that the city and council should not be subject to suit, or its property liable for debt. By Act April 25, 1863, the inhabitants within the limits of the city of Sacramento as defined in the act of March 26, 1851, were made a body politic under the name of the "City of Sacramento," and all property which on April 30, 1858, was vested in the "Mayor and Common Council," etc., and such as had since been acquired within the described city limits for municipal purposes, was transferred to the new corporation, and provision made that it might be sued on any bond or contract thereafter made. Held, that the holder of the bonds could not be deprived of the right to sue their maker, and that at no time since July

1, 1874, was he prevented by a statutory prohibition from bringing action thereon within Code Civil Proc. § 356, providing that when the commencement of an action is stayed by injunction or statutory prohibition the time of the continuance of the injunction or prohibition is not part of the time limited for the commencement of the action.

2. The corporations created by the acts of 1858 and 1863 were respectively, in law, the successors of the corporation that issued the bonds, and liable to be sued thereon.

3. Although Act Cal. March 22, 1864, providing that the holders of all claims against the city of Sacramento which accrued prior to January 1, 1859, might present the same to the board of trustees, and it should issue bonds payable February 1, 1903, for all such claims as it might consider legal and just, does not limit the time within which an application for refunding should be made, still a failure to present them and demand new bonds in their place until after they had become barred by limitations would give the board the right to refuse to issue them.

In bank. Appeal from superior court Sacramento county; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

A. C. Freeman and W. C. Belcher, for appellant. A. P. Catlin, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. This was an application for a writ of mandate to compel the defendants, as trustees of the city of Sacramento, to issue to the petitioner new bonds of the city, in accordance with the provisions of the act of March 23, 1864, in exchange for unpaid bonds held by him that had been issued under the provisions of the acts of April 26, 1853, and April 10, 1854. The city of Sacramento was incorporated by the act of the legislature passed March 26, 1851, entitled "An act to incorporate the city of Sacramento." St. 1851, p. 391. The government of the city was vested in a mayor, recorder, and council, and by section 3 of the act it was declared that "the said mayor, recorder, and councilmen shall be a body politic and corporate by the name and style of the 'Mayor and Common Council of the City of Sacramento,' and by that name they and their successors shall be known in law, have perpetual succession, sue and be sued in all courts and in all actions whatsoever." By the act of April 26, 1853, (St. 1853 p. 117,) authority was given to the municipality to create loans upon the faith and credit of the city at the discretion of the city council. Under the provisions of this act the mayor and common council of the city of Sacramento issued a certain bond, dated the 6th day of May, 1854, for the sum of $544.45, payable on the 1st day of July, 1874, with 40 semi-annual coupons attached for $27.22 each. By another act, passed April 10, 1854 (St. 1854, p. 196,) the mayor and common council of the city of Sacramento were authorized to issue city bonds payable 20 years from the 1st day of July, 1854, and drawing interest at 10 per cent. per annum. Under the provisions of this act, two bonds for the sum of $1,000 each were issued by the mayor and common council of the city of Sacramento, dated respectively the 24th and 26th day of April, 1854, made payable on the 1st day of July, 1874, and to each there were attached 40 semi-annual coupons of $50 each. April 24, 1858, the legislature passed an act to take effect May 1,

1858, consolidating the city of Sacramento with the county of Sacramento, under the name and style of the "City and County of Sacramento." St. 1858, p. 267. Section 2 of this act declares that "the city and county of Sacramento is hereby made and constituted the successor of the corporation by this act dissolved, and heretofore known as the 'Mayor and Common Council of the City of Sacramento.' The lands, public and private buildings, property, rights of property, actions, rights of actions, moneys, revenues, income, and trusts now vested in or belonging or in any wise appertaining to the corporation known as the 'Mayor and Common Council of the City of Sacramento' are hereby transferred to and vested in, and are declared to appertain and belong to, the city and county of Sacramento, as hereinafter provided." It was also provided in said act that the city and county should not be sued in any action whatever, nor should any of its lands, buildings, improvements, property, franchises, taxes, revenues, actions, choses in actions, and effects be subject to any attachment, levy, or sale, or any process whatever, either mesne or final. April 25, 1863, the legislature passed an act entitled "An act to incorporate the city of Sacramento," (St. 1863, p. 415,) by which the inhabitants of the territory embraced within the limits of the city of Sacramento, as defined in the act of March 26, 1851, were made a body politic under the name and style of the "City of Sacramento." By this act the lands, tenements, hereditaments, moneys, and property which on April 30, 1858, were vested in or held by the "Mayor and Common Council of the City of Sacramento," and such as had since that date been derived or acquired within the described city limits for municipal purposes or with municipal funds, were transferred to this new corporation. The government of the city was vested in a board of three trustees, and it was provided by the act that the body politic might sue and be sued and defend upon any bond, covenant, agreement, contract, matter, or thing whatever, provided such bond, agreement, contract, or thing that is the cause of action had been made or entered into after the passage of that act. On the 22d of March, 1864, the legislature passed "An act to provide for the liquidation of the indebtedness of the city of Sacramento which accrued prior to January 1, 1859." St. 1864, p. 217. By this act it was provided that the holders of all claims against the city of Sacramento which accrued prior to the 1st day of January, 1859, might present the same to the board of trustees, and that the said board should cease to be issued bonds, payable to bearer on the 1st day of February, 1903, for all such claims as they might upon examination consider legal and just. The plaintiff, having become the owner of the three bonds mentioned above, made a demand on the 17th of October, 1887, upon the board of trustees of the city of Sacramento that it issue to him bonds as contemplated by this last-named act for the amount of the principal of said bonds, and for all of the coupons thereon which matured on or before January 1, 1859. Upon the refusal of the board to issue him the bonds as demanded, he commenced this proceeding to compel the same. The court before which the cause was tried found that the petitioner's claim was barred by the statute of limitations, and rendered judgment in favor of the defendant, from which the plaintiff has appealed.

By the terms of the bonds, they matured on the 1st day of July, 1874, and consequently would be barred by limitation on the 1st day of July, 1878, unless, as claimed by appellant, the statute of limitations has no application. The appellant, however, contends that the statute of limitations is not applicable, for the reason that by the provisions of the act of 1858, incorporating the "City and County of Sacramento," and also of the act of 1863, incorporating the "City of Sacramento," hereinabove mentioned, he was prevented from bringing any action to enforce their collection, and invokes the provisions of section 356, Code Civil. Proc., which declares: "When the commencement of an action is stayed by injunction or statutory prohibition, the time of the continuance of the injunction or prohibition is not part of the time limited for the commencement of the action." He also urges that inasmuch as the act of March 22, 1864, above mentioned, does not limit the time within which an application for refunding under its terms may be made, the statute of limitations has no application.

The provisions in the act of March 26, 1851, that the body politic then created might "sue and be sued in all courts and in all actions whatsoever," entered into and made a part of the contract of the municipality in the issuance of the bonds in question. The legislature could not thereafter, without impairing the obligation of this contract, pass any act which would deprive a holder of these bonds of the right to sue their maker. This principle is so familiar and so fully settled as hardly to require the citation of authorities. It was said by the supreme court of Massachusetts in Call v. Hagger, 8 Mass. 430: "If the legislature of any state were to undertake to make a law preventing the legal remedy upon a contract lawfully made, and binding on the party to it, there is no question that such legislature would by such act exceed its legitimate powers. Such an act must necessarily impair the obligation of the contract, within the meaning of the constitution, and the courts of law would be bound, therefore, to construe it as a void act of legislation, and as having no force or authority." In Von Hoffman v. City of Quincy, 4 Wall. 535, the supreme court of the United States, discussing this subject, says: "It is also settled that the laws which subsisted at the time and place of the making of a contract, and where it is to be performed, enter into and form a part of it, as if they were expressly referred to or incorporated in its terms. This principle embraces alike those which affect its validity, construction, discharge, and enforcement." And in the same case the court further says: "Nothing can be more material to the obligation than the means of enforcement. Without the remedy the contract may, indeed, in the sense of the law, be said not to exist, and its obligation to fall within the class of those moral and social duties which depend for their fulfillment wholly upon the will of the individual. The ideas of validity and remedy are inseparable, and both are parts of the obligation which is guarantied by the constitution against invasion. The obligation of a contract 'is the law which binds the parties to perform their agreement.' The prohibition has no reference to the degree of impairment. The largest and the least are alike forbidden." See, also, Edwards v. Kearney, 96 U. S. 595; People v. Bond, 10 Cal. 563; Wolff v. New Orleans, 103 U. S. 358. If, then, it be admitted that it was the intention of the legislature, by the acts aforesaid, to prevent the institution of any action against the municipality upon the bonds in question, such act would have been unconstitutional, and beyond the power of the legislature to enact. The legislature has not in direct terms declared that no action shall be brought upon these bonds. It is only by an inference drawn from the fact that in the acts of 1858 and 1863 a limitation was imposed upon the bringing of actions against the corporations created by those acts that counsel claims such intention was manifested. It is not to be presumed that the legislature intended to do anything unconstitutional or beyond its power; and, if such limitation would have been unconstitutional, we must assume, in the absence of an express provision to that effect, that it was not intended. The fact that the corporation which was created by the act of April 24, 1858, was different in territory as well as in government did not of itself prevent an action from being brought against the maker of the bonds. Before the bonds had matured the legislature passed the act of April 25, 1863, by which the inhabitants of the same territory which was embraced in the original act of March 26, 1851, were reincorporated and vested with the same property and rights which the mayor and common council of the city of Sacramento had possessed prior to the taking effect of the act of April 24, 1858. By the act of April 24, 1858, the city and county of Sacramento was made and constituted the "successor" of the corporation theretofore known as the "Mayor and Common Council of the City of Sacramento," and by the act of April 25, 1863, all the property that the city and county of Sacramento had received from the mayor and common council of the city of Sacramento as the "successor" of that municipality was transferred to and vested in the new "City of Sacramento," which thus became the legal "successor" of the corporation which had issued the bonds.

The legislature cannot, by merely changing the name of a municipal corporation, or by abridging or enlarging its territory, so destroy its identity as to impair the rights of its creditors to the enforcement of their obligations against the original corporation. It has been held that where a public corporation has been absolutely dissolved without making any provision for its obligations, and where no successor is created, a creditor of such corporation has only the faith of the legislature upon which to rely for payment thereof. Barkley v. Commissioners, 93 U. S. 258. It is also an established principle that a corporation does not lose its identity, or become relieved from its liabilities, by any change in its charter, or by the substitution of a new charter in place of the old one, unless there is an express legislative declaration to that effect. This rule was applied in Broughton v. Pensacola, Id. 266. The city of Pensacola had issued certain bonds, and had thereafter, by virtue of certain statutes, ceased to exist under its original act of incorporation. The inhabitants of the territory within which the city had been organized subsequently established a municipal government under the provisions of the laws of that state, and the payment of these bonds was resisted upon the ground that the new corporation was not responsible for them. The court, however, held that the payment of the bonds could be enforced against the new corporation, saying: "The inhibition which preserves against the interference of a state the sacredness of contracts applies to the liabilities of municipal corporations created by its permission; and, although the repeal or modification of the charter of a corporation of that kind is not within the inhibition, yet it will not be admitted, where its legislation is susceptible of another construction, that the state has in this way sanctioned an evasion of or escape from liabilities, the creation of which it authorized. When, therefore, a new form is given to an old municipal corporation, or such a corporation is reorganized under a new charter, taking in its new organization the place of the old one, embracing substantially the same corporators and the same territory, it will be presumed that the legislature intended a continued existence of the same corporation, although different powers are possessed under the new charter, and different officers administer its affairs; and, in the absence of express provision for their payment otherwise, it will also be presumed in such case that the legislature intended that the liabilities as well as the rights of property of the corporation in its old form should accompany the corporation in its reorganization." In Mobile v. Watson, 116 U. S. 289, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 398, the city of Mobile under its corporate name, the "Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council of the City of Mobile," had issued certain bonds in 1859. In 1879 the legislature passed two acts, one entitled "An act to vacate and annul the charter, and dissolve the corporation of the city of Mobile, and to provide for the application of the assets thereof in discharge of the debts of said corporation," and another, entitled "An act to incorporate the port of Mobile, and to provide for the government thereof." The territory embraced in the port of Mobile was about one-half that which was formerly embraced in the city of Mobile, but included the larger portion of the inhabitants and taxable property of the former corporation. In an action brought against the port of Mobile to recover upon the bonds that had been issued by the former municipality, the court held that the port of Mobile was the legal successor of the city of Mobile, and liable for its debts, saying: "Where the legislature of a state has given a local community, living within designated boundaries, a municipal organization, and by a subsequent act or series of acts repeals its charter and dissolves the corporation, and incorporates substantially the same people as a municipal body under a new name, for the same general purpose, and the great mass of the taxable property of the old corporation is included within the limits of the new, and the property of the old corporation used for public purposes is transferred without consideration to the new corporation for the same public uses, the latter, notwithstanding a great reduction of its corporate limits, is the successor in law of the former, and liable for its debts; and, if any part of the creditors of the old corporation are left without provision for the payment of their claims, they can enforce satisfaction out of the new." See, also, Amy v. Selma, 77 Ala. 103; Milner's Adm'r v. Pensacola, 2 Woods, 632; Hill v. City of Kahoka, 35 Fed. Rep. 32; Amy v. Watertown, 130 U. S. 320, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 537. We are of the opinion that the holder of the bonds in question has at no time since the 1st day of July, 1874, been prevented by a "statutory prohibition" from bringing an action to recover the amount of the bonds, and also that the corporations which were created by the acts of 1858 and 1863 were respectively in law the successor of the corporation that issued the bonds, and liable to be sued thereon.

It could not have been the intention of the legislature by the act of March 22, 1864, to extend the time for refunding the indebtedness of the city beyond the time within which an action upon that indebtedness could have been commenced. At the date of that act more than 10 years remained before the maturity of the bonds in question. The bonds held by the petitioner had no fund provided for their redemption, but were dependent solely upon the faith and credit of the city. The act of 1864 gave to the holder of these bonds the privilege of exchanging them for other bonds bearing a lower rate of interest, but secured in their payment by the fund provided therein for their redemption. An option was thus extended to the holder of such bonds to make the exchange, and this option could be exercised at any time during the life of the bonds. A failure on his part to present them to the board of trustees and demand the issuance of new bonds in their place until after they had become barred by the statute of limitations, would give to the board the right, if they chose to exercise it, of refusing to issue new bonds therefor upon this ground. A municipal corporation has the legal right to avail itself of the defense of the statutes of limitations as fully as any other debtor. It is a privilege personal to the debtor, and whenever in any legal proceeding it is invoked by the debtor the court is compelled to recognize it as a proper defense. This defense is pleaded in the present proceeding, and, as we have before shown, is sustained by the facts, and must, therefore, be held sufficient. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

FISHER V. SOUTHERN PAC. R. CO. (No. 14-136.)

CARRIERS—MIXED TRAINS—INJURY TO PASSENGER—NEGLIGENCE—MEDICAL EXPERT—CROSS-EXAMINATION.

1. In an action against a railroad company for injuries received by a passenger on a mixed train through the alleged negligence of the trainmen in coupling the parts of the train, the court instructed, in the language of Civil Code Cal. § 2100, that "a railroad carrying passengers paying fare must use the utmost care and diligence for their safe carriage, and must provide everything necessary for that purpose," but omitted the concluding words of the section, "and must exercise to that end a reasonable degree of skill." Held, that the omission did not injure defendant, as the omitted part simply added to the requirement of diligence, skill in using it, and the instruction as given did not ignore or take from the jury the consideration of any evidence or argument rebutting the presumption of negligence created by plaintiff's evidence.

2. On the cross-examination of a medical expert the reading of statements from medical works, and asking the witness if he agrees with the authors, cannot be allowed where the statements are evidently intended as evidence to sustain the theory of the party cross-examining, and not to affect the competency of the witness or the value of his testimony.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Stanislaus county; WILLIAM O. MINOR, Judge.

W. H. Dudley, for appellant. D. M. Delmas, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. Appeal from judgment and order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. Action for damages through alleged negligence of defendant, a common carrier of passengers for hire. On the 29th of August, 1889, defendant was operating a railroad between Oakdale, in the county of Stanislaus, and Stockton. On that day plaintiff purchased a ticket at the office in Oakdale, and immediately boarded the train for Stockton. The train was composed of one empty box-car, eight empty gravel-cars, two loaded box-cars, and a passenger-car. It was a regular train, principally for freight, but habitually carried passengers, and tickets were always sold at the ticket-office for this train. It is shown to have been so run for a period of four years before the injuries complained of. At this time there were some 14 passengers on the train. At a place called "Burnett's Station," where there was a gravel-pit, the train made a stop to exchange its eight empty gravel-cars for nine loaded gravel-cars. To accomplish this, the engine, the empty box-car, and the gravel-cars separated from the other cars, ran up the main track past the switch, leaving the two loaded box-cars and the passenger-car with brakes set, there being an up-grade at this place. After getting rid of the empty cars, the engine with the empty box-car was coupled to nine loaded gravel-cars, and they were let down the grade by gravitation alone, without steam, to the part of the train which had been left on the grade with brakes set. A conductor and two brakemen were in charge of the train, but the conductor and one brakeman had ridden the empty cars into the pit. The other brakeman turned the switch to put the train back upon the main track, and then jumped upon the engine or tender, so that there were no brakemen on either part of the two portions of the train to be coupled, no conductor to superintend, and no person between the two parts to be coupled. There was what was called a "left-hand" curve; and the conductor could not see either the end of his portion of the train, or the cars to be taken on. The fireman from the left-hand side could see and gave signals to the engineer. The cars had to be let down the grade some seven or eight hundred feet, and between the engine and the space were the nine gravel-cars and the empty box-car, about three hundred feet of the train. Upon receiving the signal "one car," meaning that there was the length of one car between the parts to be coupled, the engineer, as he testified, put all the brakes on, and left nothing undone. He had all necessary appliances in good order. There was, however, a violent jar at the coupling, which threw the plaintiff from his seat, diagonally across the car, some three or four feet, hitting a stove with his left side. He fell upon his back, and was partially unconscious for a time, receiving, as he claims, very serious injury. The defendant claims that this was not a passenger train, but a freight train, with a caboose car attached, that regular passenger cars were run upon the road for which plaintiff's ticket would have been good; that it is more difficult to manage freight-cars, and the exigencies of such a train expose it to some peculiar dangers, and render the same care impracticable; and that it should not be expected that there would be the same completeness in equipment as on purely passenger trains. These views are presented as objections to an instruction given at the instance of plaintiff, as follows: "The court instructs you that the law of this state is that a railroad company carrying passengers paying fare must use the utmost care and diligence for their safe carriage, and must provide everything necessary for that purpose." The language is taken from section 2100 Civil Code, omitting the concluding words of the section: "And must exercise to that end a reasonable degree of skill." It is claimed that these words constituted an important qualification of the rule, rendering it incumbent upon the defendant to provide, not every possible, or even the best possible, contrivance for the purpose, but only to exercise a reasonable skill to that end, and that the instruction ignored in part the theory of the defense: (1) That the jar resulted not from carelessness, but because the practical operation of this train in which plaintiff chose to ride demanded that it be managed and equipped not as a passenger but as a freight train; (2) the jar was only such as was to be expected upon a freight train; and (3) that the amount of care consistent with the operation of such a train was exercised.

I know of no principle by which the statute can be limited so as not to apply to all carriers of passengers for hire. If one insists on going by a train which does not habitually carry passengers, a different rule may prevail. Of course the different conditions attending the running of a freight train are proper matters to be taken into consideration in determining whether there has been negligence. It was proper for the jury to take into consideration the fact, if it were so, that in the coupling of loaded freight cars such violent jerks and jars are likely to occur, and might happen without negligence, and also that the practical operation of the train required that it be equipped as a freight rather than as a passenger train; but certainly the increased difficulty did not justify any remission of diligence and care. This train's regularly carrying freight and passengers rendered the company liable for the full degree of diligence enjoined by the statute. It cannot, I think, be held that the omitted clause requiring the exercise of a reasonable degree of skill in providing everything necessary for the safe carriage of passengers refers, as applied to the facts of this case, to the use of the freight train for the purpose of carrying passengers. If so, it would seem to prohibit the use of such train altogether, if it is conceded that it cannot be made as safe for that purpose as a passenger train. The qualification is not, as counsel seem to contend, that only reasonable diligence need be used, but to require, in addition to diligence, skill in providing what is necessary. Section 2101 of the Civil Code—the next section—enjoins the carrier to provide safe and fit vehicles, and declares he is not excused for default in this respect by any degree of care. Common sense teaches us that these sections must not receive a construction so absolute as to practically prohibit railroad passenger traffic, or such a useful and common convenience as a mixed or accommodation train; but to find any letting down of the standard of diligence, in the omitted clause is to impart a meaning diametrically opposed to its manifest intent, which, as stated, simply adds, to the requirement of diligence, skill in the use of it. The reasonable rule would, therefore, seem to be that those who travel on mixed trains assume the extra risk necessarily incident to such trains or the traffic; the carrier using such diligence and care as the Code requires on passenger trains, so far as such care is possible and reasonably consistent with the freight business. The injury was not claimed to have resulted from the failure to provide everything necessary. The sole issue as to negligence was in regard to the manner of coupling the two parts of the train at Burnett's Station, and the jury were, in substance, so instructed, at the instance of plaintiff. I cannot see, therefore, how the omitted clause could have helped the defendant, or that the instruction as given ignored or took from the jury the consideration of any evidence or argument rebutting the presumption of negligence created by plaintiff's evidence.

On cross-examination of Woolsey, a witness called as an expert by defendant, plaintiff's counsel was allowed, against the objection of defendant, to read statements from medical works, and to ask the witness if he agreed with the authors. This is assigned as error. Plaintiff's counsel defends the ruling here on two grounds: (1) That the witness on his direct examination testified to certain medical opinions, and supported his statements by the assertion that they conformed to the authority of medical works, and he claims that the rule is that if the witness, either in direct or cross-examination, relies in any manner upon the authority of medical works, generally or specifically, it is proper cross-examination to confront him with the works upon which he relies, to show that his understanding of them is incorrect, or to contradict him; and, (2) that it is proper cross-examination to test the competency of the witness as an expert, or the value of his opinions.

A careful examination of the evidence has convinced me that the rulings complained of cannot be defended upon either of these grounds, though the legal proposition be admitted. As to the first, it is plain that some of the extracts read have no reference to any opinions of the witness, which he sought to sustain by a reference to medical writers, either generally or specifically, except in response to a direct question by plaintiff referring to such writers. As to the second ground, it is not so plain. The value of an effective cross-examination as a means of showing the incompetency of a witness or his lack of integrity and the true value of his testimony, can hardly be overrated; and this is true in a special sense as to expert testimony, where the party may choose from the body of a profession those whose opinions are most favorable. It is quite natural, and certainly common, for one called as an expert to enhance his authority by his power of self-assertion; and there is reason to fear that these opinions are not always as impartial and indifferent as a judicial utterance should be. While it is to be regretted, if, in the proper exercise of the right of cross-examination, it shall appear that certain medical writers of repute differ from the witness, and so a party will get the benefit of unsworn testimony, still this evil, unavoidable in the nature of things, is, in my opinion, not at all commensurate with that which would deprive a party in such a case of the best touchstone known to legal science, by which to estimate the value of testimony. And if, on general principles, such questions are legitimate on cross-examination, I do not see how a party can be deprived of his right because such evil consequences may follow. All the works on medical jurisprudence which I have examined seem to sustain this position; and some cases, although they are not uniform. Broadhead v. Wiltse, 35 Iowa, 429; Insurance Co. v. Ellis, 89 Ill. 516; Ripon v. Bittel, 30 Wis. 614; Pinney v. Cahill, 48 Mich. 584, 12 N. W. Rep. 862; State v. Wood, 53 N. H. 484. But, since consequences are likely to follow which admittedly should be avoided if possible, such examination should be strictly limited to this one purpose for which only it can be permitted. I think no fair-minded person can closely study this record without being convinced that the evidence was not put in with any such purpose. No doubt counsel offered it under the impression that it was justified as inconsistent with opinions which the witness had claimed were sustained by medical authorities. I have shown that the claim cannot be sustained on that ground. In fact, although the witness took issue with some statements read, they cannot fairly be said to contradict his evidence in any respect. They were evidently intended as evidence for the plaintiff to sustain his theory of the case, and not to affect the competency of the witness or the value of his testimony. As it seems to me a new trial must be granted for this error, it becomes unnecessary to review the other assignments. The judgment and order should be reversed, and a new trial granted.

We concur: FITZGERALD, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed, and a new trial granted; and the court is further of the opinion that the amount of the verdict was excessive.

DE HAVEN, J. I concur in the judgment. The court erred in permitting the attorney for the plaintiff, upon the cross-examination of the witness Dr. Woolsey, to read extracts from certain medical books, and then ask the witness whether he agreed with the same or not. Marshall v. Brown, 50 Mich. 148, 15 N. W. Rep. 55; City of Bloomington v. Shrock, 110 Ill. 22; Rog. Exp. Test. §§ 181, 182. It is not permissible on cross-examination to call the attention of such a witness to what is said on the subject to which he is testifying by standard works for the purpose of testing his general knowledge or competency as an expert. It has been held, however, that, when an expert asserts that his opinion agrees with a particular author, it is not improper to call his attention to what that particular author says for the purpose of contradicting him. But there was nothing in the evidence of Dr. Woolsey to justify reading to him, and in the presence of the jury, the extracts referred to, for any such purpose. I think, also, that as the evidence does not establish a case for punitive damages the sum awarded by the verdict is excessive.

EXECUTORS—LIABILITY AS TRUSTEES—LIMITATIONS—PLEADING.

1. An executor who takes possession of assets belonging to the estate, and gives to his co-executors a note secured by mortgage for the amount, is a trustee of the fund, and the statute of limitations will not run in his favor until there is an express repudiation by him of the trust.

2. The fact that such executor was appointed in a foreign jurisdiction does not affect his relation to the estate as trustee; for though he could not by virtue of such appointment enforce the collection, in another jurisdiction, of the assets belonging to it, yet, where they come into his hands by voluntary payment, they are received in his capacity as trustee, and that relationship is not altered by his giving his own note and mortgage for the amount.

3. The co-executors appointed in a foreign jurisdiction, to whom the note and mortgage were given as trustees, can prosecute an action in that capacity to foreclose the mortgage without taking out ancillary letters of administration.

4. Under the provision of Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 462, that statements of new matter in the answer must be deemed controverted, matters in avoidance of the bar of limitations will be deemed to have been pleaded in reply to affirmative matters on the subject alleged in the answer.

Affirming 24 Pac. Rep. 855.

In bank. On rehearing.

PER CURIAM. After hearing in bank and further consideration of the case, we are satisfied with the conclusion reached in department 1, and with the opinion there delivered by Justice PATERSON. 24 Pac. Rep. 855. The matters upon which the plaintiffs rely to relieve them from the bar of the statute of limitations may be deemed to have been pleaded in answer to the affirmative matters alleged in the answers of the defendants. There being no replication, such affirmative matters are taken as controverted. Section 462, Code Civil Proc. The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

(No. 13,038.)

EJECTMENT—CONFLICTING INSTRUCTIONS.

1. In ejectment, where the defense is that plaintiffs' ancestor conveyed the premises to defendants' grantor by a deed which plaintiffs claim was forged, it is error to instruct that a forged deed is void, and confers no rights, "except, if duly recorded, it is constructive notice of that fact."

2. In determining whether plaintiffs' ancestor executed the deed claimed to have been forged, the jury may properly consider the subsequent conduct of the ancestor, and whether he ever made any claim to the property, or its possession, paid taxes and assessments, or made any other assertion of ownership.

3. Instructions assigning several different dates from which the statute of limitations will begin to run against a party are conflicting and confusing, and constitute reversible error.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. K. WILSON, Judge.

v.26P.no.14—57

SHARPSTEIN, J. This is an action of ejectment, and one of the defenses to the action is that the plaintiffs' ancestor conveyed the demanded premises to the grantor of the defendants. Another defense is that the action is barred by the statute of limitations. The verdict and judgment were in favor of the defendants, and the plaintiffs appeal from the judgment and order denying their motion for a new trial. The exceptions relied on here are to certain instructions given, and the refusal to give certain other instructions requested by plaintiffs to be given.

Plaintiff requested the court to instruct the jury that "a forged deed conveys no right, title, or interest; it is absolutely void, and as though never made." The court refused to give it as requested, but in lieu thereof gave the following: "A forged deed conveys no title, right, or interest; it is absolutely void, and as though never made, except, if duly recorded, it is constructive notice of that fact." The latter clause of this instruction is clearly erroneous, and is inconsistent with another part of the charge, in which the jury were instructed that "no legal effect can be produced upon the rights of the parties by recording a forged instrument."

Another instruction excepted to by plaintiffs reads as follows: "If you find from the evidence that the said Joseph M. Brown, the ancestor of plaintiffs, was not in possession of the property in question, or any part thereof, from and after the 18th day of December, 1860, or from any other period prior to the 4th day of March, 1861, to the time of his death, November, 2, 1864, and that during that time the defendants, or their grantors, or those under whom they claimed, were in the open, notorious, continuous, and exclusive possession of said property; and that defendants, and those under whom they claimed, continued such possession for the period of five years, and during all of said time were claiming to own the same adversely to all other persons, and exclusive of any other right,—then your verdict should be for the defendants, notwithstanding that the children of said Brown were minors at the time of his death."

Another instruction, which appellants claim to be in conflict with the one last above quoted, reads as follows: "The ancestor of the plaintiffs, that is, Joseph M. Brown had died on the 2d day of November, 1864, nearly two years prior to the 20th of August, 1866, so that I instruct you that the statute of limitations, with reference to the land in controversy, did not commence to run against him during his life-time. And inasmuch as the statute of limitations did not commence to run in his life-time, and did not commence to run against his children until the 20th day of August, 1866, and inasmuch as neither of the children had reached the age of majority five years prior to the commencement of this action, I instruct you, as a matter of law, that the defense of the defendants as against either of the children, and that whatever testimony has been given before you respecting the occupancy or possession of the land in controversy for the purpose of establishing an adverse possession, must be disregarded in your determination of the rights of the plaintiffs other than the representative of Josephine D. Brown, the widow of Joseph M. Brown." There is another instruction which is clearly inconsistent with the one first above quoted. It is as follows: "As I have before stated to you, the statute of limitations could not, in any event, have run with respect to the land in controversy until the 1st day of July, 1864." Thus the jury were instructed that the statute of limitations might have commenced running in 1860, if the plaintiffs' ancestor was not then in possession of the land; and that the statute of limitations could not have run with respect to the land in controversy until the 1st day of July, 1864; and that it did not commence to run against the children of Brown until the 20th day of April, 1866. That two of these instructions contradict a third is apparent. That, taken together, they are confusing, is also apparent. In Brown v. McAllister, 39 Cal. 573, the court said: "Where the instructions on a material point are contradictory, it is impossible for the jury to decide which should prevail, and it is equally impossible, after the verdict, to know that the jury was not influenced by that instruction, which was erroneous, as the one or the other must necessarily be, where the two are repugnant." That it is a sufficient ground for reversing a judgment has frequently been held. People v. Valencia, 43 Cal. 552; McCreery v. Everding, 44 Cal. 246; Chidester v. People's Ditch Co., 53 Cal. 57; Bank of Stockton v. Bliven, Id. 708; People v. Wong, 54 Cal. 154; Aguirre v. Alexander, 58 Cal. 28.

Another instruction excepted to was that, in determining the question as to whether Joseph M. Brown, the ancestor of plaintiffs, executed and acknowledged the deed which purported to have been executed to said Henry P. Hulbert, the jury had a right "to take into consideration the subsequent conduct of said Joseph M. Brown during his life-time, and whether he ever after the date of said deed set up any claim to the property, or made any claim upon the parties in possession of the same, for the delivery of possession to him, or paid the taxes or street assessments on the same, or did any other act asserting ownership over the property during his life-time, after the date of said deed." We think this instruction correct. The evidence upon which it was based is not set out in the transcript, but the statement in it is that defendants introduced evidence which tended to prove "that said deed purporting to have been executed by said Joseph M. Brown to said Hulbert was the genuine deed of said Brown." We think testimony of such conduct on the part of Brown, as the court in the instruction specifies, would have a tendency to prove the genuineness of the deed which purported to be executed by him, and therefore we cannot presume that such evidence had not been introduced. We cannot presume error, and in this instance none is shown. The exception to this instruction is overruled. The instruction given in regard to expert testimony is not, in our opinion, erroneous. The exception to that instruction is overruled. But for errors before pointed out the judgment and order denying the motion for a new trial must be reversed. Judgment and order reversed.

SCOTT V. JACKSON. (No. 12,912.)

SALE OF PATENTS—ASSIGNMENT—EVIDENCE.

1. In an action for the price of letters patent which were sold to a rival manufacturer, and were to be assigned as soon as the patentee had effected certain settlements with other parties, but which were not assigned until nearly three years thereafter, it appeared that the patents were delivered to defendant, and held by him, and that plaintiff ceased to manufacture thereunder, and entered defendant's employ. Held sufficient to support a finding that the delay in making the formal assignment was acquiesced in by both parties.

2. Where the purchaser of patents takes and retains possession thereof, and derives the same benefit as if they had been formally assigned, and both parties act as if they had been assigned, the purchaser cannot complain that the formal assignments were tendered after one of the patents had expired.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN F. FINN, Judge.

M. A. Wheaton, for appellant. Scrivner & Boone, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is an action to recover the sum of $1,500, the contract price of several United States letters patent sold by plaintiff's assignor, Watkins, to defendant under an agreement dated July 19, 1885. The contract of sale provided that Watkins should assign, deed, and deliver to defendant all of his patents for harvesting machinery for the sum of $1,500, one-half of which was made payable November 1, 1885, and the balance November 1, 1886. The contract provided that the assignment was to be made as soon as a settlement was made by Watkins with Rice. The court found that a settlement was made by Watkins with Rice in March, 1885; that at all times subsequent to January 19, 1885, Watkins was ready and willing to assign the patents to defendant, and that, in December, 1887,—prior to the commencement of this suit,—he tendered an assignment in writing to the defendant of all the letters patent except patent No. 97,646, which had expired on the 1st day of December, 1887. The contract was assigned by Watkins to the plaintiff herein January, 20, 1886. Judgment was entered in the court below in favor of the plaintiff for the amount claimed. The defendant moved for a new trial, which motion was denied, and he thereupon appealed from the order and from the judgment.

It is claimed by appellant that Watkins could not put Jackson in default without an offer to perform; that readiness to perform is not the same as performance; that the tender of the assignment came too late, not having been made until two years and eight months after the settlement with Rice; that at that time it was impossible for Watkins to perform, because one of the patents had already expired, and defendant cannot be required to take less than all of the property Watkins agreed to sell. Of course Watkins could not put Jackson in default without an offer to perform in accordance with the terms of the contract, and, if there were nothing in the case to overcome the effect of the finding that Watkins did not tender an assignment of the letters patent until December, 1887, the defendant would be entitled to judgment; but the court found "that the delay in making the assignment of said patents was not caused by the neglect or refusal of said Watkins to make an assignment, but was acquiesced in by both parties to this contract;" and we cannot say that this finding is not supported by the evidence. It appears from the testimony that at the time the contract set forth in the complaint was entered into, the defendant was engaged in manufacturing and selling agricultural implements, and was the owner of letters patent for the manufacture of such implements. Watkins was also the owner of certain patents and improvements in agricultural implements, and was having his machines manufactured at the establishment of Rice, and was engaged in selling the same in competition with the defendant. Jackson claimed that Watkins was unlawfully infringing upon his patents, and litigation was threatened. The contract set forth in the complaint seems to have been entered into in compromise of the differences between the parties. Watkins agreed to sell to Jackson all of his letters patent for the sum of $1,500, make a settlement with Rice, and collect royalties for machines sold prior to January 1, 1885, and devote his entire time in the capacity of salesman and traveling expert for defendant, for which he was to receive the sum of $1,500 per year. Immediately after the execution of the contract, the patents were delivered by Watkins to Jackson. Watkins ceased to manufacture or sell any more of his machines, and remained in the employ of the defendant from January 19, 1885, until the early part of 1886, when he demanded a settlement under the contract. The defendant seems to have considered it important to avoid the competition caused by the manufacture and sale of Watkins' machines. There was evidence to show that such was the main consideration which induced the defendant to enter into the contract. It is true the defendant never used the patents, but the possession thereof was taken and held by him, and no doubt as thus held they were as valuable to him as they would have been if he had actually used them in the manufacture of machines. The rival patents were not only put out of the way, but defendant secured the services in his own business of Mr. Watkins, who is designated in the contract as "traveling expert in the field." The defendant purchased the Watkins machines from Rice, and paid the latter between $5,000 and $6,000 for them. Under the circumstances, the court below doubtless believed that the defendant had received all the benefit that he would have received if the letters had been actually assigned at the proper time, and that defendant was estopped by his conduct from claiming that the tender of the assignment came too late.

It is claimed by the appellant that the finding of the court does not amount to a finding of a consent to delay, or waiver of an earlier assignment, but we do not so understand it. The term "acquiesce," as used here by the court, means a consent inferred from silence,—a tacit encouragement. "Where a person tacitly encourages an act to be done, he cannot afterwards exercise his legal right in opposition to such consent, if his conduct or acts of encouragement induced the other party to change his position, so that he will be peculiarly prejudiced by assertion of such adversary claim." Swain v. Seamen, 9 Wall. 254. "Acquiescence is where a person who knows that he is entitled to impeach a transaction or enforce a right neglects to do so for such a length of time that under the circumstances of the case the other party may fairly infer that he has waived or abandoned his right." Rap. & L. Law Dict. By accepting and retaining possession of the patents, the defendant virtually deprived Watkins of the use thereof, and indicated that he was satisfied with what Watkins had done under the contract. Although Watkins continued in his employ for a long time after the contract was made, nothing was said about an assignment, both parties having apparently considered that none was necessary; and it would be a hardship now upon Watkins and his assignee if they should be deprived of the value of the property through what was evidently a mutual mistake in regard to that matter.

Appellant's contention that the tender of the assignment was not good because one of the patents was not included in the assignment tendered is unsound. The patent omitted from the assignment was dead, the statutory term of its existence having expired. It would have been a useless thing, therefore, to have included it in the assignment. If the delay in making the assignment was not through the neglect of Watkins, but by and with the consent of the defendant, as the court has found, the defendant cannot complain that the life of the patent had expired before the tender was made. Furthermore, no objection of this kind was made at the time Watkins tendered the assignment. Section 2076, Code Civil. Proc.

HAUBERT v. MAUSSHARDT. (No. 13,030.)

CONTRACT OF SALE—MISTAKE—NOVATION.

Plaintiff sold defendant wine at a certain price, a written contract of sale being signed in duplicate. By mutual mistake, one copy recited a less price than that agreed, and this copy was assigned by defendant to a third party, to whom, by defendant's direction, the wine was delivered. Held that, in the absence of evidence showing a release of defendant and an acceptance of his assignee, there was no novation of parties, even though plaintiff may have known of the assignment, and received partial payments from the assignee.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. K. Wilson, Judge.

Taylor & Craig, for appellant. W. C. Burnett and C. Bartlett, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. Defendant appeals from the judgment and an order refusing him a new trial. On the 28th of February, 1886, plaintiff sold to defendant the wine in his cellar in Sonoma valley, for 28½ cents per gallon. After the parties had come to an agreement, defendant caused the contract to be written out by a friend, who prepared two copies, supposed to be duplicates. By mistake, however, in one copy the price was put at 20½ cents per gallon. Defendant took them to plaintiff, who read one of the contracts, which chanced to be the correct one, and, finding it satisfactory, both parties executed the two supposed duplicates; defendant assuring plaintiff that they were exactly alike. The incorrect copy was not read by either. It does not appear that plaintiff had anything to do with the preparation of the writing, or whether he even desired or expected a writing to be prepared, nor that he knew that defendant had not read and compared the two. One copy, which also happened to be the correct one, was left with plaintiff; the other defendant took, and immediately assigned to one Schmidt, who agreed to receive and pay for the wine, and give defendant one-half the profits on the transaction. The defendant was not employed by Schmidt to make the purchase, but he knew Schmidt desired the wine, and purchased with the expectation of making a transfer to him. Plaintiff knew that Mausshardt was purchasing with the expectation of transferring the contract to some one, though no name was mentioned by Mausshardt as a principal. It was, in fact, somewhat in the nature of those contracts which are sometimes called "options," only Mausshardt, though not expecting to complete the purchase himself, bound himself by an absolute contract. He expected to make something by selling the contract, and plaintiff must have known this, for there was something said about a commission, and plaintiff actually gave him $20 as compensation. The contract assigned to Schmidt was the one in which the price of the wine was stated at 20½ cents, and Schmidt denies knowing that the real price agreed upon was 28½ cents. The wine was all delivered to Schmidt in pursuance of defendant's express orders, and Schmidt paid plaintiff 20½ cents per gallon, and refused to pay more, on the ground that he had purchased at that price. The error was then discovered for the first time, and it seems plaintiff did not know until then that the contract had been assigned to Schmidt, although defendant claims that he did know of the assignment before he delivered any wine.

There are really but two points made on this appeal, although they are stated in different forms: First. The evidence shows a novation,—plaintiff accepted Schmidt as principal instead of defendant. There is no evidence which tends, even slightly, to show that plaintiff ever released defendant from his obligation, or accepted Schmidt in his place. If he knew of the assignment, and afterwards shipped the wine to the assignee, and received part payment from him, it would not show a novation. These acts are all consistent with his continuing to hold defendant, and, as that course would be more advantageous to plaintiff, it is to be presumed he did so. At any rate, the contract of novation must be proven as other contracts are. Second. Because Haubert signed the copy which was delivered to Schmidt he should suffer the loss resulting from the mistake. The evidence shows that plaintiff signed the copy on the assurance of Mausshardt that the two were exactly alike. Had this been true, there would have been no trouble. Plaintiff did not know, so far as appears, that defendant had not read and compared the two. He had a right to presume he had, and cannot be held responsible by defendant for reposing too much confidence in his assurances. There can be no doubt as to the responsibility of Mausshardt. Had there been a formal novation, under the circumstances, the contract of novation would have been invalid, as one made under a mutual mistake. We advise that the judgment be affirmed.

NEUBEBAUMER et al. v. WOODMAN. (No. 13,866.)

MINING—LOCATION OF CLAIM—POSSESSION—EJECTMENT—EVIDENCE.

J. attempted to locate a mining claim by posting notices on it, but failed to mark the location on the ground so that its boundaries could be readily traced as required by Rev. St. U. S. § 2324. He and his grantees held possession and worked the mine until ejected by defendant, who attempted to locate the claim by posting a notice at each end and recording a copy thereof, but who also failed to locate its boundaries on the ground. J.'s grantee worked on the claim after the attempted location by defendant. Held, that a finding that plaintiffs and their grantor never abandoned the claim and were in continuous possession, and that defendant was a mere trespasser, was sustained by the evidence.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tuolumne county; J. F. Rooney, Judge.

E. A. Rogers and F. D. & G. W. Nicol, for appellant. F. W. Street, for respondents.

FOOTE, C. Henry Neubeaumer and F. W. Street sued in ejectment for a certain piece of mining ground. The defendant denied the ownership and right of possession of plaintiffs, and set up the claim that the ground was subject to location under the laws of the United States, by any citizen thereof, as vacant and unoccupied, and that in pursuance of such laws, and the local rules and regulations of the mining district in which the mineral land described in the complaint was situated, he had located the same, and that he is in possession thereof, and working it. He further denies that the plaintiffs ever had possession of the property in dispute, or that he ever ousted them therefrom or wrongfully withholds the same, or that they have suffered any damage. The court below rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, from which, and an order denying a new trial, the defendant appeals.

From the facts found, it appears that the mining claim was attempted to be located on the 24th of October, 1873, by one William Jones, by posting certain notices on it, but that in making this attempt he did not mark the location of the claim so that the boundaries could be readily traced. On the 2d of July, 1877, Jones being indebted to one F. L. Tucker, he and the defendant here, S. P. Woodman, made a grant, bargain, and sale deed of this claim, called the "Tiger Mine," to Tucker, describing it. Thereafter Jones and others, for Tucker, performed labor on the mine, running tunnels into it, and crushing the quartz rock taken from it in a mill situated nearby, known as the "Tiger Mill." Afterwards, on the 13th of February, 1880, Tucker deeded the property to one William T. Jones. The latter entered into possession of the claim under that deed, and during the years from 1880 to 1886 ran four tunnels in and upon the quartz vein in the claim, and expended several thousand dollars in labor and improvements upon it. As part of the purchase price, this William T. Jones executed and delivered to Tucker on the 25th of December, 1880, a promissory note for $1,400, with interest, which instrument was signed by him and William Jones and S. P. Woodman, the defendant. On the 23d of January, 1885, Tucker commenced an action against the three parties last mentioned to recover the amount due on that note, but he died shortly afterwards, and Henry Neuebauer, one of the plaintiffs here, became the executor of his last will and testament, and, prosecuting the action, obtained judgment therein against the defendants therein on the 9th of July, 1885, for $1,529.22 and costs. The mining claim here involved was sold on execution issued on that judgment, and, no redemption having been had, it was deeded by the sheriff who made the sale to the purchasers at the sale, the original plaintiffs here, Henry Neuebauer and F. W. Street. On the day after Tucker commenced that action, William T. Jones made a conveyance of the property in dispute to his mother, E. A. Jones. This conveyance was afterwards, at the suit of the plaintiffs here, declared fraudulent and void, canceled, and annulled. Henry Neuebauer died after this action was commenced; and, prior to the trial, Teresa Neuebauer, his administratrix, was substituted. In addition to these facts, it was further found, in the eighth finding of fact: "That the mining claim in the complaint described was never abandoned by the plaintiffs herein, or by their grantors, and that plaintiffs and their grantors were in continuous actual possession of the same until the 3d day of December, 1888, at which time the defendant herein, said S. P. Woodman, entered in and upon said mining claim and ejected the plaintiffs therefrom; that upon the said 3d day of December, 1888, said defendant, S. P. Woodman, made an attempted location of the mining claim in the complaint described, by posting a notice of location on the vein at each end of the claim, and by causing a copy of said notice of location to be recorded in the office of the recorder of Tuolumne mining district, in the said county of Tuolumne, on the 10th day of December, 1888, and said S. P. Woodman, the defendant herein, did no other acts in reference to the location than the posting of a notice at each end thereof; that said defendant, S. P. Woodman, did not mark the location of said claim on the grounds so that its boundaries could in any manner be traced."

The only ground of error relied on for the reversal of the judgment and order is that this finding is not supported by the evidence. The evidence shows that the defendant did not take the necessary steps to locate the mine, nor did the plaintiffs or their grantors, under section 2324 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. The point to be considered, then, is whether the plaintiffs or their grantors were in the actual possession of the claim, and had not abandoned it at the time of the ouster. By the undisputed finding, it appears that William Jones, who made the attempted location, conveyed the whole of this claim to Tucker on the 2d of July, 1877. Thereafter this Jones worked the mine for Tucker, and his possession was that of Tucker. Then it appears that on the 13th of February, 1880, Tucker conveyed the property to William T. Jones, who was the son of William Jones. William T. Jones entered into possession at once under this deed, and during the years from 1880 to 1886 remained in possession and did work on the mine, even after the action was commenced by Tucker against him in 1885. It also appears in evidence that Mrs. E. A. Jones, at the time she claimed it under her fraudulent deed from her son, William T. Jones, stated that the claim was being kept up. This continued the possession of those interested against the claim of the defendant. The plaintiffs, or those in their interest, worked on the claim in 1888, after the deed to them was made, and after the attempted location by the defendant. William T. Jones, whose interest was sold and conveyed by the sheriff under a conveyance from whom respondents claim, had been for years in possession of a large part of the claim, having entered under the deed of Tucker, who claimed the whole mine, and for whom William Jones had possession of a part thereof up to the time when the deed was made by Tucker to William T. Jones. Tucker certainly had possession after his purchase through William Jones of a part of the claim, and made a deed of the whole of it to William T. Jones, through whom the plaintiffs claim as their immediate grantor. Tucker had possession of a part, claiming the whole, described by metes and bounds, through his deed from William Jones. Thus claiming the whole, he made a conveyance of it by metes and bounds to William T. Jones, and the last immediately entered into possession, claiming the whole. This possession was continued in the respondents. This would give them the constructive possession of the whole tract as against a mere intruder, as the court finds the defendant to be. Dodge v. Yates, 76 Cal. 254, 18 Pac. Rep. 323; Atwood v. Fricot, 17 Cal. 37; English v. Johnson, Id. 107. We think the evidence on the part of the plaintiffs tends to show that the defendant Woodman did not on his attempted location mark the same on the ground so that its boundaries could in any manner be traced. The finding assailed is supported by sufficient evidence, and we advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

LONG V. SAUFLEY. (No. 13,273.)

TRIAL BY THE COURT—REVIEW ON APPEAL.

Where findings of fact have been waived, and the decision of the trial court is based upon conflicting evidence, the supreme court will not review an order refusing a new trial.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; F. W. LAWLER, Judge.

Stewart & Herrin, (W. T. Baggett, of counsel,) for appellant. W. H. Sears, (D. H. Whittemore, of counsel,) for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The judgment in this case has been heretofore affirmed by this court. 79 Cal. 260, 21 Pac. Rep. 757. The present appeal is from an order denying a new trial. The action was brought upon the following agreement, executed by the defendant to James H. Long, the assignor of the plaintiff: "San Francisco, April 7, 1885. For value received, I hereby agree to pay to J. H. Long or order the sum of five hundred ($500) dollars out of money collected on judgment in action of Frank vs. Kilbourn et al., No. 13,636, superior court, city and county of San Francisco, department No. 7, provided that said money shall be collected from property of defendant pointed out by the said Long. R. C. SAUFLEY." The defendant, in addition to a denial of the allegations in the complaint, alleged "for a further and separate defense to said action" that he had been induced to execute the instrument sued on by certain false and fraudulent representations made to him by said James H. Long, and that said contract was "inequitable, and wholly fraudulent and void." At the trial of the action the defendant did not deny the execution of the instrument sued on, but offered evidence for the purpose of showing the negotiations between him and said Long prior to its execution regarding the subject-matter thereof, and that in those negotiations Long had agreed that he would point out other property from which the judgment could be made than that upon which the execution was subsequently levied. Long denied that any such agreement had been made by him, or even made the subject of conversation between him and the defendant, and it was shown by the witnesses for the defendant that the execution upon said judgment was placed in the hands of Long, and that under his instructions a levy was made upon this property, and that thereafter, without any sale, the defendant accepted $4,000 from the judgment debtor in satisfaction of the judgment.

The court rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff; and, as findings were waived, we must assume that the court found all the facts that were necessary to sustain its judgment. The effect of the written agreement of the defendant could not be limited or qualified by any oral testimony that his liability was contingent upon some condition not expressed therein. The matters alleged by the defendant in his separate answer constituted an affirmative defense, which it was incumbent upon him to establish by a preponderance of evidence. The testimony offered by him in support of this defense was contradicted by Long, and Long's testimony was in many respects corroborated by the testimony of the defendant's witnesses. Upon this conflict of evidence the court held that the defendant had failed to establish a defense to the action. Upon his motion for a new trial the defendant again presented the matter to the court, and in his statement expressly called attention to the fact that the evidence was sufficient to support his answer; but the court, after mature consideration, held otherwise, and denied a new trial. This court has repeatedly held that the decision of the trial court upon conflicting evidence is conclusive, and that when that court, upon a motion for a new trial, has refused to set aside such decision, this court will not reverse or even review its action. In view of this rule, it must be held that an appeal from an order denying a new trial, wherein the only ground urged for a reversal is that the court below did not properly consider the conflicting evidence, is frivolous. The order appealed from is affirmed, with $100 damages; and the superior court is directed to allow to the respondent that amount of money as a part of the costs on appeal.

AGENCY OF HUSBAND—EVIDENCE—NEW TRIAL.

In an action against a wife for the price of lumber alleged to have been furnished her through her husband as agent, the evidence showed that the husband had for a number of years lived on his wife's land, using it in his own business, and for his own profit; and that the lumber was purchased by him with his wife's knowledge, and used in erecting buildings on the land for use in his business. There was some circumstantial evidence tending to show precedent authorization of the husband to act in his wife's name in erecting the buildings, but the evidence was conflicting. Held, that an order setting aside a verdict for plaintiff and granting a new trial will not be disturbed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Napa county; R. CROUCH, Judge.

VANCLIEF, C. The defendants are husband and wife. This action was brought to recover from the wife the value of lumber alleged to have been purchased by her from the plaintiff through the agency of her husband. The case was tried by a jury. Verdict and judgment for $5,044.98. On motion of defendants a new trial was granted, and this appeal is from the order granting a new trial. The grounds upon which the new trial was asked were: (1) Insufficiency of evidence; (2) errors of law; and (3) that the verdict was against law. It appears, however, from the opinion of the lower court, brought up with the transcript, that the new trial was granted on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to prove the agency of the husband; and whether it was so is the principal question for decision.

The following facts were proved by the plaintiff or admitted by the defendants: At the time of the marriage of the defendants, in 1860, the land described in the complaint (about 340 acres) was the separate property of the wife, and has ever since remained so; and the husband and wife have ever since resided thereon; and during all that time the husband has used and cultivated the land, principally in raising grapes, from which he made wines. For the purpose of making wines from those grapes, and from other grapes purchased by him from other persons, he built upon his wife's land a large wine cellar and other permanent structures necessary for making wines, called a "winery;" also, a barn, stable, and sheds. The most expensive portion of these improvements were made within six years immediately prior to the commencement of this action, during which time, and for many years before, he carried on the business of making and selling wines in his own name, and so advertised his business throughout this state, and in several eastern cities. At different times, within five years next before the commencement of this action, he ordered lumber from the plaintiff, in his own name, to be used, and which was used, in the construction of the winery and other buildings above enumerated upon the wife's land. Plaintiff, believing that the husband was the owner of the land and improvements thereon, and also of the business of manufacturing wines thereon, delivered to him, on the land, the lumber sued for, and charged it to him individually. To save time in the examination of one of the plaintiff's witnesses, counsel for defendants admitted the following facts: "That, during all the fifteen years of the witness' acquaintance with the parties, Mrs. Krug had allowed Mr.

Krug to use her property as his own; that he had done it, and carried on business with it; that he had availed himself of the proceeds of it, and pocketed them, and never accounted to her for them, and she had never asked him to do so; and that he had carried on the business of wine-making in part with her property, (the property referred to and described in the complaint,) and with other property of his own; and that he had for all this time carried on his business of wine-making, using this piece of property described in the complaint belonging to his wife as though it was his own, and with her consent and knowledge; that he used the place as if it was his own; that he planted it and plowed it, and took the crops off and sold the crops and took the money; also, that he entered into a contract himself for the building of a stable and of a winery with her knowledge; that he entered into these contracts and concluded them, and that he paid various sums of money in the construction of these buildings; and that he was in the habit of so doing, and that she was living in a house on the property at the time. Mr. Jordan. And that these things were going on with Mrs. Krug's knowledge? Mr. Hays. Yes, sir. She saw the buildings going up." In 1885, after the lumber had been delivered and used as above stated, the husband failed in business, and was adjudged an insolvent debtor, and his assignees realized from the sale of all his property only about 5 per cent. of his debts. The debt to plaintiff for lumber was put in the schedule of his debts, and was proved against his estate by the plaintiff, after plaintiff had notice that the wife owned the land, but whether any dividend was paid thereon by the assignee to plaintiff does not appear. Of course the wife's land and the winery and other structures thereon, above mentioned, did not go to the husband's assignee in insolvency, and the husband and wife are still residing on the land, which, as improved, is worth about $100,000, but subject to a mortgage of $40,000 given to secure debts contracted by the husband in the business carried on by him.

The following is a part of the testimony of the husband upon being called as a witness for plaintiff: "I am one of the defendants in this action. The other defendant is my wife. I moved upon the property where we now reside, about a mile north of the post-office, at St. Helena, and described in the complaint, at the end of the year 1860. I had then about twenty-three hundred ($2,300) dollars of my own, which I used. The first money I spent on the place was to buy out Mr. Haskins, who was a squatter or renter on the place. I paid him a thousand ($1,000) dollars for moving off. I used the balance of the money in fencing, ditching, and whatever was needed. I had a business of my own at that time. I was then a wine-maker, and made wine in different places in Napa county, in Napa city, in 1858, with John Patchett. After my marriage I made wine on this place, and on Mr. Yount's ranch on shares. The funds I received I used in my business. I managed the property of Mrs. Krug. I planted it and ploughed it, and reaped the income from it, and used it in my business, mingling the funds with my own, and never rendered to Mrs. Krug any account of her portion of them. She never asked me for any account. It has been my constant practice since I went in business, managing her property and my own business, to mingle the funds of myself and my wife, and continued this for thirty years. I do not know how much of my money I have used. I have sold a portion of the property of my wife. I sold I think somewhere about twenty-two or twenty-three thousand dollars' worth of her property, and used the money mostly in my business. I never rendered her any account of it. She never did ask me for any account. I have been in the habit of managing this property—her property—as though it was my own. I ceased to manage it on my own hook when I failed. I manage it to-day, but not in the style I did before. The difference is that I am doing this work for Mrs. Krug now, and the money affairs go all through her hands. We have no more wine business. The business is gone, and so I am there and work for her. She does not and never did pay me a salary. What I need I suppose she gives me,—bread and butter, and a pretty good suit of clothes." Both the husband and the wife testified that no express authority was ever given to the husband to act as agent for the wife; and there was no evidence tending to prove the expression of such authority in words, oral or written. As to whether, after the commencement of the proceeding in insolvency, the wife acknowledged her liability to plaintiff, and promised to pay the debt, or any part of it, the evidence is conflicting.

The opinion of the court in granting a new trial concludes as follows: "The evidence fails to disclose a precedent authorization to act as her agent in purchasing the lumber and materials from plaintiff, unless it can be inferred from the acts and relative situation of the parties; and, if the agency cannot be so inferred, then, if it existed at all, it must have been created by subsequent ratification. 'An agency may be created and an authority may be conferred by a precedent authorization or a subsequent ratification.' Civil Code, § 2307. The question arises here, is the evidence sufficient to warrant the jury in finding either that Charles Krug was made her agent by precedent authorization, or that there was a subsequent ratification of his acts by her? For, if there is not sufficient evidence to warrant them in so finding, the verdict should not stand; otherwise, the motion should be denied. It is not contended there was any 'precedent authorization' given to Charles Krug to act as agent for his co-defendant. In order to constitute a 'subsequent ratification' of the act by the principal it seems there must be evidence of previous knowledge on the part of the principal of all the material facts, (McClelland v. Whiteley, 15 Fed. Rep. 322; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 66;) and it would seem that a ratification is only effectual when the act is done by a person professedly acting as the agent of the party sought to be charged as principal, (1 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 431, and authorities there cited; McLaren v. Hall, 26 Iowa, 305.)"

These, so far as they are conclusions of law, appear to be correct, unless the learned judge intended to be understood that the evidence on the part of the plaintiff had no substantial tendency to prove "precedent authorization" of the husband to act as the agent of the wife in erecting the fixtures above-mentioned upon her land, and in purchasing the lumber for that purpose. If he so intended, I think he was mistaken. An agency, including the agency of a husband for his wife, may be proved by circumstantial evidence, (Whart. Ag. §§ 44, 121, and 126; Burnett v. Fisher, 57 Cal. 152; Westgate v. Munroe, 100 Mass. 227; Bickford v. Dane, 58 N. H. 185;) and I think the circumstantial evidence on the part of the plaintiff in this case sensibly and substantially tended to prove precedent original authority of the husband from the wife to erect the fixtures above mentioned upon her land, and for that purpose to purchase the lumber sued for. But it is probable that the court based the order granting a new trial upon what it considered to be a preponderance in the weight of conflicting evidence in favor of defendants; and, since the trial courts have criteria by which to determine the credibility of witnesses and the comparative weight of evidence for and against the respective parties not furnished to the appellate court by a transcript of the evidence, the decisions of trial courts as to the weight of evidence, especially in granting new trials, are seldom disturbed. For the purpose of the new trial it is proper to add that, although the plaintiff (corporation) was not aware of the agency of the husband at the time it sold the lumber, and then understood that it was selling directly to him, yet, upon discovering the agency of the husband, if any there was, it had the right to resort for payment to either the agent or principal,—the husband or the wife. Ellis v. Crawford, 39 Cal. 523; Thomas v. Moody, 57 Cal. 215; Arnold v. Spurr, 130 Mass. 347 and 350; Raymond v. Proprietors, 2 Metc. (Mass.) 324; Whart. Ag. §§ 464 and 496. I think the order should be affirmed.

WE CONCUR: BEICHER, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

VOLUNTARY PAYMENT — RECOVERY — JOINT PURCHASE OF LAND.

1. Where the owner of land, on the representation of another that he has an interest therein, pays him money for a release of his claim, with the understanding that it is to be repaid if he has no interest, he may recover the money if it is ascertained that the claimant has no interest, though a person who was present with such claimant when the land was purchased has stated to the owner the facts attending the purchase.

2. The fact that several persons unite in a note to secure money for the purchase of land does not of itself create a joint interest in all of them in the purchase that may be made.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. HUNTER, Judge.

Buck & Wheeler, for appellant. E. W. Wilson and P. F. Hart, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The real question involved in this action is whether the $1,000, which the plaintiff alleges was paid by him to the defendant, and for the recovery of which the action was brought, was paid as a compromise and in settlement of differences existing between him and the defendant, or whether it was paid upon the representation and claim by the defendant that he had an interest in the purchase of certain lands in Oregon, and upon his agreement that he would repay it if it should be subsequently ascertained that he did not have any interest therein. Underlying this question, however, is the question whether the defendant did in reality have any such interest, and whether, if he did not, he knew that he had no such interest; for, if he knew that he had no interest in the land, his representation to the plaintiff that he had was false, and, if made with a view of inducing the plaintiff to pay to him $1,000 therefor, was fraudulent. Inasmuch, moreover, as the defendant himself had been personally connected with all the acts and transactions culminating in the purchase of the land, he must be held, as a matter of law, to have known whether he had any interest in the purchase or not. Hence the first question to be determined upon the trial was whether the defendant did, in fact, have any interest in the purchase of the land referred to. In pursuance of a previous plan formed on behalf of the plaintiff, one Walker, and one Smith with the defendant and his brother, the defendant and Walker had gone to the state of Oregon from the county of Humboldt, where they all resided, for the purpose of making purchase of lands, if any could be found which would be satisfactory to them. Previous to their departure, a note for $5,000 had been given to the Humboldt County Bank by four of the parties, for which the bank had given five $1,000 drafts on the Bank of California, of which two were made payable to the order of Walker, and three to the order of the defendant. After reaching Oregon, a purchase was made of the Long ranch, and an agreement for its conveyance executed between the owner and Walker, the defendant signing his name as a witness to the agreement. After making this purchase, the defendant and Walker looked at some other tracts of land, but, finding none which suited them, returned to Humboldt county. On their route back a disagreement arose between Walker and the defendant respecting the purchase, Walker claiming that it was for himself, Smith, and the plaintiff, and the defendant claiming that he had an interest in it. After they had returned to Eureka they met Smith and the plaintiff, and the controversy was continued, until finally the plaintiff paid to the defendant the $1,000 which is the subject of this controversy; the defendant claiming that it was paid as a compromise of the difference, and for a release of his claim to the land purchased, and the plaintiff contending that it was paid upon the express agreement on the part of the defendant that he would repay it if it should afterwards be established that the defendant did not have an interest in the purchase. The cause was tried before a jury, and a verdict rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the sum claimed. The defendant has appealed directly from the judgment, bringing up the evidence which was taken at the trial in a bill of exceptions, the appeal having been taken within 60 days after the judgment. It would serve no useful purpose to recount the testimony given at the trial. Both parties to the action, as well as the other parties to the transaction, were fully examined, and testimony from disinterested witnesses, in corroboration of one or the other, was also presented. All the relations existing between the five parties to the transaction, — the conversations and preparation prior to the departure of the defendant and Walker for Oregon, the procuring of the money with which to make such purchases as they might desire, their negotiations with reference to other tracts of land, in fact everything that might serve to throw light upon the particular transaction — was placed before the jury. It is needless to say that in many respects the testimony was in direct conflict. The jury, however, had the opportunity to weigh all the evidence, and to determine the effect to be given to the testimony of each witness. They were enabled to determine the extent to which the plaintiff relied upon the statement of the defendant as an inducement to pay him the money, as well as the knowledge which he could otherwise obtain concerning the correctness of that statement. After a careful examination of all the evidence in the record, we cannot say that it is insufficient to justify the verdict. The jury were fully instructed by the court upon the questions before them. They were instructed that if this money was paid as a compromise, or in settlement of a dispute between the parties, their verdict should be for the defendant. It was left to them to determine, from all the evidence, whether the money was paid as claimed by the one party or by the other, and, where the evidence was so directly contradictory and conflicting, their verdict must be the final determination of the rights of the parties. The fact that Walker had been with the defendant at the time the purchase was made, and that the plaintiff had learned from him the facts connected with his purchase, did not, of itself, make the payment to the defendant voluntary. Walker and the defendant differed radically in their version of the transaction, and in their view of the rights of the defendant in the purchase. The plaintiff was not compelled to believe that the version of either of them was correct. He had the right to further inform himself of the facts connected with the purchase, and to rely upon the statement of the defendant that these facts would show that the defendant did have an interest. If, upon such investigation, he was able to establish that the defendant did not have an interest, he had a right to demand the money back in accordance with the terms upon which he had paid it. Walker himself refused to be a party to any compromise, and the contention of the defendant, that because Walker knew all the transaction he could not have been misled by any statement of the defendant, has no application to the position of the plaintiff. He did not have Walker's knowledge, and was not compelled to rely upon his statement. He had a right to make the payment to the defendant upon the condition that, if the defendant's statement was not correct, it should be refunded, and if he should be subsequently able to establish, as he must have done to the satisfaction of the jury at the trial, that the defendant did not have an interest in the land, he had the right to maintain his action. Neither did the fact that the parties united in the note to the bank for the money with which they were to make their purchases in Oregon, of itself create a joint interest in all of the parties in whatever purchase should be made. That fact was a circumstance, but not conclusive, in determining their relations. Such arrangement could as easily have been made for the accommodation of the parties in their several rights, as in their joint rights. When the plaintiff rested, the defendant asked for a nonsuit, which was denied. There was no error in this. The court would not have been justified in withdrawing from the jury the determination from the evidence then before it of the proposition upon which the defendant asked the nonsuit. We find no error in any of the instructions or rulings of the court, and, upon well-settled principles in reference to conflicting evidence, the judgment is affirmed.

REAL-ESTATE AGENT — REVOCATION OF AUTHORITY.

Where the owner enters into a contract authorizing a real-estate agent to sell his land on commission, within a certain time, he cannot revoke the authority, and escape liability to the agent, if he secures a purchaser before the time limited, as the result of efforts commenced before such revocation. Reversing 25 Pac. Rep. 131. McFARLAND, PATERSON, and SHARPSTEIN, JJ., dissenting.

In bank. On rehearing.

GAROUTTE, J. This cause has been heard in department and in bank, and is now before the court in bank for decision upon an order granting a rehearing. This is an action for the recovery of commissions claimed to have been earned by a real-estate agent in the sale of certain lands belonging to defendant. Judgment for defendant. Motion for new trial denied, and appeal from both judgment and order. The court found that the defendant, being the owner of the land in question, on the 13th day of July, 1887, gave to L. Oest-reicher, a real-estate agent, an authorization in writing, of which the following is a copy: "I hereby authorize Mr. L. Oestreicher to sell blocks 899, 900, 901, 903, outside lands, for the sum of fifteen hundred dollars ($1,500) each; will allow him one hundred dollars ($100) as commissions for his services on each block. This contract to be in force for ten days from date hereof." Which paper was duly dated and signed by defendant. The court further finds that on the same day Oestreicher agreed with one Fulda, orally, for the sale of the blocks at the price named, but, Fulda failing to put his agreement in writing, Oestreicher afterwards, and on the same day, executed, with O. F. Von Rhein & Co., the following agreement in writing: "Received of O. F. Von Rhein & Co. the sum of three hundred dollars ($300) on account of purchase of outside land, blocks 899, 900, 901, and 903; price agreed upon, six thousand dollars, ($6,000.) Subject to perfect record title. Thirty days allowed for examination of title; if title does not prove perfect, deposit to be returned." On the same day Oestreicher notified the defendant in writing of what he had done with Von Rhein. That on the 14th Von Rhein applied to defendant, told him of his agreement to purchase, and asked for the abstract of title. Defendant told him that he would not allow 30 days to examine title. Von Rhein replied that he would make the examination earlier if possible, and received and receipted for the abstract, the same to be returned to the defendant, but no time for its return specified. Later in the same day defendant received from Fulda a letter notifying him that he (Fulda) had agreed with Oestreicher for the purchase of the blocks, and that he was prepared to examine the title and complete the purchase, if the title proved satisfactory, demanding of defendant to complete the sale, and offering to deposit $500 on account thereof. That on the next day defendant served written notice upon both Oestreicher and Von Rhein & Co., reciting that Oestreicher had procured the authorization given to him, upon his representation that he had an eastern party who was about to depart, to whom he could sell those blocks if he had authority to act at once, but he had not time to hunt up other blocks for him before his departure. That instead of selling them, as he said he could, he had negotiated a sale of them to two different resident purchasers, and, in view of these complications and misstatements, he revoked the authority of Oestreicher, and declined to proceed further in the consummation of the sale of the property through him. That, on the nineteenth day of July, Von Rhein completed his examination of the title, and offered to complete the purchase, but the defendant refused to accept the money or make the deed. That demand of the commission had been made and refused, and the claim therefor had been duly assigned to plaintiff. It was also found that the authorization from defendant had not been secured through any fraud or misrepresentation on the part of Oestreicher. On these facts the court found, as a conclusion of law, that the

It is a general principle of law that, as between the principal and the agent, the authority of the agent is revocable at any time, if not coupled with an interest, and this principle is recognized by section 2356 of the Civil Code. Mechem, upon the Law of Agency, (section 209,) says: "But this power to revoke is not to be confounded with the right to revoke. Much uncertainty has crept into the books and decisions from a failure to discriminate clearly between them. * * * As has been seen, the relation of the agent to his principal is founded in a greater or less degree upon trust and confidence. It is essentially a personal relation. If, then, for any reason, the principal determines that he no longer desires or is able to trust and confide in the agent, it is contrary to the policy of the law to undertake to compel him to do so. * * * But it by no means follows that, though possessing the power, the principal has the right to exercise it without liability, regardless of his contracts in the matter. It is entirely consistent with the existence of the power that the principal may agree that for a definite period he will not exercise it, and for the violation of such an agreement the principal is as much liable as for the breach of any other contract." In section 615 the author says: "In using the expressions rightfully and wrongfully revoked, it will be understood that the question of the principal's power to revoke is not involved, but whether by express or implied agreement, having undertaken not to exercise that power, he has, nevertheless, exercised it in violation of the agreement." Section 620 reads: " * * * Thus if, after a broker employed to sell property had in good faith expended money and labor in advertising for and finding a purchaser, and was in the midst of negotiations which were evidently and plainly approaching to success, the seller should revoke the authority with the purpose of availing himself of the broker's efforts, and avoiding the payment of his commissions, it could not be claimed that the agent had no remedy. In these cases it might well be said that there was an implied contract on the part of the principal to allow the agent a reasonable time for performance, that full performance was wrongfully prevented by the principal's own acts, and that the agent had earned his commission." Section 968 uses this language: "It is entirely competent for the principal to agree that the broker shall have a certain time within which to find a purchaser, and, where he does so, he will be liable to the broker for damages, if, without the latter's fault or consent, he terminates his authority before the expiration of that period." In the case of Lane v. Albright, 49 Ind. 279, where the owner of the real estate sold it pending the negotiations of the agent in making a sale, and prior to the expiration of the time given by the owner to the agent, and where the agent within the time given did find a purchaser, the court says: "The appellant performed all that he was required by the contract to do, and was prevented by the appellee from selling the land. The appellee disabled himself from carrying out the contract of sale made by the appellant." "The fact that the appellee had authorized appellant to sell his land did not deprive himself of the power of selling it, but he could not thereby avoid his liability to appellant." In Hawley v. Smith, 45 Ind. 183, upon full consideration the court decided that the rule is that, where the performance by one party is prevented by the act of the other, the party not in fault should recover in damages such sum as will fully compensate him for the injury which he has sustained by reason of the non-performance of the contract. To the same effect is Story, Ag. § 466. In the case at bar it may be conceded that the agent had not entirely carried out his contract at the time the defendant revoked his authority, but upon the 19th day of July, and within the limit of time fixed by the contract, he did produce the purchaser, with his money in his hand, demanding a deed. The court found that the plaintiff entered into this contract in good faith, and that the writing was untainted with fraud. The record discloses that the agent was most active in his efforts to find a purchaser; indeed, the real reasons of defendant's revocation of the agency appear to be that the agent was too active, as he had found two purchasers for the property instead of one. The case of Brown v. Pfirr, 38 Cal. 553, would seem to indicate upon a cursory examination, views hostile to the principles expressed in the authorities cited in this opinion, but, upon examination of that case, it can readily be seen that no hostility exists. The contract in that case does not expressly stipulate that it shall remain in force 30 days, and the opinion of Justice SANDERSON clearly intimates that, if there had been a provision in the contract that it should remain in force for such length of time, the defendant would not have been permitted to prevent performance, and escape without making compensation to the agent. The remaining cases cited by respondent upon this question add no merit to his contention. The defendant expressly agreed that his contract with the agent should remain in force for the period of 10 days. The act of the agent in finding a purchaser required time and labor for its completion, and within three days of the execution of the contract, and prior to its revocation, he had placed the matter in the position that success was practically certain and immediate, and it would be the height of injustice to permit the principal then to withdraw the authority and terminate the agency as against an express provision of the contract, and perchance reap the benefit of the agent's labors, without being liable to him for his commissions. This would be to make the contract an unconscionable one, and would offer a premium for fraud by enabling one of the parties to take advantage of his own wrong, and secure the labor of the other without remuneration. Let the judgment and order be reversed, and the cause remanded, with direction

TORREY v. BALDWIN, County Treasurer.

INDIAN RESERVATIONS—TAXATION.

Rev. St. U. S. § 1839, provides that "nothing in this title [the territories] shall be construed to impair the rights of person or property pertaining to the Indians in any territory so long as such rights remain unextinguished by treaty, * * * or to include any territory which by treaty with any Indian tribe is not, without the consent of such tribe, embraced within the territorial limits or jurisdiction of any state or territory, but all such territory shall be excepted out of the boundaries and constitute no part of any territory now or hereafter organized." The treaty of July 3, 1868, with the Shoshones, pursuant to which their reservation was established, contains no reservation or exception whereby it should be excluded and excepted out of the territory within which it was situated. Held, that the reservation was included within the territory, and that cattle thereon, belonging to a white person in no wise connected with the Indians, were subject to taxation in the county within which the reservation lay.

Reserved case from district court, Fremont county.

The plaintiff, Robert A. Torrey, brought suit on the 3d day of February, 1890, in the district court of the third judicial district of the territory of Wyoming for Fremont county against the defendant M. N. Baldwin, as county treasurer and ex officio collector of taxes for Fremont county. The plaintiff seeks to have certain taxes in the sum of $1,262.42 levied and assessed against him on his live-stock, horses, and cattle ranging on the Shoshone Indian reservation within the geographical limits of the county of Fremont, declared void, and to perpetually enjoin and restrain the defendant as such officer, and his successors in office, from collecting such taxes levied and assessed against him by the board of the county commissioners of the county of Fremont for the year 1889. The petition alleges the levy and assessment of such taxes upon the live-stock of the plaintiff, consisting of horses and cattle, upon an assessed valuation of $59,250; that said live-stock were upon the open range, and were during all of said year 1889 ranged and located within and upon said Shoshone Indian reservation, situated within the geographical limits of said Fremont county; that the reservation was established pursuant to a treaty between the United States and the eastern band of the Shoshones and the Bannock tribe of Indians, made and concluded at Ft. Bridger, in the territory of Utah, July 3, 1868, which treaty has ever since existed; that plaintiff during said year 1889 was a non-resident of Wyoming; that defendant threatened to levy upon and distrain the property of plaintiff if said tax was not paid. To this petition defendant demurred, assigning two grounds of demurrer: (1) That the court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action; and (2) that the petition does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. Upon these pleadings and the issues thereby raised the court below, Hon. A. B. CONAWAY, now one of the justices of the supreme court, presiding, on his own motion, and under the provisions of chapter 66 of the Session Laws of Wyoming for 1888, reserved and sent for decision to this court the said cause and the questions raised by demurrer, and, as is stated in the certificate of the said district court: "Whether the county of Fremont, within the geographical boundaries of which is situated said [Shoshone] Indian reservation, had in the year 1889, any right, authority, or jurisdiction to assess for taxation and levy a tax upon the cattle and horses of the plaintiff, which were during all of that year kept and located upon the said Shoshone Indian reservation; and whether said cattle and horses of the plaintiff, as kept and located upon said reservation during that year, were subject to taxation in said county for that year; and whether said taxes, so levied and assessed upon said property, were void, wrongful, and illegal for the want of authority and jurisdiction to tax the same."

GROESBECK, C. J., (after stating the facts as above.) The questions involved in this proceeding were directly passed upon by the supreme court of the late territory of Wyoming when the said Shoshone Indian reservation was a part of Sweetwater county, and before the formation of the county of Fremont from a part of its territory, in the case of Moore v. Board, etc., 2 Wyo. 8, and the broad statement was then judicially announced that the territory of Wyoming was wholly excluded from the exercise of political power over this reservation, either to regulate the intercourse of its subjects with it, or to extend its municipal authority over it. The right to tax any property within the reservation was by this decision emphatically denied. We should be loth, at this late day, to re-examine this question, were it not that since the said decision was made there have been a number of decisions of the federal supreme court passing upon the questions involved, either absolutely or incidentally, which are in direct conflict with the views of the learned judge who delivered the opinion of the supreme court of the territory in the case first cited. Notwithstanding this decision and the later one of Fremont Co. v. Moore, (Wyo.) 19 Pac. Rep. 438, one of the members of that court, while sitting as a district court for Albany county, upon a cause heard and determined by him upon a change of venue from Fremont county, has since held that the county of Fremont, in its corporate capacity, had the right to tax personal property of the plaintiff in this case, the same being live-stock ranging on the Shoshone Indian reservation in Fremont county; and the fact that this matter has been sent to us for decision by another district court shows that these decisions of the territorial supreme court have been boldly challenged by bench, bar, and the public. We should not lightly upset these decisions, however erroneous they may appear to us, unless it satisfactorily appears to our minds that they have not been acquiesced in and considered the settled law of this jurisdiction, so that the doctrine of stare decisis would apply, or because it is impossible to follow them with safety, in the light of a more elaborate discussion of the principles involved, and because they are clearly against the weight of authority and the law governing the case. The treaty with the eastern band of the Shoshones and the Bannack tribe of Indians was made and concluded at Ft. Bridger, Utah, July 3, 1868, and was afterwards ratified by the president and the senate of the United States. 15 U. S. St. 673. There is neither reservation nor exception in this treaty, as was the case in the treaty with the Shawnees and other tribes, whereby the territory embraced within the exterior lines of the reservation should be excluded and excepted out of the state or territory within which the reservation was geographically situated. It was expressly decided in the case of Langford v. Monteith, 102 U. S. 145, where the error made in the case of Harkness v. Hyde, 98 U. S. 476, was corrected. We quote from the opinion in the former case: "This court, in Harkness v. Hyde, supra, relying upon an imperfect extract found in the brief of counsel, inadvertently inferred that the treaty with the Shoshones, like that with the Shawnees, contains a clause excluding the lands of the tribe from territorial or state jurisdiction. In this it seems we are laboring under a mistake. Where no such clause or language equivalent to it is found in a treaty with the Indians within the exterior limits of Idaho, the lands held by them are a part of the territory, and subject to its jurisdiction, so that process may run there, however the Indians themselves may be exempt from that jurisdiction. As there is no such treaty with the Nez Percés tribe, on whose reservation the premises in dispute are situated, and as this is a suit between white men, citizens of the United States, the justice of the peace had jurisdiction of the parties, if the subject-matter was one of which he could take cognizance." The court further decided that the reservation which was provided for in the Shoshone treaty was not excepted out of the territory of Idaho. The organic act of the territory of Wyoming, approved July 25, 1868, contains the following exception and reservation relating to the rights of Indians, and no other, viz.: "Provided, that nothing in this act shall be construed to impair the rights of person or property now pertaining to Indians in said territory, so long as such rights shall remain unextinguished by treaty between the United States and such Indians." The proviso afterwards inserted in the Revised Statutes of the United States, (section 1839,) is nearly the same as that contained in the organic acts of the territories of Idaho, Dakota, and probably of other territories, organized prior to the creation of the territory of Wyoming, thus plainly indicating that the remainder of the proviso which appears in the organic act of these older territories was studiously and for a purpose omitted in the organic act of Wyoming. Section 1839 of the Revised Statutes of the United States reads as follows: "Nothing in this title shall be construed to impair the rights of persons or property pertaining to the Indians in any territory so long as such rights remain unextinguished by treaty between the United States and such Indians, or to include any territory which by treaty with any Indian tribe is not, without the consent of such tribe, embraced within the territorial limits or jurisdiction of any state or territory; but all such territory shall be excepted out of the boundaries and constitute no part of any territory now or hereafter organized, until such tribe signifies its assent to the president to be embraced within a particular territory." The only substantial differences in the phraseology between the organic acts of the territories other than Wyoming and this section just quoted are that the words "to be included" are stricken out of the organic acts, and the word "embraced" inserted in lieu thereof in the section; and the clause: "Or to affect the authority of the government of the United States to make any regulations respecting such Indians, their lands, property, or other rights, by treaty, law, or otherwise, which it would have been competent for the government to make if this act had never been passed,"—is also stricken out, but is substantially reenacted in section 1840, Rev. St. U. S. It will be noticed, although it is contended that the organic acts of the territories existing prior to the revision of the federal statutes of 1874 and 1878 were repealed by the revision, the supreme court of United States, long after the adoption of the revision, refers almost entirely to the organic acts themselves in construing these provisions relating to Indians, as if they were unmodified and unrepealed. We think that the error in the case of Harkness v. Hyde, supra, arose rather from a false construction of the proviso relating to Indian rights in the organic act of Idaho than "from an imperfect extract found in the brief of counsel," and it appears that the same error runs through the language employed by Mr. Justice MATTHEWS in the case of Ex parte Crow Dog, 109 U. S. 556, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 396. He says: "The district courts of the territory of Dakota are invested with the same jurisdiction in all cases arising under the laws of the United States as is vested in the circuit and district courts of the United States. Rev. St. §§ 1907-1910. The reservation of the Sioux Indians lying within the exterior boundaries of the territory of Dakota was defined by article 2 of the treaty concluded April 29, 1868, (15 St. 635;) and by section 1839 of the Revised Statutes it is excepted out of and constitutes no part of that territory. The object of this exception is stated to be to exclude the jurisdiction of any state or territorial government over Indians within its exterior limits, without their consent, where their rights have been reserved, and not extinguished by treaty." If the Sioux reservation was excepted out of and constituted no part of the territory of Dakota, why was that jurisdiction over Indians alone excluded? Why was it not excluded as to white people? We do not see any such exception in the Sioux treaty, which is almost like that of the Shoshone treaty on this point. This case was, however, decided upon another and a controlling point,—that section 3146, Rev. St. U. S., excepting offenses committed by one Indian against the person and property of another Indian in the Indian country from the operation of the local law, was not repealed.

We are content with the views expressed by the court in the case of Langford v. Monteith, decided earlier, and the cases of Railway Co. v. Fisher, 116 U. S. 28, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 246, and U. S. v. Kagama, 118 U. S. 375, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1109, decided later, which are harmonious with the case of Langford v. Monteith. Although it was decided that the exclusive authority and jurisdiction of the United States over Indians in the Indian country was not lost in the Crow Dog Case, this objection was removed by the statute of March 3, 1885, which provided that Indians should be tried for many offenses arising under the territorial laws by the territorial courts in which the reservations were situated, and this act was declared valid in the case of U. S. v. Kagama, supra. In Re Gonsahay-ee, 130 U. S. 343, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 542. However, admitting that the disputed portion of section 1839, Rev. St. U. S., superseded and repealed the organic act of Wyoming, yet we cannot see that it has any such meaning as is sometimes attributed to it. It certainly is not free from ambiguity, but, reduced to simple language, in an intelligible form, it would read thus: "Nothing in this title ['Territories,' tit. 23] shall be construed to include any territory which by treaty with any Indian tribe is excluded from the territorial limits of any state or territory; but all such territory shall be excepted out of the boundaries and constitute no part of any territory now or hereafter organized." The clause "all such territory" must mean the territory which, by treaty with the Indians, is excluded from the territorial limits or jurisdiction of any state or territory. There is no such reservation or exception in the Shoshone treaty, and this was directly and of necessity decided in the cases of Langford v. Monteith and Railway Co. v. Fisher, supra. If we adopt the construction of the federal supreme court in these cases, (and we are bound to do so,) that the Ft. Hill (Hall) reservation was a part of the territory of Idaho, notwithstanding the greater restriction imposed by its organic act, we must hold that the Shoshone reservation in Wyoming, which was provided for and designated in the same treaty, was a part of the territory of Wyoming, and consequently a portion of the county of Fremont, wherein it lies. Our attention has been called to section 663 of the Revised Statutes of Wyoming, defining the boundaries of Fremont county, wherein it is "provided that if, by reason of any treaty with the Shoshone or Arapahoe tribe of Indians, the Indian or government title to any lands or reservation within the limits of the county shall be extinguished, the same shall form and constitute a part of the aforesaid county." We think that this proviso was inserted through an excess of caution, and in view of the decisions of the territorial courts. No territory was excluded from the county by the act organizing it; and, if the Shoshone reservation is a part of Wyoming, it certainly must be a part of Fremont county, within the exterior boundaries of which it lies. At the time, then, of levying the taxes upon the property of plaintiff in 1889, the territorial courts, as such, had both civil and criminal jurisdiction over the Shoshone Indian reservation in Fremont county, so that process could run there, and, of necessity, so that process could be enforced there.

The question is, was there any further jurisdiction of the territory, such as the taxing power over this reservation? It is undoubtedly true that when a given area is within the defined limits of a municipality it would be presumed to be within the jurisdiction of the same for all purposes, including taxation. If it be excluded or exempt for any purpose, the exemption should clearly appear. The realty cannot be taxed; the soil belongs to the government, of which the Indians have the usufruct. The property of the Indians cannot be taxed. It is true, as stated in the case of Fremont Co. v. Moore, supra, that "the jurisdiction to tax and the jurisdiction of the courts are not necessarily co-extensive." But, the general jurisdiction being conceded, we do not see, on principle, why the taxing power may not exist over the person and property of any person not an Indian, so long as the rights of the government or of the Indians are not impaired. We do not agree to the proposition that property on the reservation could not be distrained if it could lawfully be taxed there. There is no pretense that the plaintiff, Torrey, is a post trader, or an officer or agent of the government. It is folly to say that a tax collector could not enforce his warrant for the collection of taxes on the reservation with as much propriety as a sheriff could serve a civil writ or a criminal warrant there. The reservation does not belong to the Indians, as the title to the soil is in the government, and the Indians have but the usufruct to the land, unless they choose to select and cultivate the land in severalty; and even when this is done, on the abandonment of such a purpose the land reverts to the government. It was not the purpose of congress to create an imperium in imperio within our limits, nor to make a foreign country of an Indian reservation. The doctrine that the Indians are separate nations, or even "dependent sovereignties," as they are named in the first Moore Case quoted above, has long ago been exploded. They are considered the wards of the government, as in a condition of pupillage, and as "dependent political communities." They are kept on reservations to restrain their natural propensities to roam over a large scope of country; to keep them from contact with the meaner whites, from whom they have absorbed the vices, without the virtues, of civilization; to secure the settlers in the vicinity of the reservations, who have planted with so much care their homes in a frontier country, the peaceable occupation of their lands, improvements, and property; and to give to the Indians a "local habitation and a name," and thus to gradually overcome their hereditary lawlessness and their indisposition to labor. They are dependent upon the government for food, clothing, and shelter, for their protection from the rapacity of the stronger race, from their internal quarrels, with the encouragement to improve their condition by every incentive that can be afforded to such a people. The law on the subject of the treatment of the Indians is a curious and an interesting study. After a century of dealings with them, a new and a more sensible policy found legislative utterance, forced by the imperative logic of events, in the statute of March 3, 1871, (section 2079, Rev. St. U. S.), which provides that no Indian tribe or nation within the territory of the United States shall be acknowledged or recognized as an independent nation, tribe, or power, with whom the government may contract by treaty, saving all existing rights growing out of treaties then in existence. Since the enactment of this law, agreements with the Indians are no longer held as "treaties" requiring the assent of the president and the senate, but these contracts must be ratified by a solemn act of congress, in which the concurrence of the lower branch of congress, which carries the purse, must be obtained, as well as that of the upper branch, which bears the sword. The statute of March 3, 1885, as was well said by Mr. Justice MILLER, in the Kagama Case, quoted above, "does not interfere with the operation of state laws upon white people found there," (on an Indian reservation.) We consider the case of Railway Co. v. Fisher, 116 U. S. 28, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 246, much stronger. The railroad company obtained a cession of its right of way through the Ft. Hill (Hall) reservation, and claimed exemption from local taxation, because the reservation was excepted out of and formed no part of the territory of Idaho, and because the taxing power did not extend over the reservation. But the court held that the road and property of the company thereupon was subject to taxation for territorial and county purposes, and was only "withdrawn so far as necessary for the construction and working of the road and the use of buildings connected therewith" from the reservation, and that the reservation was not excluded from the territorial limits of Idaho. It was further said in the opinion that, if the railroad company constructed and operated a railroad through this reservation, it could not be perceived that any just rights of the Indians were impaired by taxing the road and the property used in operating it. It seems, therefore, that the only jurisdiction of the territory that was excluded from this reservation was such only as might impair the rights of the Indians. Hence, with the supreme court of the United States, we do not see that any just rights of the Indians could be impaired by taxing the property of the plaintiff. If the plaintiff ranged his cattle and other livestock on the reservation, without the consent of the Indians, he is in the attitude of a trespasser or wrong-doer justifying his immunity from taxation by his own wrongful and unlawful act. If his livestock were ranging there with the consent of the Indians, he would come within the rule laid down in the case of Railway Co. v. Fisher. Even under a contract with the Indians, he might be compelled to remove his property from the reservation, as were those who leased lands from the Cherokees, and who were expelled by the proclamation of the president of July 23, 1885. 24 U. S. St. at Large, 1. If his livestock, which appear to have been depasturing on the reservation solely for his pecuniary benefit and gain, are exempt from taxation while there, there is nothing in the way to prevent others subject to taxation, whose property has its situs in Fremont county, from moving their personal effects and chattels across the line into the reservation during the assessment period, and, when that time has expired, returning with it. In such a case the reservation becomes a rendezvous for those who seek to escape taxation,—an asylum for those who would evade the just burdens of government. Taxation is an incident of civilization, and he who would avoid it must expatriate himself, and transfer his property where government is unknown. Much stress is laid upon the clause of the Shoshone treaty which provides that "the United States now solemnly agrees that no persons except those herein designated and authorized so to do, and except such officers, agents, and employees of the government as may be authorized to enter upon Indian reservations in discharge of duties enjoined by law, shall be permitted to pass over, settle upon, or reside in the territory described in this article for the use of said Indians," etc. This clause was discussed and construed in the case last mentioned, (Railway Co. v. Fisher;) and the conclusion reached was "that the authority of the territory may rightfully extend to all matters not interfering" with the protection of the Indians. It is strange that the plaintiff sets up his own wrong in this matter—his own trespass, his own unlawful presence on the reservation—as a reason why others should not go there to interfere with him. It is contended that the plaintiff can receive no direct benefits from the taxation of his property on the reservation, because schools cannot be maintained there, nor roads laid out, nor bridges built at the expense of the county, and for the reason that the taxes collected there cannot be there distributed and expended in common to and with other portions of the county. This is too narrow a view to take of taxation. "The state levies taxes for the support of its government and for all public needs, that it may be able to carry into effect its mandates, and to perform its manifold functions; and the citizen pays from his property his portion, that he may secure thereby the enjoyment of the benefits flowing to him and his neighbors from organized society. No government can be so administered, even by the most conscientious rulers, that there may not be apparently unjust and inequitable consequences in particular cases." Cooley, Tax'n, pp. 1-3. There are many instances of this arising from the operation of our revenue laws. The childless man must pay for the education of the children of others, the thrifty citizen must contribute to the support of those who have become indigent through their unthrift, the upright must be taxed for the support of the vicious criminal, the sane must care for the insane. The general school tax in each county in Wyoming is collected from the taxable property of the whole county, whether settled or unsettled, but it can only be expended in the settled portions thereof, which are divided into school-districts, and one may be compelled to pay for the expense of building a bridge or of maintaining a public highway where he may never travel the one or cross the other. Yet the plaintiff may sue and be sued in the local courts; and he now seeks their aid to secure him exemption from taxation when he is not willing to contribute for their support, although his liability for costs is but a small fraction of the salaries of officials, and the costs of maintaining the courts. He could have even an Indian punished for the larceny of his stock, in the local courts, and he could recover in the same tribunals property wrongfully detained from him by another on the reservation. His position is no worse, but the same, as the Utah & Northern Railway Company in the case last quoted, where the corporation could not expect to receive all the benefits, in common with others, of the moneys received and derived from territorial and county taxes, as no roads could possibly be laid out or maintained, nor bridges built, nor schools established on its right of way, yet it was held that the company was liable to be taxed. The case of Bridge Co. v. City of Louisville, 81 Ky. 189, depends upon a different principle, as there the power of the state to tax the bridge was upheld, while the right of the city to tax was denied, as, although the bridge was within the corporate limits, yet it was without the taxable limit. This principle, in the case of the extension of the limits of a municipal corporation over suburban and farming property, not laid off into lots, has been frequently announced by the courts of Michigan and other states. In this connection we think the decisions in Wisconsin collected in the case of Lumber Co. v. Brown, 40 N. W. Rep. 482, are more in point. In re Phoenix, etc., R. Co., (Ariz.) 26 Pac. Rep. 310.

We answer the questions reserved and sent to us as follows: The county of Fremont had in the year 1889 full right, power, and authority to assess for taxation and levy a tax upon the cattle and horses of the plaintiff which were during all that year kept and located upon the Shoshone Indian reservation, which lies within the geographical limits of said county, and the cattle and horses of the said plaintiff as kept and located upon said reservation during said year were subject to taxation in said county for said year, and the said taxes so levied and assessed upon said property were not void, wrongful, or illegal for the want of jurisdiction to tax the same. The district court of judicial district No. 3, sitting for the county of Fremont, is directed to sustain the demurrer of the defendant to the petition of plaintiff, and to proceed with the cause, and to make such disposition thereof as shall be consistent with this opinion.

WHEATON et al. v. RAMPACKER.

REVIEW—RECORD—ACTION ON CONTRACT—EVIDENCE.

1. The statement in a bill of exceptions that "the said testimony was all the testimony offered by either party" does not show that all the "evidence" is therein contained so as to allow a review thereof.

2. On the back of a certificate for stock owned by plaintiff, defendants indorsed an agreement to pay plaintiff therefor a certain amount after three years on the surrender of the certificate. Held that, in an action thereon, it was not necessary to allege a consideration for the promise, but that it was sufficient that plaintiff accepted it, and notified defendants thereof in a reasonable time, and before the offer had been withdrawn.

3. In the absence of evidence as to the circumstances, the judgment for plaintiff cannot be disturbed on the ground that a tender of the stock, made within a year after the expiration of the three years, was not made within a reasonable time.

Appeal from district court, Albany county.

Brown & Arnold, for appellants. I. P. Caldwell and Lacey & Van Devanter, for appellee.

GROESBECK, C. J. Rampacker, the defendant in error, brought suit in the district court of Albany county against Wheaton and Trabling, the plaintiffs in error, on a certain indorsement upon a certificate for five shares of the capital stock of the Big Laramie Land, Cattle & Improvement Company, of the par value of $500, which he (Rampacker) owned on the 22d day of May, 1884. This indorsement on the certificate is as follows: "Chicago, May 22, '84. We agree to pay A. Rampacker the par value of this stock, with interest at 10 per cent. per annum from date, after three years, upon the surrender of this certificate. [Signed] GEO. D. WHEATON. TRABING BROS." The firm or copartnership of Trabling Bros. was, at said date, composed of Augustus Trabling, one of the plaintiffs in error, and Charles Trabling, who has since died. The petition alleged these facts, and that on the 16th day of May, 1888, and at divers other times prior to that date, and after the expiration of said three years, Rampacker offered to surrender the said certificate of stock to said Wheaton and Trabling, and demanded payment therefor, which was refused. Augustus Trabling, who appears to be the only defendant served and appearing in the court below, demurred to the petition on the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer was overruled, an exception was taken, and Trabling answered, admitting that Rampacker was the owner of the said certificate on May 22, 1884, admitting the execution of the said indorsement thereon by him for Trabling Bros., but denying that there was ever any consideration to support the agreement indorsed upon said certificate, although this was not alleged in the petition, denying that Rampacker ever promised to return said stock or to surrender the same to said Wheaton and Trabling, although this was not alleged in the petition; and denying, further, the offer to surrender said stock by Rampacker, and denying that he demanded payment therefor from any defendant in the case, in accordance with the conditions written upon the back of said certificate. A trial was had, and the court found for Rampacker, the plaintiff therein, and rendered judgment in his favor against Augustus Trabling for the sum of $746.65 and costs. A motion for a new trial was made and overruled, and proceedings in error were brought to this court.

1. We cannot review the evidence in the record, presented, as it is claimed, before the trial court, as it has become the settled rule of this court, to which we must adhere, that the bill of exceptions must contain all the evidence admitted in the trial court, where the same is sought to be reviewed here. The statement in the bill of exceptions before us is that "the said testimony was all the testimony offered by either party on the trial of this cause." It was held in the case of Trust Co. v. Holliday, (Wyo.) 24 Pac. Rep. 193, that the word "testimony" is not synonymous with the word "evidence," and that such a bill of exceptions as the one before us, containing a like recital, would not be considered by the court. The learned counsel for the plaintiffs in error, recognizing the force of this rule, contented himself with urging two objections to the judgment of the district court: (1) The court erred in overruling the demurrer to the petition; and (2) the petition does not state facts sufficient to support the judgment.

2 These objections rest upon the single proposition, which was argued at length, that the petition does not allege any consideration for the offer to purchase or take the stock in question. This is true. The agreement was strictly unilateral, as it was not signed by Rampacker, and there is nothing to show that he agreed to accept the proposition or offer of the plaintiffs in error at the time when the indorsement on the certificate was made. This offer, however, became good, if accepted, and, if the promisors were notified of the acceptance within a reasonable time, unless the agreement had been revoked or withdrawn, or when from the lapse of time, it would be presumed to have been revoked or withdrawn. The promise indorsed on the certificate of stock is in the nature of a continuing offer or proposition. Whatever consideration for the promise existed at the time of the execution of the agreement, or whether any consideration ever existed between the date of the promise and that of the tender of the stock, cannot be considered, as no consideration is set up in the pleadings. The offer to purchase, so far as it appears, was primarily without consideration, and it might have been withdrawn or revoked at any time prior to the tender of the stock. It was then accepted and acted upon by Rampacker, and it was then no longer a nudum pactum, but became a valid and binding agreement. The offer must be regarded as continuing, until accepted, rejected, or withdrawn. So long as it continues, it is at the disposal of the party to whom it is made. Wade, Notice, § 384, and cases there cited.

It is urged that the offer to purchase or pay for the stock was not accepted within a reasonable time, and that the defendant in error forfeited his rights under the agreement by his laches, but we think that this contention is not well founded. By its terms the offer was held open "until after three years," and the defendant in error could not have surrendered or performed his part of the contract, if he chose to accept the agreement, before the expiration of that time. The allegation in the petition is that the tender was made on or about May 16, 1888, nearly one year after the three years had expired, and "at divers other times prior to that date, and after the expiration of said three years." Inasmuch as there is no allegation in the answer that the acceptance and tender were not made within a reasonable time, and the ground for reversal is not urged on this point, we are unable to determine whether or not the tender and offer to surrender the certificate were made in a reasonable time. The averments of the petition, as to the offer to surrender the stock, are flatly denied in the answer, and, in the absence of any evidence on this point, we must presume that the trial court decided that the surrender or offer to surrender the stock must have been made within a reasonable time, as it had all the evidence before it, and could settle that question by the facts and circumstances of the case and the situation of the parties. If, however, we strain the rule, and look at the evidence which the bill of exceptions contains, we find that Trabling was informed by Rampacker's attorney, some time in 1887, that Rampacker accepted the offer; and that all that Trabling said, at that time, was that it was a matter in which the estate of his brother was interested, together with the Trabling Commercial Company, and that he was unable to do anything about the matter until these affairs were settled. This shows that Trabling did not disaffirm the contract, or insist upon its withdrawal. It appears, also, that on the date alleged, May 16, 1888, the stock was tendered, and payment therefor refused. Whether or not this is all the evidence in the trial court we cannot say, but, admitting that it was, we think it established the fact that the agreement was accepted and acted upon within a reasonable time. The defendant in error had undoubtedly the right to elect to surrender, or offer to surrender, the stock, and sue for the contract price, as he has done. The judgment is affirmed.

Ex parte BERGMAN.

(Supreme Court of Wyoming. Nov. 25, 1890.)

HABEAS CORPUS—CONTEMPT—ABOLITION OF TERRITORIAL PROBATE COURT.

1. Under Rev. St. Wyo. § 1269, which provides that the court may refuse to issue the writ of habeas corpus if, from the showing of the petitioner, he is not entitled to any relief, the writ will not issue in the first instance as of course, but the petitioner must make out a prima facie case for its issuance.

2. The fact that an order to show cause why defendant should not be punished for contempt was not styled in the name of the state, as required by Const. Wyo. art. 5, § 15, does not render the order of commitment void, where defendant voluntarily submitted to the order to show cause, which was personally served on him, and appeared both in person and by counsel, without raising the question of jurisdiction.

3. Const. Wyo. art. 5, § 10, confers on the district court, among other things, exclusive original jurisdiction "in all matters of probate;" and article 21, § 17, provides that all records of the territorial probate court shall pass into the possession of the district court, and that the latter court shall have jurisdiction to determine all causes which the probate court would have heard if the constitution had not been adopted. Held, that the territorial probate court and the office of probate judge were abolished on the adoption of the constitution, notwithstanding the fact that the territorial probate judge was ex officio county treasurer, and that Const. Wyo. art. 21, § 19, continued in office all county officers until the expiration of the terms for which they were elected, and until their successors were qualified, as the two offices of probate judge and county treasurer, though held by the same person, are separate and distinct.

4. Since the district court is constructively in possession of the records of the territorial probate court, the territorial probate judge holds them subject to its order; and, on his refusal to produce them when called for, he may be punished for contempt.

5. The fact that the district court may compel the production of the records of the territorial probate court by mandamus does not deprive it of the more summary proceedings by contempt against the probate judge.

6. Since the probate judge may purge himself of the contempt by the production of the records, the order of the district court that he be imprisoned until he does produce them is not void, as imposing a term of imprisonment without limit; nor is such order affected by Sess. Laws Wyo. 1890, p. 144, § 121, which fixes a definite punishment for witnesses who refuse to be sworn or answer questions, and which expressly provides that "this section shall not prevent summary proceedings for contempt."

7. In the absence of direct statutory provisions, the fact that the person in contempt may be proceeded against by indictment does not take away the power of the court to commit for contempt.

8. Where the record of the district court shows that a rule to show cause was personally served on the probate judge; that the latter, with full knowledge of the charge against him, appeared both in person and by counsel, and submitted his case on the evidence; that, on hearing the order to produce the records of the probate court, he declined to make further answer; and that he retained them after repeated requests to turn them over,—an objection to the order of commitment, on the ground that the probate judge was held in contempt in matters which had not occurred when the order was made, and that he had no hearing or opportunity to be heard, is not well taken.

9. The record in the contempt proceeding imports absolute verity, and cannot be questioned on habeas corpus to release the prisoner.

Walter R. Stoll and A. C. Campbell, for petitioner. Willis Van Devanter and John M. Davidson, amici curiæ.

GROESBECK, C. J. The petition for the writ of habeas corpus recites that Isaac Bergman, the petitioner, is a citizen of the United States of America, and of this state, and is restrained of his liberty by John A. Martin, as sheriff and jailer of the county of Laramie, at the jail of said county; that the pretense of such restraint, according to the best information of the petitioner, is by an order of commitment of the district court of the first judicial district, sitting within and for the county of Laramie, a copy of which order is attached to the petition; that the restraint and imprisonment of the petitioner is illegal, in this: (1) That the said district court was without jurisdiction in the premises; (2) that the said commitment was made in an alleged proceeding for contempt, which alleged contempt consisted in not obeying what is called a "request" or "order," which is attached to the petition, and in not obeying what is called a "further order," also attached to the petition; (3) that the said order of commitment was illegal, in this: that it is without limit; (4) that the said order of commitment is illegal, in this: that the said petitioner was held in contempt in matters which had not occurred at the time the said last-mentioned order was made returnable, and in which the petitioner had no hearing, and no opportunity to be heard. The petition closes with the usual averments that the illegality of the imprisonment of the petitioner has not been adjudged upon a prior proceeding of the same character, and that the application for the writ has not been made to, and refused by, any court or judge. The orders referred to are sufficiently set out in the answer and return of the said sheriff to the writ, and the substance of such answer and return is given in this opinion.

This court has been invested with original jurisdiction in habeas corpus by the constitution of this state. Section 3, art. 5, of the constitution of Wyoming. The supreme court of the territory of Wyoming also exercised this original jurisdiction, under the organic act of the territory and the acts of congress relating to habeas corpus. The proceedings and practice in habeas corpus set forth in chapter 1 of title 17 of the Revised Statutes of Wyoming appear to be applicable herein, and the petition and answer are drawn thereunder. Under the provisions of this statute, the writ does not issue, as of course, upon the application. Sec. 1269, Rev. St., provides that "if, from the showing of the petitioner, the plaintiff would not be entitled to any relief, the court or judge may refuse the writ." And section 1272 directs that, "if the writ is disallowed, the court or judge shall cause the reasons for said disallowance to be appended to the petition, and returned to the person applying for the writ." This is the rule under the common law, and is the practice uniformly followed by courts and judges upon application for the writ, unless the statute of the jurisdiction points out another method. The writ can only issue to one "entitled to it," and it should not be granted without inquiry. To allow the writ, without determining that the petitioner had made a prima facie case, would make it a mere ministerial act; and a clerk of a court or other ministerial officer might issue it as in case of mesne process, and as an ordinary writ. The right to the writ "is a right in a larger and more liberal sense,—a right to be delivered from all unlawful imprisonment." Until early in the present century, in England, the opinion prevailed that the court was bound in the first instance to issue the writ of habeas corpus, as, of course, without exercising its discretion, as to the grounds upon which the writ issued or moved. But it clearly appears that all the leading later decisions, both English and American, establish the rule that probable cause must first be shown to obtain the writ, whether it is granted at common law or under the statute; and this rule has been followed without interruption, in this country, in both federal and state courts, and is upheld, as a prominent author well terms it, "in a multitude of cases." Church, Hab. Corp. § 92, and the cases there cited.

Our examination of the petition, after a long and exhaustive argument, in which the sufficiency of the allegations of the petition were not raised, or even alluded to, except as to the legal effect thereof, shows the petition defective in many particulars. The allegation that the court is without jurisdiction does not state wherein either as to the person or the subject-matter of the contempt proceedings, and in fact the whole petition is lacking in sufficiency and perspicuity of statement. In order, however, to decide the question raised in the fourth allegation of the petition, we reluctantly granted the writ, as it appears impossible to determine, from the order or mittimus attached to the petition, that the hearing was had, and we prefer to err on the side of liberty, and to "spell out" vague and indefinite allegations, and to order a hearing, in order that the whole record of the committing court may be reviewed, and that the important public questions raised in the argument of counsel may receive a careful and thorough consideration at our hands.

The answer and return of the sheriff of Laramie county avers that he has now, and since the 17th of November, 1890, has had, the petitioner in his custody under and by virtue of certain orders and process of the district court of Laramie county, certified copies of which are appended to the answer and return. These papers were submitted in evidence, and constitute the record and proceedings of said court in this matter. The record discloses that the petitioner, Isaac Bergman, was probate judge of Laramie county on the 10th day of July, A. D. 1890, when the constitution of this state went into effect; that, as such judge and court, he had actual possession of the records, papers, and proceedings of the late probate court of Laramie county on that day, and has continued in such possession since that date; that the district court of said county, claiming that, by operation of the constitution, the same were transferred in contemplation of law into the custody and possession of said court, on November 11, 1890, when Bergman was in said district court, required him, in open court, to deliver the records, papers, and proceedings of the late probate court of Laramie county to said district court, or show cause why he should not do so; that thereafter the court made an order requiring the sheriff of Laramie county to request and demand of said Bergman the said records, papers, and proceedings, finding that the same were in Bergman's possession, and requiring him to turn over the same to the sheriff; that such order was served by the sheriff, who made said request, to which Bergman made no response, and did not turn over any books, papers, records, or proceedings to the sheriff; that thereafter the district court, finding these facts, and that Bergman was still in the actual possession of the probate records, and had been since July 10, 1890, in the actual possession thereof, and had failed to turn over the same to the court, or its clerk or appointed officer, entered its order, and directed the service of a copy thereof on said Bergman, requiring him to appear on November 17, 1890, at an hour specified therein in said district court, and to there show cause why he should not be punished for his contempt of court in refusing to comply with its said order to turn over said probate records; that said rule to show cause was served on Bergman; that he appeared in person and by counsel on said 17th of November, in pursuance of the rule to show cause why he should not turn over said probate papers and records, and, being so present, did not state any cause in answer to the rule, but submitted the cause on the evidence before the court, and on the said rule; that the court determined and found that Bergman was in possession of the said records, books, and papers, and had been since the date aforesaid; that Bergman had failed and refused to deliver up the same; that, in the presence of Bergman, the court further found that it was entitled to the possession thereof, and that the same were the records of said court, and of right belonged to its custody; that the court then informed Bergman of its findings and decision, and again, in open court, requested Bergman to permit the court to take possession of said records, etc., and inquired of him whether or not he would permit the court to take possession thereof, whereto Bergman replied that he had heard the ruling of the court, and declined to make any other or further answer; that the second time, and directly thereafter, the court made the same request of Bergman, whereto Bergman made the same reply as at first; that the court then asked Bergman when he would permit the court to take possession of said records, or when he would deliver the same to the court or its officers, whereto Bergman answered that he could not say, and declined to make any further answer; that thereupon the court found Bergman willfully and contumaciously in contempt, and ordered and adjudged that he be committed to the common jail of Laramie county, until such time as he shall deliver or cause to be delivered to the court the said records, papers, and proceedings; and, further, that Bergman be in open court committed to the custody of the sheriff of said county of Laramie, to be confined in the jail thereof until he should make such delivery, or cause the same to be made. In this proceeding we cannot pass upon any of the alleged irregularities of the district court in the contempt proceedings. In this hearing, we can only consider the questions of jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and of the person of the defendant, and whether or not the judgment of the court is valid. It is unnecessary to quote authorities in support of this position, as they appear to be wholly in harmony with this view.

1. It is contended that the rule or order to show cause is a "process" of the court, and, as section 15 of article 5 of the constitution of this state provides that "the style of all process shall be 'The state of Wyoming,'" that the rule or order not being so styled was void. In the case of Wilson v. Territory, 1 Wyo. 155, the only reference in the opinion on this point is this brief sentence: "We further believe that the plaintiff in error did not waive any of his rights in these proceedings, by appearance or otherwise." But, in that case, the court below was held to be without jurisdiction, because it had issued an attachment for contempt against Wilson for the purpose of showing cause why he should not be punished for contempt, without any evidence, by affidavit or otherwise, showing that a contempt of the court had been committed. Here the committing court had an affidavit and other evidence before it, and the proceedings are not similar. In the Wilson Case, the court acquired, or attempted to acquire, jurisdiction by its attachment; but in this case the district court for Laramie county acquired jurisdiction by the personal service of its order or rule, and by the voluntary submission of Bergman, who appeared, as the record discloses, both in person and by counsel, and the question of jurisdiction was not raised, and the validity of the rule or order to show cause was not questioned. The case cited by counsel for the petitioner establishes the rule. Dix v. Palmer, 5 How. Pr. 234. Whenever the defendant appears in a civil cause, he admits himself to be regularly in court, and hence all defects in the summons and its service, and even the total omission of any summons at all, becomes immaterial. This rule in civil causes, where the process has been irregular or defective, we apprehend would apply to criminal or quasi criminal cases; and, when a defendant appears and pleads to an indictment, he would not probably be heard to complain that the bench-warrant upon which he was arrested was not styled, or did not bear teste, in the name of the sovereignty.

2. We can hear, under the allegation of want of jurisdiction, objections to the power of the court to issue the several orders to turn over the papers and records of the late probate court of Laramie county, and its authority to punish for contempt of such orders. There can be no doubt that the probate court in each county, created by the organic act and the laws of the late territory of Wyoming, was abolished by the constitution of Wyoming, and that it was divested of its jurisdiction, with which the district court of the same county was completely invested. Section 1 of article 5 of the constitution vests the judicial power of the state in the senate sitting as a court of impeachment, in a supreme court, district courts, justices of the peace, courts of arbitration, and such courts as the legislature may, by general law, establish for incorporated cities and towns. Nowhere in the constitution are probate courts recognized as separate tribunals or courts. Section 10 of article 5 confers original jurisdiction on the district courts of the state of all causes, both at law and in equity, and in all criminal cases, of all matters in probate and insolvency, and of such special cases and proceedings as are not otherwise provided for, and said courts are also given therein original jurisdiction in all cases and proceedings, in which jurisdiction shall not have been by law vested exclusively in some other courts. Section 17 of article 21 of the constitution provides that, "when this constitution shall go into effect, records and papers and proceedings of the probate court in each county, and all causes and matters of administration and other matters pending therein, shall pass into the jurisdiction and possession of the district court of the same county; and the said district court shall proceed to final decree or judgment, order, or other determination, in the said several matters and causes, as the said probate court might have done if this constitution had not been adopted." It would appear, from a reading of these sections of our supreme law, that the district courts have been made courts of boundless original jurisdiction; and it certainly is clear that such courts have, since the adoption of the constitution, been clothed with exclusive original jurisdiction in probate matters, and that the probate courts of the territory were, by the constitution, when it was warmed into being by the admission act of congress, stripped of all jurisdiction, and instantly abolished. In addition to the sections of the constitution itself, conferring, in the plainest and most unmistakable terms, exclusive original jurisdiction in probate matters upon the district courts of the state, the schedule to the constitution directly provides that these courts shall have jurisdiction of the papers, records, and proceedings of the probate courts; and not only that, but shall succeed to the jurisdiction of the probate courts, and hear, try, and determine all matters and causes which the probate court would have heard if the constitution had not been adopted. It is urged that the meaning of said section 17 is modified by, or is in conflict with, the provisions of section 19 of the same article of the constitution, which provides that "all county and precinct officers who may be in office at the time of the adoption of this constitution shall hold their respective offices for the full time for which they have been elected, and until such time as their successors may be elected and qualified, as may be provided by law, and the official bonds of all such officers shall continue in full force and effect as though this constitution had not been adopted," and that this clause should be construed in such manner as to continue the office of probate judge, who was, by the territorial law, ex officio county treasurer, until the expiration of the term of office for which he had been elected. We think that, when the constitution took effect, there was no such office as probate judge, and the clause, "who may be in office," could not apply to one whose office and court was abolished by the constitution. The constitution nowhere recognized such an office, and the jurisdiction of the probate courts was transferred by that instrument to the district courts. Even if these sections were in conflict, the familiar rule of construction must be applied, and one part of the constitution must not be allowed to defeat another, if, by any reasonable construction, the two can be made to stand together. Cooley, Const. Lim. pp. 68, 70.

The clause in section 19 of the schedule (article 21) of the constitution, "who may be in office at the time of the adoption of the constitution," must mean such officers as are permitted to hold their respective offices by the terms of the constitution, and not such as are ousted by its provisions. Any other rule of construction would defeat the plain intent and meaning of the constitution. Under the territorial statutes, although the offices of probate judge and county treasurer were combined, and the probate judge was styled ex officio county treasurer, the intent and meaning of the various statutes applicable to these offices is to consider them as two separate and distinct offices, the duties of each to be performed by one and the same person. It was so held in the case of Territory v. Ritter, 1 Wyo. 318, and the following cases were cited in the opinion of the court, to the effect that to make a person an ex officio officer, by virtue of his holding another office, does not merge the two offices into one. People v. Edwards, 9 Cal. 286; People v. Love, 25 Cal. 520; Lathrop v. Brittain, 30 Cal. 680; People v. Ross, 38 Cal. 78. The statute of 1886, found in section 1083 of the Revised Statutes, provides that the offices of probate judge and county treasurer shall appear on the ballots as one office only, and the legislative intent is clear that the two distinct and separate offices should be held by one person, and the elector could vote for but one person to hold the two offices. This statute was in force at the time of the election of the petitioner, and subsequent amendatory legislation, as found in the recent election laws, has combined the two offices as "probate judge and county treasurer." As Mr. Justice BLAIR stated in his opinion in the case of Territory v. Ritter, supra: "The correctness of this view, as to the intent of the legislature, is not lessened, but, on the contrary, greatly strengthened, by the fact that the duties of the office of probate judge, and that of county treasurer, have no connection with each other; each is clothed with different and distinct powers; each to perform separate and distinct duties,—the functions of the former being wholly judicial, the latter purely ministerial." The abolition of probate courts and the office of probate judge does not interfere, therefore, with the right of the petitioner to hold the office of county treasurer, he being in that office, which was and is separate and distinct from the office of probate judge, at the time of the adoption of the constitution, and being expressly recognized by that instrument, and not being abolished or interfered with thereby.

3. The district court being constructively in the possession of the records, papers, and proceedings of the late probate court of Laramie county, the petitioner holds them subject to the order of the court, and as a custodian thereof. He has no right to them in any other capacity. Until they are turned over to the district court, which is entitled to the jurisdiction and possession of them, his possession is but the possession of that court, and he becomes directly subject to the orders of that court, while the records remain in his possession, in regard to the same. He stands in the attitude of a custodian of the records of a court, and he must produce them when called upon. On refusal to do so, he may be punished for contempt. A court of general jurisdiction must have the inherent power to control its own records, upon which its existence depends, and which have been lodged in its jurisdiction and possession. It would be impossible for such a court to exercise its probate jurisdiction, lately exercised by its predecessor in probate matters, without access at all times to the records of the late probate court. Without actual possession thereof, the court would be thwarted at every step. It could not adjudicate upon pending cases, nor could it know judicially that such cases were in existence, or the status thereof, without a consultation of the records of the late probate court for its county. We cannot imagine a more chaotic state of affairs than the spectacle presented of a superior court, having a jurisdiction and unable to exercise it, with litigants clamoring for relief and action, and no means for affording them relief, with its records in the hands of one who refuses to surrender them, and with no power to compel, by summary proceedings, their production, or to punish the contemnor, in case of a refusal. Such a condition of affairs would be extraordinary. The rights of infant heirs, the tender care of insane and incompetent wards, would be set at naught, and no means provided to conserve an estate, to prevent its spoliation, or to protect those ever under the watchful and jealous eye of a chancellor. Unless such a court has control of its records, and power to secure actual possession when it has constructive possession thereof, by drastic measures, its jurisdiction cannot be exercised or enforced, and the very object for which it was created would be absolutely defeated by the whim or caprice of one who has actual possession of its records.

4. While mandamus may lie to reach the one withholding the records of probate matters, the court is not compelled to wait the slow motions of some litigant in its probate branch who desires relief. The court, being entitled to these records and papers, and undoubtedly competent to reduce them to its own possession, may make and enforce its orders therefor by coercive measures.

5. The statutes of this state recognize the distinction between punitive and coercive contempts. Section 2802 of the Revised Statutes provides that a witness refusing to be sworn to answer a question, or to subscribe to a deposition when lawfully ordered, may be imprisoned in the county jail, "there to remain" until he submits to be sworn, testifies, or gives his deposition. Section 121 of the crimes act (Sess. Laws 1890, p. 144) provides that "whoever, having been duly served with a subpoena or citation, duly issued, refuses or willfully fails to obey the same, or secretes himself, or leaves the place of his residence to avoid being served with a subpoena issued, or that he has reason to believe will be issued for him, in any cause pending in any court, or in any matter before any legal authority, or, being present before any court or legal authority, and called upon to give testimony, refuses to take an oath or affirmation, or, being sworn or affirmed, refuses to answer any question required by such court or authority to be answered, shall be fined not more than five hundred dollars, nor less than ten dollars, to which may be added imprisonment in the county jail not more than ninety days; but this section shall not prevent summary proceedings for contempt." This section does not apply to the enforcement of an order of the court like the one under consideration, and it strictly and expressly provides that the section shall not prevent summary proceedings for contempt. An indictment setting forth the facts in this case could not be drawn under this section. There is absolutely nothing in our statute that regulates the proceedings in contempt cases, except those quoted above. One of the methods of punishment for civil and criminal contempts, disclosed by an examination of the authorities, is imprisonment to compel compliance by a party or witness with the requirements of an order or decree of court, (Rap. Contempt, § 130;) and so in 2 Bish. Crim. Law (7th Ed.) § 271, it is said: "When the proceeding is to enforce an order or to do a particular thing, the only escape for the defendant from perpetual imprisonment is, usually, to comply." In Williamson's Case, 26 Pa. St. 9, BLACK, J., eloquently says: "Some complaint was made in the argument about the sentence being for an indefinite time. If this were erroneous, it would not avail here, since we have as little power to revise the judgment for that reason as for any other. But it is not illegal, nor contrary to the usual rule in such cases. It means commitment until the party shall make proper submission. Regina v. Paty, 2 Ld. Raym. 1108; Yates' Case, 4 Johns. 375. The law will not bargain with anybody to let its courts be defied, for a specified term of imprisonment. There are many who would gladly purchase the honors of martyrdom in a popular cause at almost any given price, while others are deterred by a mere show of punishment. Each is detained until he finds himself willing to conform. This is merciful to the submissive, and not too severe upon the refractory. The petitioner, therefore, carries the key of his prison in his own pocket. He can come out when he will, by making terms with the court that sent him there. But, if he chooses to struggle for a triumph,—if nothing will content him but a clean victory or a clean defeat,—he cannot expect us to aid him. Our duties are of a widely different kind. They consist in discouraging, as much as in us lies, all such contests with the legal authorities of the country." To the same effect is the opinion of KENT, C. J., in the Yates Case, quoted with approval in the Pennsylvania case, supra, where the question to be decided was the sufficiency of the return "that the prisoner was committed until the further order of the court." In Re Allen, 13 Blatchf. 275, it is held: "When the contempt consists of a violation of the order of court, and is a contempt not committed in its presence, and the statute does not prescribe the form of the order of commitment, the defendant may be imprisoned until he be discharged by order of the court, or until the further order of the court;" citing and accepting the doctrine laid down by KENT, C. J., in the Yates Case. In Ex parte Sweeney, (Nev.) 1 Pac. Rep. 879, although, under the statutes of Nevada, no court or judge can impose a greater fine than $500, or imprisonment for more than five days, upon any person adjudged guilty of a contempt, it was decided by the supreme court of that state that a party may be committed to jail until the fine was paid at a certain rate per day, fixed by the statute; and the court in its opinion quotes approvingly a decision in Brown v. People, 19 Ill. 614, where the court held that a justice of the peace might imprison a party in contempt, refusing to pay his fine, until the same was paid, although the statute allowed no one to be imprisoned by a justice of the peace for contempt. Judge BARTOL, of the Maryland court of appeals, (Ex parte Maulsby, 13 Md. 642,) released a petitioner on habeas corpus, where the commitment read, "until he purge the contempt by appearing before the grand jury," etc. It appearing to the judge that the grand jury had been discharged, so that it would be impossible for the contemnor to obey the court's order, although the learned judge was careful to say that the court had power to commit until the party answered or testified or produced papers before the grand jury, and that, in such case, "the commitment is a compulsory process to compel the party to obey the mandate of the court." He further stated, although he discharged the petitioner, that "the term of imprisonment fixed by the warrant is ended by the operation of law, not because the court has not the power to commit for contempt for a period extending beyond the term of court, but in this case it has not done so." There are some cases which seem to hold a contrary doctrine, notably the case of Whitem v. State, 36 Ind. 196, on appeal proceedings, where the court held the evidence insufficient to constitute a contempt of court, and in glowing terms condemned the practice of courts committing until the further order of the court. In the Case of Leach, 51 Vt. 630, from which was evidently drawn the exact language stated in the fourth allegation of illegal restraint set forth in the petition in this case, the court held that a probate court could not imprison an executor for the non-performance of orders requiring the payment of money to the widow of a decedent, when the orders were not all due, and on the ground that it made the jailer a judge to determine the length of imprisonment, and because the commitment was, in effect, an imprisonment for debt, which was abhorrent to the law of Vermont; but the judge says, in order to place his meaning beyond question: "Where a witness is contumacious, and refuses to obey the order of the probate court in giving evidence or other specific requirements, it would, no doubt, be competent, as a means of compelling obedience to the order of court, for the court to order imprisonment so long as contumacy should continue. Goff's Case, 3 Maule & S. 203. But, in such a case, the court ordering the imprisonment judges of the time when the contumacy ends; and whether it would be competent for a court to order an imprisonment, without limit on the face of the order, beyond the term of court inflicting the punishment, need not be discussed here." In Shanks' Case, 15 Abb. Pr. (N. S.) 43, the statute controlling the matter provided that imprisonment for contempt should not exceed 30 days.

6. The further objection is made that there can be no commitment for contempt, where the contemnor may be proceeded against by an indictment, and the following cases are quoted in support of this view: Baldwin v. State, 11 Ohio St. 681, and State v. Blackwell, 10 S. C. 37. These are strong cases, but we think that the court in each case relied upon the peculiar statute of the jurisdiction. We have no statute at all that would reach this case, that we have been able to discover, with the assistance of the learned counsel, that provides any punishment in cases of contempt like the one under consideration. The great weight of authority, in the absence of direct statutory provision, is in the other direction. 1 Bish. Crim. Law, § 1067, and 2 Bish. Crim. Law, § 264, and the cases there cited. The only criminal statute providing punishment for contempt, and fixing a definite penalty, is section 121 of the crimes act, quoted above, and this expressly disclaims any attempt to curtail the power of the courts in this direction; hence authorities cited where statutory provisions regulate proceedings in contempt cases can have no weight with us. The common law prevails here, and is strengthened by our statutes, which run in the same line and in the same direction.

7. It might be held that the contempt committed in the case before us was not a constructive contempt, but one committed in facie curiæ, and the following cases would seem to sustain such a view: Ex parte Robinson, (Cal.) 12 Pac. Rep. 794; Territory v. Murray, (Sup. Ct. Mont.) 15 Pac. Rep. 145; Neel v. State, 50 Amer. Dec. 209. It appears from the record that the affidavit of the clerk of the district court was filed before the rule to show cause was issued, and that in open court, and by the orders of the court served upon him, the petitioner had full knowledge of the charge against him. He appeared in the trial court in person and by counsel, submitted his case upon the evidence, says he has heard the order of the court, and declined to make any further answer. Can this be deemed anything more than a refusal to comply with the order of the court, made in his presence? And is not the retaining of the records, papers, and proceedings, after repeated requests to deliver them, and in the light of this full record, which must stand unimpeached in this case, and which speaks with no uncertain sound, a contempt committed in the presence of the court? Further speculation, however, is useless. We must, on this inquiry, hold that the record of the district court of Laramie county before us imports absolute verity, and cannot be questioned in this proceeding; that such court had jurisdiction of the person and subject-matter of the contempt proceedings before it; that it had full power and authority to make and enforce the orders it made to secure actual possession of the records, papers, and proceedings of its predecessor in probate matters, the late probate court of Laramie county; that its commitment was and is neither void nor erroneous; and that, in other words, and in the terse and expressive language of the statute, the court acted "within its legitimate province, and in a lawful manner," and we are not permitted, by that provision of the habeas corpus act, to question the correctness of its action. The record before us presents nothing to show that the district court acted arbitrarily, harsh, or insolent towards the petitioner; but, on the contrary, it breathes a spirit of courtesy, conciliation, and moderation. It made "requests" when it might have made "demands," and it is clear that it exercised coercion with extreme reluctance. We have pushed this inquiry to the very verge of our powers, recognizing the admitted high character of the petitioner. We believe that his conduct has been owing to a misconception of his rights and duties, rather than to a desire to thwart or obstruct the administration of justice. Certainly, no one can know better than he, from his admitted long service in a responsible judicial position, the imperative necessity of maintaining intact the dignity of the courts and the majesty of the law. We acknowledge ourselves indebted to the learned counsel for the petitioner, and to the gentlemen who, as amici curiæ, have aided us by their experience, knowledge, and research in this matter. The petitioner will be remanded to the custody of the sheriff of Laramie county

ADMINISTRATOR'S SALE OF LANDS — PETITION — COMMENCEMENT OF ACTION — APPEAL — TIME OF TAKING.

1. Under Comp. Laws Utah 1876, pp. 265-269, providing that lands of decedents may be sold to pay debts when the personalty is insufficient, a petition for sale which merely asks a sale "in order to settle up the business of the estate, to pay certain debts and demands due and owing by said estate," without alleging that the personalty is insufficient, does not confer jurisdiction upon the court, and an order of sale based thereon is void.

2. Under 3 Comp. Laws Utah, §§ 8155, 8308, providing that the filing of the complaint is the commencement of the action, and that summons may issue within a year, or defendants may appear within that time without summons, where no summons was issued, and defendants appeared and defended more than a year after the filing of the complaint, but did not object that no summons was issued, the action will be deemed to have been commenced from the filing of the complaint.

3. 3 Comp. Laws Utah, § 8685, provides that no exception to a decision on the ground that it is not supported by the evidence can be reviewed on appeal unless the appeal is taken within 60 days after rendition of the judgment. Held, that on appeal from an order overruling a motion for new trial, based upon the ground that the evidence did not support the judgment, the supreme court can review the sufficiency of the evidence, although the appeal was taken more than 60 days after judgment.

4. Where there is a notice of motion for new trial, and an order overruling it, but no motion appears in the record, objection that there is no such motion cannot first be raised in the supreme court.

Appeal from district court third district; T. J. ANDERSON, Justice.

Arthur Brown, for appellants. C. F. Loofbourow, for respondents.

BLACKBURN, J. This suit is brought to quiet title, and, before proceeding to decide the case, we wish to say that the abstract is so imperfect that the work of the court was vastly increased, because it was compelled to read the whole record to understand the case. Attorneys ought to take more pains in preparing their abstract. A preliminary question is, when was this suit commenced? The complaint was filed November 13, 1888; amended complaint, January 16, 1889; answer of defendants, December, 1889. No summons was issued in the case; the defendants answered voluntarily. The statute of the territory expressly provides that the filing of the complaint is the commencement of the action, (2 Comp. Laws Utah, § 8155;) that a summons may issue within a year, and the defendants may within that time appear without summons, and defend the action, (section 8203.) The defendants did appear, and defended the action without making any point by their answer, or any other way, that a summons was not issued within a year. The suit was continued on the docket as commenced. We think, therefore, the date of the commencement of this action is November 13, 1888. 2 Comp. Laws Utah, p. 237.

Another preliminary question is, what can the appellate court review in this case? The contention of the respondents is that the question as to whether the evidence justifies the judgment cannot be reviewed because the appeal was not taken within 60 days from the rendition of the judgment. The appeal was not taken within 60 days from the rendition of the judgment; but the appeal was taken both from the judgment and from the order overruling the motion for a new trial, and only a few days from the date of the order. The notice of motion for a new trial states that the motion is made upon the ground, inter alia, that the evidence does not support the judgment. We think the appellate court can review anything the court below might rightfully pass upon, on the hearing of a motion for a new trial, in an appeal from the order overruling the motion. Therefore we think the whole case is subject to review by this court. McLaughlin v. Doherty, 54 Cal. 519, 520; 2 Comp. Laws Utah, § 3635.

The defendants contend that the appeal from the order overruling the motion for a new trial cannot be considered, because there is no such motion in the record. There is a notice of such motion and such an order, and it is too late to take advantage of the want of the formal motion for the first time in this court, and the practice in this territory is to allow the notice of the motion for a new trial to take the place of the formal motion.

This suit is brought to quiet title to the quarter section of land described in the complaint, by the heirs of Jonathan Needham, deceased. The defendants filed an answer denying the allegations of the complaint, and a cross-complaint alleging they are the owners of a portion of the land of said quarter section, and deraign their title through a deed from the administrators of the estate of said decedent to the city of Salt Lake. They also set up adverse possession for more than seven years. The decedent settled upon the land, and made final proof and paid for the land in his life-time, and after his death a patent for the land was issued to him. This gives the heirs a title in fee, unless the title passed out of them by the sale and deed made by the administrators; but plaintiffs claim that the proceedings in the probate court in the applications of one of the administrators are absolutely void. The first question is, is this contention by the appellants well taken? These proceedings were had in 1875, under the law as it then existed. It provided that the lands of decedents may be sold to pay debts and claims against the estate when the personal property is not sufficient to pay the same, but it did not provide the mode of procedure; it only gave the probate court jurisdiction to order the sale of the land on the application of the administrators. Comp. Laws Utah 1876, pp. 265-269. In this case application was made to the probate court, by only one of the administrators, (there being two,) on August 23, 1875; the order of sale, August 27, 1875; sale, August 28, 1875; and confirmation of sale, September 3, 1875. No notice of the application or of the sale or of the confirmation was given. The statute does not provide that any notice of these proceedings shall be given, but is silent on the subject. The contention of the appellants is that these probate proceedings are coram non jure, and void for want of notice. In the view we take of this case, it is not necessary to pass upon that question. But it seems to us, when a special proceeding is provided for by statute, and the manner of performing it is not specified, it ought to be according to the course of the common law, and the rule at common law is that every person interested in any adjudication shall have an opportunity to be heard, and to have notice so that he may be heard. Yet many authorities hold that in the class of cases under discussion notice to heirs is not necessary. On that question we pass no opinion. Another contention of the appellants is, the petition to the probate court to have this land sold did not state facts sufficient to give the court jurisdiction of the subject-matter. We think this contention is well taken. Two prerequisites to authorize the probate court to order the administrators to sell the lands of decedents are: (1) There must be debts or charges against the estate unpaid; and (2) that the personal property of the decedent is insufficient to pay these debts and charges. "The rule is that a statutory remedy or proceeding is confined to the very case provided for and extends to no other. A party seeking the benefit of such a statute must bring himself strictly within not only the spirit, but also its letter. He can take nothing by intendment." Suth. St. Const. § 234 et seq. The meaning of this is that this statute under discussion is stricti juris, and must be strictly followed. The petition in this case does not allege that there exist debts or charges against the state unpaid; nor does it allege that there is no personal property to pay such debts or charges, if any existed. The logical conclusion, therefore, is, and from which there is no escape, that the court had nothing before it to give it jurisdiction. We think this view is supported by all the authorities. Gregory v. McPherson, 13 Cal. 577; In re Spriggs' Estate, 20 Cal. 125. In the case of Grignon v. Astor, 2 How. 319, cited by respondents, the court, through BALDWIN, J., says: "No other requisites are necessary to the jurisdiction of the county court than the death of Grignon, the insufficiency of his personal estate to pay his debts, and a representation thereof to the county court where he dwelt or his real estate was situated, and making these facts appear to the court." In this case these jurisdictional facts were not made to appear to the court. Therefore it had no jurisdiction to act in the premises. Ror. Jud. Sales, says, (section 317:) "When jurisdiction has fully attached by petition," etc.,—making it clear that the court has jurisdiction only by petition, and the facts justifying the sale are jurisdictional, and must appear by petition. In Comstock v. Crawford, 3 Wall. 405, the court says, through FIELD, J.: "As thus seen, the representation of the insufficiency of the personal property of the deceased to pay his just debts was the only act required to call into exercise the power [the jurisdiction] of the court,—clearly showing that the representation of that fact was necessary to authorize the court to take jurisdiction of the case."

In the petition in the probate court under discussion there is no allegation, nor any pretense of an allegation, that the personal property of Needham, deceased, was insufficient to pay the debts due from said estate, and legal charges against it; nor is there any allegation of any debts or charges against the estate. There is a recital as follows: "This petition respectfully represents that in order to settle up the business of the estate of said deceased, to pay certain debts and demands due and owing by said estate," etc. It requires quite a stretch of the imagination to say that that statement is an allegation that legal debts and legal charges exist unpaid against the estate. Again, the order of sale shows affirmatively that the real estate was not sold to pay debts and charges against the estate; but only that "it will be for the best interest of the said estate and the heirs of the said deceased to sell the land described in said petition." This shows clearly that the question of indebtedness and charges against the estate, and that the personal property was insufficient to discharge the same,—the only fact he had jurisdiction to act upon,—was not taken into account by him. These proceedings therefore are coram non jure, and absolutely void. The deed from the administrators of Needham's estate passed no title to Salt Lake City, the grantee, and, that deed being in the chain of title through which these respondents claim, they had notice of its invalidity, and are not innocent purchasers without notice, and can take nothing by it.

Another contention of respondents is that they and their grantors have had adverse possession of the said lots 4, 5, and 6,—the portion of said quarter they claim to own,—for more than seven years prior to the commencement of the suit. The court below found that fact for the respondents, but surely on the ground that this suit was not commenced November 13, 1888, for we do not think the evidence supports that view if the case was commenced at that time. We have already said in this opinion that the filing of the complaint in this case—November 13, 1888—was the commencement of this suit; the effect of which is that adverse possession, in order to avail the defendants, must be for more than seven years prior to that date. The evidence on that subject is that the city, the grantee of the administrators, took no possession, only to lay off a portion of the land into lots and blocks, and it does not appear when they did that. The son of Henry Arnold, the grantee of the city, testifies his father bought these lots in the spring of 1881; that his father took possession of these lots about six months after he bought them; but specifies the possession he took as follows: "Some time in the fall of 1881 he plowed lot four, and in the spring of 1882 he again plowed lot four, and fenced in the lots, and sowed them in grass seed; and that he continued in actual occupancy of these lots until he sold them to the respondents in 1888." This is the substance of all the evidence in reference to the possession of these lots or any of them. The presumption of law is, and it is so provided by the statute of this territory, that the parties having the legal title to land are in possession, until the evidence shows a preponderance that it is held adversely to the owner. It is also a rule of law that the party alleging adverse possession must prove it. 2 Comp. Laws Utah 1888, pp. 221-229. It is clear, therefore, if suit was commenced 13th November, 1888, from the evidence that there has not been adverse possession of lots 5 or 6 by these respondents and their grantees for seven years prior to the commencement of this suit, and as to these lots they can take nothing by virtue of their adverse possession. As to lot 4 the case is different. The plowing of it in the fall of 1881 was taking adverse possession, and, if that plowing was done before November 13, 1881, the respondents are entitled to maintain their right to it by their claim of adverse possession. But it is wholly uncertain from the testimony whether the plowing done on that lot was before or after the 13th of November, 1881, and upon that question we will not pass, as in another trial of this case the parties may be able to make it appear whether the plowing was done before or after November 13th. On the whole record, therefore, we think the judgment ought to be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion. Judgment reversed.

RAILROAD LAND GRANTS—EJECTMENT—EVIDENCE.

Act Cong. July 1, 1862, and July 2, 1864, (12 U. S. St. at Large, p. 489, and 13 U. S. St. at Large, p. 356,) grant to the Central Pacific Railroad Company all odd-numbered sections of land for 10 miles on each side of its right of way except those sold by the United States, or to which a pre-emption or homestead right had attached at the time of the location of the road, and further declares that the company shall within two years designate the route of its road, and file a map thereof with the department of the interior. Held that, in ejectment by one deriving title from the railroad company for lands thus granted to which no patent has been issued, where defendant is in actual possession, plaintiff must prove compliance with the requirements of the act, and that the land in controversy is not within its exceptions.

Appeal from district court, first district;
H. P. HENDERSON, Justice.

Bennett, Marshall & Bradley, for appellant. Thomas Maloney, for respondent.

ANDERSON, J. This is an action by the plaintiff to recover possession of the following described real estate situated in Box Elder county, to-wit: Section 5, township 11 N., of range 3 W.; sections 17, 19, 21, and 29, in township 12 N., of range 3 W.; the W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 33, and the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 15, in township 12 N., of range 3 W., Salt Lake meridian. The complaint alleges that plaintiff was, on the 8th day of June, 1883, the owner, and in possession, and entitled to the possession of said real estate, and that on said day the defendant unlawfully and wrongfully took possession of the whole thereof, and has ever since unlawfully withheld the possession of the same from the plaintiff. The plaintiff alleges that it has been damaged by the withholding of the possession of said real estate by defendant in the sum of \$5,000, and that the value of the rents and profits thereof is \$1,000. The plaintiff prays judgment for the possession of the land in question, for \$5,000 damages, and for \$1,000 for rents and profits. The defendant, by his answer, denied all of the allegations of the plaintiff's complaint, except that of possession by defendant of the premises in controversy, and pleaded that he and those under whom he claimed had held adverse possession of the land for more than 15 years next preceding the commencement of the action. As a further answer, and by way of cross-complaint, the defendant alleged that in April, 1878, one E. A. Stahn went upon the premises in controversy, and made valuable improvements thereon, under a contract with the Central Pacific Railroad Company for the purchase thereof, and that Stahn afterwards sold his improvements to the defendant, and that plaintiff obtained its title from said railroad company, with notice of and subject to defendant's right, and prayed for a specific performance of this contract against plaintiff, or that he have judgment for the value of his improvements. The cross-complaint was afterwards, and before trial, dismissed by defendant, and no evidence was offered in its support. The cause was tried before a jury, and there was a verdict and judgment for defendant, and the plaintiff brings this appeal.

The plaintiff's proof of title consisted of an article of agreement between it and the Central Pacific Railroad Company, dated June 6, 1883, whereby the railroad company agreed to sell and convey to plaintiff the lands in controversy, together with a large amount of other lands, upon certain terms as to price, time of payment, etc.; and upon compliance by plaintiff with the terms of the sale the railroad company was to convey all the lands described in the agreement, to which it had acquired or might acquire title from the United States. The contract by its terms provided that plaintiff should have possession and right of possession of the lands agreed to be sold. The plaintiff also showed the organization of the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California, and its consolidation with the Western Pacific Railroad Company on the 22d day of June, 1870, under the name of the Central Pacific Railroad Company; also the amalgamation or consolidation of the Central Pacific Railroad Company with the California & Oregon Railroad Company, the San Francisco, Oakland & Alameda Company, and the San Joaquin Valley Railroad Company, on the 20th day of August, 1870. Plaintiff also offered in evidence an order from the commissioner of the general land-office dated October 16, 1873, together with a map of the line of the Central Pacific Railroad Company, as definitely located, withdrawing the lands in controversy from entry, the same being within the 20-mile limit of the Central Pacific Railroad Company. The lands in controversy are odd-numbered sections and parts of odd-numbered sections, and it was not disputed at the trial in the court below, nor was it in the argument in this court, that the land lies within the 20-mile limit of the line of the Central Pacific Railroad as it was constructed and is now operated. It was not shown by the plaintiff that any patent for these lands had ever been issued by the United States to the Central Pacific Railroad Company nor to the plaintiff. It was not shown that the lands were not such as were included in the reservations and exceptions contained in the act of congress of July 1, 1862, and the various acts amendatory thereof, granting each odd-numbered section within 20 miles of the line of said road, as definitely located, to the Central Pacific Railroad Company, nor was it shown when the map showing the definite location of said railroad was filed in the office of the secretary of the interior, nor when the railroad was completed. The court instructed the jury that "the plaintiff has undertaken to show here that it has derived title from the government to the land, but as a matter of law, gentlemen, I charge you that the plaintiff has failed in that. The proof which he has submitted here of the ownership of these lands on the part of the Central Pacific Railroad Company by grants of congress is defective,—so defective that it does not show title whatever. The acts of congress that have been put in here were taken from the consideration of the jury, it being my opinion that certain requisites have not been shown,—certain things have not been shown as complying with that statute in order to perfect the title under the grants of congress. What they are, it is unnecessary for me here to state." This instruction was excepted to, and constitutes the principal assignment of error, as it substantially took the case away from the jury, and virtually instructed them to return a verdict for the defendant.

The evidence shows the defendant was in the peaceable possession of the lands in controversy at and before the commencement of this action, and hence, unless the plaintiff could show that it owned the premises, the defendant had the right, as against the plaintiff, to remain in possession. The plaintiff claimed to derive its title through the Central Pacific Railroad Company by its contract of purchase with said company. Without stopping to inquire whether this action, which is substantially the same as ejectment at common law, could be maintained upon a contract of purchase where the legal title had not yet vested in the plaintiff, we proceed to inquire whether the party from which it had a contract of purchase had title to the lands in controversy, for the plaintiff could have no greater or better title than the party from which it claimed to have purchased. The evidence failed to show a patent from the government to any one. The plaintiff relied upon the act of congress of July 1, 1862, (12 U. S. St. at Large, p. 489,) and the act of July 2, 1864, (13 U. S. St. at Large, p. 356,) amendatory thereof, to establish the grant of these lands to the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California, and through the several consolidations of that company with other companies to the Central Pacific Railroad Company, through and under which it claimed title. If all the odd-numbered sections within 20 miles of the line of the Central Pacific Railroad as constructed and operated had been granted to it by the acts of congress referred to, it would have included the lands in controversy, and the evidence would have been sufficient upon proving the railroad company had complied with the requirements of the statute. But by the terms of the act of July 1, 1862, certain portions of such sections were excepted and reserved from the operation of the grant. Section 3 of the first-mentioned act contains the following language, to-wit: "That there be and is hereby granted to the said company * * * every alternate section of public land designated by odd numbers to the amount of five alternate sections per mile [changed to 10 by section 4, Act 1864] on each side of said railroad on the line thereof, and within ten [changed to 20, section 4, Act 1864] miles on each side of said road, not sold, reserved, or otherwise disposed of by the United States, and to which a pre-emption or homestead claim may not have been attached at the time the line of said railroad is definitely fixed: provided, that all mineral lands shall be excepted from the operation of this act. * * * And all such lands so granted by this section which shall not be sold or disposed of by said company within three years after the entire road shall have been completed shall be subject to settlement and pre-emption, like other land, at a price not exceeding one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, to be paid to said company." The act further provided that the railroad company should within two years after the passage of the act designate the route of its road as near as may be, and file a map of the same with the department of the interior. It will thus be seen that congress did not grant the whole of each odd-numbered section within the prescribed limits, but only such odd-numbered sections or parts of sections as were not mineral, and as had not been sold, reserved, or otherwise disposed of, or were not within any government reservation, or to which a pre-emption or homestead claim had not attached. Now, it is obvious that if the lands in dispute were included in any of the exceptions or reservations mentioned in these statutes, they did not pass by the grant, and never became the property of the railroad company nor of plaintiff. In the case of McGrath v. Taillent, 26 Pac. Rep. 574, (decided at the April session, 1891,) this court held that in an action of ejectment by one holding by deed from the Union Pacific Railroad Company of lands granted to it by the acts of congress referred to, and where no patent had been issued, that it was necessary for the plaintiff to prove a compliance with the statute by the railroad company, and that the lands in dispute were not included in any of the reservations or exceptions mentioned in the statutes, in order to maintain the action. See, also, Tarpey v. Salt Co., 5 Utah, 494, 17 Pac. Rep. 631. In this case, no evidence having been offered that the railroad ever obtained a patent for the lands in dispute, nor that it filed its map showing its line as definitely located within the time provided by the law, nor any proof as to the time when said railroad was completed, nor that the lands were not within any of the exceptions or reservations provided in the statute, we think plaintiff failed to show its title, and that there was no error in the instruction given by the court to the jury.

The trial court submitted to the jury the issue of the statute of limitations raised in defendant's answer, and this is assigned as error, upon the ground that there was no evidence tending to support this issue. We have examined the evidence contained in the record, and, while it does not purport to contain all the evidence in the case, yet from the evidence set out in the printed transcript we think no error was committed in this respect, and the judgment of the district court is affirmed.

ECCLES et al. v. UNION PAC. RY. CO.

RELEASE OF CLAIM—MISTAKE—EVIDENCE.

Plaintiff, having been injured in a railroad accident, signed a release 11 days after of all claims now sued for. Nineteen days later she was prematurely confined. She claimed that she thought she was only releasing claims for injuries to another child and for her husband's loss of time. It appears that the release was read to her before signing, and that she hesitated about settling, fearing a miscarriage, but signed under the advice of her husband and his father. No fact as to her condition was misstated by defendant, nor was any fraud practiced upon her. Held, that a verdict for plaintiff was unsupported by the evidence.

Appeal from district court, first district; JAMES A. MINER, Justice.

P. L. Williams and Waldemar Van Cott, for appellant. C. B. Pach and T. D. Johnson, for respondents.

ANDERSON, J. The plaintiffs and their infant son, Stewart Eccles, were passengers on a train on the defendant's road, and were injured by an accident to the train on the 30th day of January, 1890, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant, and this action is to recover damages for the injuries sustained. The defendant pleaded a settlement and release, and this was the defense relied on at the trial in the court below. Plaintiffs obtained a verdict and judgment, and the defendant brings this appeal.

The ground relied on for reversal is that the verdict of the jury is not supported by the evidence. At the time of the accident, Jeannette Eccles, who is the wife of her co-plaintiff, Samuel H. Eccles, was advanced about seven months in pregnancy. The settlement was made and the release executed on the 11th day of February, 1890, and on the 1st day of March following Jeannette Eccles gave premature birth to an eight-months child. Plaintiffs claim that they settled with the defendant under a mistaken belief, induced by the statement of Dr. Perkins, a physician in the employ of the defendant, as to the extent of the injuries to Jeannette Eccles; that she feared a miscarriage, and was not willing to settle, until it should be known there was no danger of such a result, but that, upon the assurance of Dr. Perkins that there was no danger of that kind to be apprehended, she was induced to settle, and that she did not understand the release to include her entire claim for damages in case her injuries should cause her to give premature birth to her child. The release by its terms includes all claims and demands of the plaintiffs for the injuries sued for in this action, and there is no claim of fraud in procuring its execution by plaintiff, but it is sought to be avoided, on the ground of mistake, as to the extent of the injuries to Jeannette Eccles at the time of its execution. There is no dispute in the evidence as to the material facts, and the sole question for our determination is whether the verdict is supported by the evidence. The accident occurred between Aspen, Wyo., and Ogden, Utah, on the evening of January 30, 1890, and the train reached Ogden about 4 o'clock A. M. of January 31st. Jeannette Eccles testified that she saw Dr. Perkins, the defendant's physician, when she arrived at Ogden, and that he told her to "go home and lay still," and that he would call later in the day; that about noon he called, and found her sitting up, when he said, "Oh, I see there is nothing wrong with you at all; if there had been anything wrong with you, it would have happened before this; if you were hurt, your child would have been born at once, or else to-day;" that about 20 hours had intervened from the time of the accident until the doctor called, and that she never saw him afterwards. One E. J. Fisher was the claim agent of the defendant company, with whom the settlement was made. The plaintiff Jeannette Eccles testified as follows: "My husband went to see Mr. Fisher to settle. Mr. Fisher sent for him. My husband went three or four times to see Mr. Fisher, and when he returned home he told me about it. I told my husband I thought he had better wait awhile, and see how I got along before he settled. The night before I signed the release my husband told me about the definite agreement he had made with Mr. Fisher regarding the settlement. I heard about the definite agreement going to be made before that, and the next day Mr. Fisher came with the release. My father-in-law, William Eccles, my husband, my mother-in-law, Mrs. Sarah Eccles, and a young man by the name of Wall, were in the room besides myself. * * * When Mr. Fisher came in he said he had come to settle with us, and wanted to know what I thought about it. I told him I didn't want to settle; that I had rather wait to see how I got long. And he said: 'I am satisfied you are all right, by Dr. Perkins' statement. He is a well-learned man, and he would not say there was not anything wrong with you, if there was, and you might as well sign the release, for you won't get any more. You are all right, and you might as well sign it, and have it done with.' I insisted on waiting, but he said that Dr. Perkins said there was nothing wrong with me, or it would have happened before. I do not think of much else that was said while he was there." She further testified that she "did not read the release, but it was read aloud by Mr. Fisher;" that she listened to it as much as she could, but was suffering with nervous headache at the time; that the night before she signed the release her husband had told her the amount he had settled for, and that the persons who insisted on her signing the release were her husband and her father-in-law; and that the relations between herself and husband were pleasant. She also testified that Dr. Allen, a regular practicing physician of Ogden, had attended her from the time of the injury until the release was signed, and had made an examination of her person to see how seriously she was injured, and that he visited her the day before she signed the release; and that her mother-in-law, who was the mother of a large family, and experienced in nursing, was her nurse. She further testified that she thought she was settling only for the injury to her child, Stewart, and for her husband's loss of time. Samuel H. Eccles, the husband and one of the plaintiffs, testified that, when Fisher came to his house to settle, he signed; but that his wife declined to sign the release, and said she "didn't know what might happen yet, and she would sooner wait a while;" that Fisher was there about an hour, and that Fisher and he and his father told her she might as well sign. He also testified that Fisher read the release aloud before any one signed; that he "understood the agreement before signing it, just as it is;" that he did nothing more than advise his wife to sign the release, and that no one did more than that, and that his father also advised her to sign it.

We think the foregoing testimony of the plaintiffs, together with more of a similar character, clearly establishes that, in making the settlement and executing the release, the possibility that Mrs. Eccles might give premature birth to her child was taken into the account, and was understood by both parties to be covered by the release. Dr. Perkins' statement, made in less than 24 hours after the injury, could not have been understood by her, 11 days after the accident, as the statement of an absolute fact on which she should rely in settling, but merely as the expression of an opinion as to the probable results of her injuries. Besides that, she had a physician of her own in constant attendance, with whom she could, and doubtless did, consult as to the probable effect of her injuries. No fraud is claimed to have been practiced by the defendant in making the settlement. The husband, who executed the release at the same time, understood the release according to its terms, and advised Mrs. Eccles, as did the other members of the family, to sign it. It does not appear that any element of damages was omitted from consideration, nor that any fact was misstated by defendant in order to procure her signature, nor that any fact was misunderstood by her, or that undue influence was exercised to induce her to settle. She was advised, through her husband, before she talked with Fisher, of the state of the negotiations for settlements and of the amount and of the terms of settlement; but hesitated about settling for the sole reason that, notwithstanding Dr. Perkins' statement as to the probabilities of a miscarriage, she feared such a result might happen; but, notwithstanding such doubts, she settled, and signed the release, and we think she is bound by it, and the verdict of the jury was wholly wanting in evidence to support it. The cause is therefore reversed and remanded, and a new trial ordered.

JONES v. MOMMOTT.

EJECTMENT—SUFFICIENCY OF COMPLAINT.

Comp. Laws Utah 1888, §§ 3126, 3219, provide but one form of civil action, and that the complaint must contain a statement of the facts constituting a cause of action in ordinary and concise language. Section 3133 provides, in actions to recover real property, the right of possession is presumed to accompany ownership, and the possession is presumed subordinate to the legal title. Held, that a complaint in ejectment, alleging that "plaintiff is, and at all times therein mentioned was, the owner of, and seised in fee of, * * * and that the defendant is in possession thereof, and unlawfully withholds the same from the plaintiff, to her damage," is sufficient.

Appeal from district court, first district; BLACKBURN, Justice.

MINER, J. The complaint in this case was filed August 19, 1890, and alleges "that the plaintiff is, and at all times therein mentioned was, the owner of and seised in fee of lot 4, block 7, plat K, Payson City survey of building lots in Utah county, Utah territory, etc.; that the defendant is in possession thereof, and unlawfully withholds the same from the plaintiff, to her damage in seventy-five dollars," etc. The defendant denied each allegation in the complaint. The case proceeded to a trial before a jury, whereupon the defendant's attorney interposed an objection to any evidence whatever being introduced under the complaint, on the ground that the allegations in the complaint were insufficient to admit of any evidence being introduced thereunder; the defendant contending that plaintiff must allege in her complaint that, at some time prior to the commencement of the action, the plaintiff was the owner of the premises, and either in possession of, or entitled to the possession of, said premises; and that the defendant either wrongfully entered into said possession, and ousted plaintiff, and still holds said possession wrongfully, or that the defendant entered into the possession of the premises lawfully, but now holds the possession wrongfully; and claim that this position is sustained in Payne v. Treadwell, 5 Cal. 310; Gladwin v. Stebbins, 2 Cal. 105. The court sustained the objection, and gave plaintiff permission to amend his complaint, which he declined to do; and thereupon, on motion of defendant's attorney, the court directed a verdict for the defendant. To this ruling, decision, and judgment thereon the plaintiff alleges error. In this territory, "there is but one form of civil action for the enforcement or protection of private rights, and the redress or prevention of private wrongs." Comp. Laws 1888, § 3126. And in such actions the complaint must contain "a statement of the facts constituting the cause of action in ordinary and concise language." Id. § 3219. Consequently all technical allegations and fictions peculiar to the old form of an action of ejectment are unnecessary. The ultimate facts, as they exist, should be alleged in ordinary and concise language; and only such facts need be alleged as are necessary to be proved, except to negative a positive performance of the obligation on which the action is based, or to negative an inference from an act which is in itself indifferent and connected therewith. While possession does not always accompany the legal title, (Id. § 2621,) yet, in actions to recover real property, the right of possession in this territory is presumed to accompany the ownership within the time required by law, and the possession is presumed subordinate to the legal title. Id. § 3133. It is sufficient, therefore, in a complaint in ejectment, for the plaintiff to aver, in respect to the title, that, at the time of the commencement of the action, he was the owner of and seised in fee or for life, or for years, according to the fact, of the premises described in the complaint, and the right to the possession follows as a conclusion of law from the seisin, and need not be specifically alleged; and it should further appear from the complaint that the defendant is in possession of the premises claimed by the plaintiff, and withholds the possession thereof from the plaintiff, and, if the defendant's holding rests upon an existing right, he should show such right affirmatively in his defense. The withholding of the possession from one who is seised of the premises is presumably adverse to his rights, and therefore wrongful and unlawful, and it is because of the presumption that the plaintiff can rest his case at the trial, in the first instance, upon proof of seisin, and the possession by the defendant. "When these facts are established in an action of ejectment, the law implies a right of present possession in the plaintiff, and a holding adverse to that right in the defendant." In a case where the plaintiff has been in possession of premises which he seeks to recover by action, against one who has ousted him therefrom, it is then sufficient for him to allege such possession, and the entry, ouster, and continual withholding by the defendant. Such allegations are proper where they can be truthfully made, and agree with the facts of the case, but they are not essential or necessary, under our practice. This doctrine is sustained by the courts of New York and California. Ensign v. Sherman, 14 How. Pr. 439; Walter v. Lockwood, 23 Barb. 228; Sanders v. Leavy, 16 How. Pr. 306; Payne v. Treadwell, 16 Cal. 242-244. The doctrine of this last case, opinion by FIELD, C. J., is approved by a large list of California decisions, among others the following: McCarthy v. Yale, 39 Cal. 586; Haight v. Green, 19 Cal. 117; Ferrer v. Insurance Co., 47 Cal. 431; Keller v. Ruiz de Ocana, 48 Cal. 638; Brown v. Kentfield, 50 Cal. 132; Kidder v. Stevens, 60 Cal. 422; Rego v. Van Pelt, 65 Cal. 256, 8 Pac. Rep. 867; and expressly overrules Gladwin v. Stebbins, 2 Cal. 105; Payne v. Treadwell, 5 Cal. 310; Gregory v. Haynes, 13 Cal. 592,—cited and relied upon by the defendant. It follows, from the views herein expressed, that the complaint in this case was sufficient, and plaintiff should be allowed to introduce his proof under it. The verdict and judgment of the court below is set aside, and a new trial ordered, with costs to abide the result.

JOHNSON v. RIO GRANDE W. RY. CO.

RAILROAD COMPANIES—KILLING STOCK—NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE.

1. In an action against a railroad company for killing a mare it appeared that there was no fence between plaintiff's pasture and the track; that the mare had crossed the track to feed, and was surrounded by a fence on the west, a cattle-guard on the south, and the track on the east between it and the pasture, when the train came along at an unusual speed. The mare was struck while attempting to recross the track. No whistle was blown, nor bell rung, nor speed slackened. The engineer could have seen her for over a mile. The engineer testified that he did not slacken speed, nor blow his whistle, until he got within 250 feet, although he saw her when over a quarter of a mile from the place of accident. Held, that the question of defendant's negligence was for the jury.

2. Where the value of the mare was not disputed, and plaintiff and another witness testified that she was worth $150, a verdict in that sum was warranted, although plaintiff gave as a reason for his valuation that he had been offered that sum for her.

3. The testimony of two witnesses as to whether the engineer could have done anything else to avoid the disaster, where the engineer testified that he did all he could to stop the train, is inadmissible.

Appeal from district court, first district; J. W. BLACKBURN, Justice.

Bennett, Marshall & Bradley, for appellant. Thurman & King, for respondent.

MINER, J. This action was brought to recover damages on account of the killing of a mare belonging to the plaintiff, July 6, 1889, by a train of cars on the railroad of the defendant, the mare being at the time on the railroad track of the defendant, which adjoined the pasture of the plaintiff, there being no fence between the pasture and the defendant's right of way. At the time of the killing of the mare, she, with other horses, had crossed from the pasture to the opposite side of the track, and was there feeding between the track and a wire fence, a little to the west, and a cattle-guard being a short distance to the south of them, when the south-bound train of defendant came along. The track was straight for a mile each way from the place, and the train, being late, was being run at from 30 to 35 miles an hour,—a higher rate of speed than usual. No attempt was made to stop the train or to slacken speed. As the train neared the place where the horses stood near the track, the horses started across the track when the train was 100 yards away, and the mare in question, being the hindmost one, was caught by the train and killed; the case of the plaintiff being that she was killed by the negligence of the defendant's servants engaged in running the train. It is alleged as error that the evidence fails to show that the defendant was guilty of negligence. The evidence on this subject was conflicting. It was shown on the part of plaintiff that the mare was knocked 32 steps when hit by the cars, and that no whistle was blown, nor bell rung, and that the horses were close to the track, and that the engineer could have seen them for a mile or two miles before reaching them, and that the unusual speed of the train was not slackened until after the mare was struck, and that the horses were surrounded by a fence on the west, a cattle-guard on the south, and the track on the east. The engineer himself testified that he did not slacken speed nor blow his whistle until he got within 250 feet of them, although he saw them 1,500 or 2,000 feet,—something more than a quarter of a mile,—before reaching them. We think there was sufficient evidence to go to the jury on the question of defendant's negligence.

There was some proof in the case on both sides concerning the plaintiff's negligence, but the jury have by their verdict found this issue against the defendant, and we cannot say that their finding of fact in this respect was not sustained by the evidence, and the motion for a non-suit was properly denied.

We think the evidence of the plaintiff and of the witness Clinger that the mare was worth $150 sufficient to warrant the verdict of the jury in that respect. The value was not disputed, and Clinger was shown to be the owner of horses. Even if plaintiff's evidence on that subject was stricken out, there remained enough to enable the jury to ascertain the value. That the plaintiff gave a fallacious reason for his opinion as to the value does not render his judgment as to value wholly worthless. It may still stand for what it is worth; and, no evidence of value being produced by the defendant, there was no injury done to defendant by allowing his answer that he got at the value because he had been offered that for the mare, and refused it, to stand. It is not necessary to be an expert horse dealer to have some judgment as to the value of a horse.

The questions put to the witnesses Ryan and Stapleton as to whether the engineer could have done anything else to avoid the disaster was correctly excluded. That question was for the jury to determine on consideration of all the facts. Besides, the record shows that the witness was allowed to state that he did all he could to slow the train after he saw the horses crossing the track. We think the case was fairly submitted to the jury on the questions of law involved. Some omissions from and expressions in the charge excepted to, if taken separately from the balance of the charge, might perhaps be open to some criticisms, but we are satisfied that the entire charge, taken together, fairly submitted the case to the jury, and that such of the defendant's requests as it was entitled to were fairly covered by the instructions given. We find no error in the record sufficiently prejudicial to the defendant to justify the granting of a new trial, and the judgment is affirmed, with costs.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—TAXATION—FARM LANDS.

A city had done some work on a street as far out as a certain farm, which was inside the corporate limits, and about a mile from the platted portion of the city, and had removed nuisances therefrom, and police protection had been afforded in the immediate vicinity on sundry occasions. Held, that the farm was within the range of municipal improvements and benefits, and subject to taxation.

Appeal from district court, first district; J. W. BLACKBURN, Justice.

Action by Martha Cook against M. E. Crandall and another to recover the value of a wagon seized for taxes. Plaintiff appeals.

Sutherland & Judd, for appellant. Thurman & King, for respondents.

ZANE, C. J. The appellant brought this action to recover the value of a wagon seized by the defendant Crandall, as collector of Springville, to pay taxes alleged to be duly assessed and due that municipality. The plaintiff insisted that her farm upon which the taxes were assessed is situated outside of the town as indicated by its improvements, and beyond the range of its municipal benefits, and that the tax for which the seizure was made was for that reason unauthorized. The case was submitted to a jury, who returned a verdict against the defendants for $100, which the court set aside upon motion. To this order the plaintiff excepted, and appealed to this court. The facts of the case are that the plaintiff was the owner of a farm consisting of 56 acres, within the corporate limits of Springville, and situated about one mile south of the platted portion of the town; that there are streets south of these platted lands, one of which extends to plaintiff's farm, and bounds it on the north and east; that some work has been done on this street as far south as plaintiff's premises; that about 75 families reside on lots and small farms outside of this platted ground on the side plaintiff's place is situated; that a portion of them are between it and the platted part; that the marshal of Springville some times goes out as far as plaintiff's premises to drive stock from the streets, and at other times to remove dead animals; that the police of Springville have attended public gatherings near plaintiff's place, and made arrests for disorderly conduct. From this evidence we must infer that plaintiff's premises, and persons on them and in that vicinity, receive some of the benefits of the expenditures of the money arising from municipal taxes; that the plaintiff's premises are within the range of the municipal benefits of Springville. In the case of Territory v. Daniels, (Utah,) 22 Pac. Rep. 159, this court said: "Upon principle and authority, we are of the opinion: First, that municipal taxation should be limited to the range of municipal benefits; second, that lands and their occupants, without the range of municipal benefits, should not be taxed to aid those within; third, that a law authorizing the assessment of taxes for municipal purposes, upon lands or their occupants located beyond the range of municipal benefits, is not a rightful subject of legislation; fourth, that taxation for city purposes should be within the bounds indicated by its buildings, or its streets and alleys, or other public improvements, and contiguous or adjacent districts so situated, as to authorize a reasonable expectation that they will be benefited by the improvements of the city, or protected by its police; that no outside district should be included when it is apparent and palpable that the benefits of the city to it will only be such as will be received by other districts not included, such as will be common to all neighboring communities." The case in hand is not within the rules as above laid down. We are of the opinion that the plaintiff's property was subject to the municipal tax, and that the seizure complained of was legal. The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

QUO WARRANTO—TITLE TO OFFICE—JOINDER OF PARTIES.

Comp. Laws Utah 1888, § 8534, provides that when several persons claim to be entitled to the same office one action may be brought against all such persons in order to try their respective rights thereto. Section 1761 provides that in cities of the first class three councilmen shall be elected from each ward at the same time, and their terms of office shall commence and end at the same time. Held, that three councilmen so elected may properly join in an action against three persons who have usurped their offices.

Appeal from district court, third district; C. S. ZANE, Chief Justice.

P. L. Williams, for appellants. Le Grand Young and F. S. Richards, for relators.

MINER, J. The people of the territory of Utah, by Walter Murphy, prosecuting attorney of Salt Lake county, on relation of Richard W. Young, William J. Tuddenham, and John Fewson Smith, filed complaint in the third district court, alleging, among other things, that Salt Lake City is a city of the first class, divided into five municipal wards; that on the 10th day of February, 1890, there was an election held in said city for the purpose of electing a mayor and 15 councilmen,—three from each municipal ward, as provided by law,—to serve in said city as the city council thereof for the ensuing two years; and that at such election, said relators, being qualified, were then candidates for such office of councilmen in the Fourth municipal ward of Salt Lake City, and they each received of the legal qualified votes of said ward at such election 482 votes, and that no other persons were voted for in said ward by said electors for said office save the defendants, and that they received only 305 votes each for said office; that said relators were then and there each duly elected to such office of councilmen; that they had accepted said offices, and are ready, willing, and have offered to enter upon the discharge of the duty thereof; that said defendants have usurped and intruded into, and are now unlawfully usurping, intruding, and holding, said offices, to the injury of the people and to the damage of relators, and ask to be adjudged the rightful holders of said office, etc. To which complaint the defendants filed their demurrer on the grounds: (1) Said amended complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. (2) Misjoinder of parties plaintiff, in that each of the relators, Young, Smith, and Tuddenham, claims to be entitled to an office which is separate and distinct from the office or franchise claimed by each of his co-relators, and they are not authorized by statute to be joined in an action to establish their titles to separate and distinct offices. (3) Misjoinder of parties defendant in said action, in that it appears that each of the said defendants, Cohn, Noble, and Hall, has usurped and intruded into and is holding an office separate and distinct from the office which it is alleged each of his co-defendants is usurping and holding. (4) Several causes of action have been improperly united in said complaint, to-wit: A cause of action by said Young to determine his right to the office of councilmen, with causes of action by Tuddenham and Smith, to determine their separate rights to separate offices of councilmen of Salt Lake City. The court overruled the demurrer. The appellants failing to answer, judgment was entered in favor of the relators and against the appellants as prayed, and on this ruling and judgment the appellants appeal. This action is brought by the prosecuting attorney, under sections 3529, 3530, Comp. Laws 1888, to determine the rights of the relators to such office. By section 1761, Id., three councilmen were to be elected from this ward at the same time, each to hold the office for two years. The term commences and ends at the same time. Under the admission in the pleadings the appellants were not elected by a majority of the votes of the ward, but have unlawfully usurped the office, and now hold it against the rights of the people and of the relators, who were each duly elected at such election. The contention by the appellants' counsel, that neither of the relators were elected to fill either one of the particular offices held by any one of the appellants, shows that, if suit was brought by one of the relators for the position usurped by one of the appellants, great difficulty would be found in ascertaining what particular office or place should be assigned to the claimant, and this contention argues strongly in favor of the judgment asked by the relators, and that it was a proper judgment in their favor. "When several persons claim to be entitled to the same office or franchise, one action may be brought against all such persons in order to try their respective rights to such office or franchise." Comp. Laws 1888, § 3534. The joinder of defendants under this statute was intended to protect the rights of the people, and to prevent a multiplicity of actions to determine the same question based upon one and the same, or substantially the same, right, and relating to the same kind or character of office, and where the action and defense would necessarily be the same, or involve substantially the same rights. This is an action wherein the people must necessarily be plaintiffs, and it is difficult to see in what other mode this particular action could be commenced and maintained so as to do substantial justice to all and injustice to none. The relators were all elected at the same time for the same office or franchise. Neither were elected to fill any particular place now held by any particular one of the appellants, and there could not for that reason be any separate judgment for either relator as against either one of the appellants. There is a joint common usurpation of the office by all the appellants to which the relators have a joint common interest or right by virtue of their election. The action was therefore properly brought by the people in behalf of the three relators against the three appellants to determine which set of these persons claiming title were entitled to hold the franchise and represent the fourth precinct in the city council. People v. Murray, 8 Hun, 577, 5 Hun, 42; People v. Woodbury, 14 Cal. 43; People v. Page, (Utah,) 23 Pac. Rep. 761. The demurrer should be overruled. The order and judg-

(Supreme Court of Colorado. May 29, 1891.)

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—COURT OF APPEALS—JURISDICTION—AUTHORITY OF SUPREME COURT—RIGHT OF APPEAL—POWERS OF LEGISLATURE.

1. The unconstitutionality of a statute must be established beyond a reasonable doubt. It is not enough to show that the act is obnoxious to some unexpressed intent or spirit supposed to pervade the constitution.

2. The constitution operates upon the legislature purely as a limitation; that body possesses plenary authority, except as expressly or by clear implication denied in the constitution.

3. Section 1, art. 6, of the constitution, as amended, recognizes the legislative right to create a court of review. But no such court can be clothed with final jurisdiction co-ordinate with the supreme court.

4. The court of appeals created by the act under consideration is subject to the superintending control and guided by the decisions of the supreme court. In all cases that might, under any circumstances, go in the first instance to the supreme court, the judgment of the court of appeals is still subject to review by the superior tribunal.

5. The court of appeals will probably voluntarily yield its judgment, in case of difference of opinion upon the same legal propositions, to that of the higher tribunal. If that court, however, should insist upon a contrary view as to the same question in the same case, an appropriate remedy will be found to enforce the law as declared by the supreme court.

6. The supremacy of the supreme court appears in the paramount force and authority of its adjudications, not in the extent of its jurisdiction or the amount of its business.

7. The constitution confers and defines the jurisdiction of the supreme court, but does not inhibit the legislature from regulating to some extent the quantity of its business by reasonably contracting or enlarging the limits of such jurisdiction. The constitutional policy is not to specify absolutely the extent and boundaries of the jurisdiction of all courts, but to allow a large legislative discretion in connection therewith.

8. The citizen has no natural or inalienable right to a hearing in the supreme court. If this right exists, it must be deduced from a constitutional guaranty.

9. Section 6 of the bill of rights simply confers upon each individual the right to an intelligent, impartial, and speedy judicial hearing and determination of his grievances. It does not authorize him to invoke the jurisdiction, in a given case, of all the courts of the state.

10. Appeals to the supreme court remain creatures of statute, and, in the absence thereof, do not exist.

11. Writs of error from the supreme court may be forbidden by statute, unless preserved by the constitution. But that instrument only saves this proceeding, so far as ordinary appellate purposes are concerned, in connection with the judgments of county courts.

12. The writ of error is an original writ; it may be included in the original writs authorized by section 3, art. 6, of the constitution. But the writs designated in that section are confined to original jurisdiction, and cannot be used in aid of ordinary appellate authority.

13. The legislature may say, within reason, at what particular stage or in what particular court a specified kind of ordinary litigation shall end.

14. Section 2, art. 6, of the constitution, grants appellate jurisdiction to the supreme court, but does not lodge in that tribunal all jurisdiction of the kind, or jurisdiction over all litigation. That court is essentially a court of review. Its superintending control, original jurisdiction, and duty of answering executive and legislative questions are secondary functions.

15. The superintending control given by section 2, art. 6, aforesaid, refers primarily to courts, not to parties or cases. It was not designed for ordinary appellate jurisdiction, but to keep subordinate courts within bounds, and to insure the harmonious working of the judicial system.

16. When a constitution confers jurisdiction over a particular subject upon one court and not upon another, the jurisdiction thus conferred is exclusive. But this principle is inapplicable in the present case.

17. Section 28, art. 6, of the constitution, was not expected to insure uniformity in judicial decisions. Its purpose was to require that laws pertaining to the organization, jurisdiction, etc., of courts, also that the legal force and effect of judicial judgments, should be uniform.

18. Section 6 of the bill of rights provides for the administration of justice without delay; and, under the circumstances, the act creating the court of appeals is, in effect, a legislative attempt to obey this mandate.

19. A legislative attempt to interfere with the existence or supremacy of the supreme court, to change the nature of its jurisdiction and duties, or to entirely take away its utility, would be declared void. But the supreme court will not indulge the judicial presumption that the legislature may be guilty of such revolutionary conduct.

The eighth general assembly adopted an act creating a court of appeals. The essential features of this act are as follows: The court is made a court of record, with appellate jurisdiction only, and is authorized to issue the necessary writs and other processes in aid of such jurisdiction. Its judges, three in number, are to possess the same qualifications, and to receive the same salary, as the judges of the supreme court. It is provided with a clerk and bailiff, and its decisions are to be reported as are those of the supreme court, but in separate volumes. The act forbids the suitor a review, except upon error to county courts, by the supreme court in civil cases, where the amount of the final judgment is $2,500 or less, and where the controversy does not relate to a franchise or freehold, or require the construction of a provision of the constitution of the state or of the United States. In all such cases, however, determined in trial courts of record, an appeal lies to, or a writ of error from, the court of appeals, the judgment of that court being final. But the appellate jurisdiction of the court of appeals is also extended to all other civil cases, and to all criminal cases not capital. Its decisions, however, in the cases, civil and criminal, last mentioned, are made reviewable in the supreme court by appeal and by writ of error. Respondents, having been duly commissioned judges of the court of appeals, appointed the necessary officers, organized the court, and entered upon the discharge of the judicial duties pertaining thereto. The present proceeding was instituted for the purpose of testing the constitutionality of the act. It is submitted on a general demurrer to the return or answer of respondents pleading the statute, and their appointment thereunder.

L. S. Dixon, Wells, Macon & Furman, and Atty. Gen. Maupin, for the People. Willard Teller, D. V. Burns, Caldwell Yeaman, and W. S. Decker, for respondents. Robinson & Love, amici curiæ.

HELM, C. J., (after stating the facts as above.) No illegality or defect in the manner of respondents' selection for the office in question is asserted, nor is any personal disqualification relied on; therefore our investigation is necessarily confined to the objections so ably argued, touching the constitutionality of the court itself. Authorities need not be cited in support of the proposition that he who asserts the unconstitutionality of a statute must establish, beyond a reasonable doubt, the conflict or inconsistency which renders it void. It is not enough for him to vaguely insist that the act questioned is obnoxious to some unexpressed intent or spirit supposed to pervade the constitution. He must point out the specific provision or provisions of that instrument transgressed. Another elementary rule to be borne in mind, throughout the following discussion, is that the constitution operates upon the law-making branch of the government purely as a limitation; and that the legislature possesses plenary authority in the enactment of laws, except as such authority is expressly or by clear implication therein denied.

Section 1, art. 6, of the constitution, declares that "the judicial power of the state, as to matters of law and equity, except as in this constitution otherwise provided, shall be vested in a supreme court, district courts, county courts, justices of the peace, and such other courts as may be provided by law." This section clearly recognizes two kinds of courts, viz.: First, those established by and expressly enumerated in the constitution itself; and, second, such other courts as the legislature may at its pleasure, from time to time, create. It will be observed that the character and jurisdiction of the statutory courts to be thus created are not specified. The provision contains no command or inhibition touching these subjects. For aught that appears therein, the legislative will is omnipotent in the exercise of the power mentioned. When the constitution was first adopted, the clause in question read, "and such other courts as may be created by law for cities and incorporated towns;" but, by constitutional amendment in 1886, the phrase, "for cities and incorporated towns," was expunged. This change was evidently made with the deliberate purpose of removing the single limitation upon legislative discretion theretofore existing. There is nothing in the language now employed to justify the inference that additional trial courts alone may be provided by law. The legislature, in our judgment, is by this section affirmatively invested with authority to create an intermediate court of review; and we find no express constitutional limitation of the jurisdiction, territorially or otherwise, that may in the legislative wisdom be conferred upon a court of this kind. If, therefore, the act before us is unconstitutional, it is because constitutional provisions, touching other courts or subjects, inhibit, by implication, the jurisdiction, in whole or in part, conferred upon the court of appeals. Such is the position taken by relator and the learned counsel who appear with him on behalf of the people. It is asserted that a part, at least, of the authority given the court of appeals undermines the constitutional supremacy and jurisdiction of the supreme court, and is therefore as fully prohibited by the constitution as if express inhibiting words were found therein. If this contention be correct, it is either because a constitutional right of the citizen is denied, or because some constitutional provision relating to the supreme court or its jurisdiction is invaded. There can be no doubt about the supremacy of the supreme court. This court is placed by the constitution at the head of the judicial system of the state. From its judgments there is no appeal to any other state tribunal, and its determinations are binding upon the rest of the state judiciary. The legislature cannot interfere with its existence or supremacy, nor can that body alter the nature of its jurisdiction and duties; and it follows, of course, that, without change in the fundamental law, the legislature cannot create a court of co-ordinate final jurisdiction. In re Court of Appeals, 9 Colo. 623, 21 Pac. Rep. 471; In re Court of Appeals, 15 Colo. 578, 26 Pac. Rep. 214. Every tribunal established by statute, whether clothed with original or appellate powers, must, like the trial courts expressly named in the constitution, be inferior to the supreme court, subject to its "superintending control," and guided by its decisions upon questions determined in the exercise of its appellate authority. The opinion above cited from 9 Colo., and 21 Pac. Rep., seems to be misapprehended, and such misapprehension justifies an explanatory word in passing. The legislative act at that time under consideration provided for a court which, without consent of parties, should have final co-ordinate jurisdiction with this court in cases then upon its docket. That opinion does not declare that all appellate power is lodged in the supreme court, nor does it undertake to define the boundaries of the jurisdiction of this court in that regard. Its clear import is that in such cases as are, by virtue of the constitution and laws consistent therewith, retained within the reviewing authority of this tribunal, the judgment of no other court can be final; and, upon intelligent comparison, it will be found that no inconsistency exists between that opinion and the opinion referred to in 15 Colo., and 26 Pac. Rep., or the views hereinafter expressed.

But the present statute does not undertake to create a tribunal superior to, or co-ordinate with, the supreme court. The court of appeals is given no original jurisdiction whatever, and no independent superintending control over other courts; neither is it authorized to answer executive and legislative questions. Its decisions in all civil actions relating to franchises or freeholds, or where a constitutional question, state or federal, is involved, or where the amount of the judgment in the trial court exceeds $2,500, may be reviewed by the supreme court. Nor are any of its judgments final in causes from the 55 county courts, regardless of the subject-matter or amount in controversy, in the sense that a review of such judgments may not be had in this tribunal; and, while some ambiguity exists in relation thereto, we are of the opinion that the statute contemplates a reconsideration by this court of its conclusions in criminal causes when demanded by the convicted party. Every case that, within the purview of the constitution and statute, might, under any circumstances, come in the first instance to this court for review, may still be brought here for final adjudication. In this connection it is important to remember that a material distinction exists between the supremacy of the supreme court and certain features of its jurisdiction. As has been well said, the supremacy of such a court "is to be found, not in the extent of its jurisdiction, or the amount of its business, but in the paramount force and authority of its adjudications,—a force acting directly in controlling, without being controlled by, other tribunals; an authority operating indirectly from the respect and deference due to the highest tribunal known to the constitution and the laws." Sharpe v. Robertson, 5 Grat. 518. While the constitution confers and defines the jurisdiction of the supreme court, it does not, as we shall presently see, forbid the legislature from regulating to some extent the quantity of its business by reasonably contracting or enlarging the limits of the exercise of such jurisdiction, as the exigencies of the public welfare may require. An extensive legislative power to regulate the exercise of judicial authority is an imperative necessity. A constitutional provision, unalterably defining and fixing in all respects such jurisdiction, would be a serious misfortune. The constitutional policy seems to have been, not to specify absolutely the extent and boundaries of the jurisdiction of all the courts, but to allow a large legislative discretion, so that the varying demands and the ever changing necessities of the people may from time to time be adequately provided for.

With these general observations, we proceed to consider the remaining constitutional provisions to which our attention has been specifically invited. If, as relator contends, every suitor is entitled to be heard by the supreme court in every case, it follows, of course, that the judgment of no other court can be final; and therefore the act, in so far as in certain cases it confers final jurisdiction upon the court of appeals, is void. But the citizen has no natural or inalienable right to a hearing, in the supreme court. If the right to such a hearing exists, it must be deduced from some constitutional guaranty. The constitution will, however, be searched in vain for any provision that expressly or by fair implication contains this guaranty. The declarations in section 6 of the bill of rights, "that courts of justice shall be open to every person, and a speedy remedy afforded for every injury to person, property, or character, and that right and justice shall be administered without sale, denial, or delay," simply bestow upon each individual the right to an intelligent, impartial, and speedy judicial hearing and determination of his grievances. They were not intended to confer the privilege of having each controversy tried by every court of the state; nor was it the purpose of this provision to declare, irrespective of legislative direction, that the litigant should be permitted to invoke the jurisdiction of any particular court or number of courts. Such a construction of the language employed would often in practice be injurious to the suitor himself, as well as detrimental to the public welfare. The provision is, as already observed, satisfied when the suitor has an opportunity to secure a speedy and impartial judicial settlement of his controversy; and this is especially true when, as under the present act, such settlement includes a hearing in both an original and an appellate tribunal.

The foregoing conclusion is not affected by any constitutional declaration concerning the manner of invoking the appellate jurisdiction of the supreme court. The litigant cannot, as a matter of right, assert that he will come to this tribunal by appeal, for such appeals remain creatures of statute, and, in the absence thereof, do not exist. He cannot claim a vested right to bring his case to this court by writ of error; for, while this writ is in most cases a writ of right at the common law, it may by statute, unless the constitution forbids, be limited or abolished altogether. Haines v. People, 97 Ill. 161; Willoughby v. George, 4 Colo. 22; Stebbins v. Anthony, 5 Colo. 273; Webster v. Gaff, 6 Colo. 475. But, save as to judgments of county courts, the writ of error has received no express constitutional recognition for ordinary appellate purposes. The declaration in section 23, art. 6, that writs of error shall lie to review all final judgments of the county court, does not, as we construe it, forbid a legislative enactment authorizing writs of error to the judgments of other inferior courts of record. But it is conclusive of the proposition that the constitutional purpose was to leave the existence and use of this writ, with the exception mentioned, subject to legislative control. The provision, in effect, declares that, though the legislature may abolish the writ of error, to review the final judgments of other courts, the right to have those of the county court considered in this tribunal shall be inviolate. Were it important to account for the distinction thus made, ample reason exists in the fact that the estates of deceased persons and the interests of minor heirs, often involving adjudications and final judgments, are committed so largely to the custody of county courts; also in the further fact that the judges of such courts are not required to be learned in the law, many of them not even being licensed practitioners. It is true, as counsel for the people contend, that the writ of error is an original writ; and it may possibly be true, as they also assert, that it is fairly included within the "other original and remedial writs" referred to by section 3, art. 6, of the constitution, which the supreme court is authorized to issue. But, as we have already held, the jurisdiction conferred by said section 3 is original, in contradistinction to the appellate authority given by the preceding section. The original writs mentioned are not to be used in connection with or in aid of ordinary appellate jurisdiction, but for the purpose of instituting original causes or proceedings. Wheeler v. Irrigation Co., 9 Colo. 248, 11 Pac. Rep. 103.

Neither of the foregoing constitutional provisions, aside from the exception mentioned, fairly inhibits the legislature from saying, within reason, at what particular stage or in what particular court a specified kind of ordinary litigation shall end. It would seem that when the suitor has had the full, fair, and impartial judicial hearing guaranteed by section 6 of the bill of rights, the constitutional duty of the state is performed, and he ought not to complain. But our attention is further invited to section 2, art. 6, of that instrument: "The supreme court, except as otherwise provided in this constitution, shall have appellate jurisdiction only, which shall be co-extensive with the state, and shall have a general superintending control over all inferior courts, under such regulations and limitations as may be prescribed by law." It is insisted that this section lodges final appellate jurisdiction over all cases in the supreme court, and therefore that the legislative attempt to confer such jurisdiction upon the court of appeals in any class of cases is necessarily a nullity. We answer that, in the first place, since the constitution authorizes the legislature to create "other courts," such power necessarily carries with it authority to give the courts created a share in the trial of controversies that would otherwise be disposed of by the tribunals expressly named. Moreover, the very words of section 1, above quoted, lodge "the judicial power of the state" in the courts that may afterwards be provided by law, as well as in those enumerated by name. Secondly, we reply that, while section 2 clothes the supreme court with appellate jurisdiction, such jurisdiction is not exclusive. True, the intent is clear to make this court essentially a court of review. The word "only," coupled with the other words employed, plainly indicates a purpose to render its primary and principal powers appellate. Its superintending control over other courts, and its limited original jurisdiction, together with its anomalous duty of answering executive and legislative questions, while functions of great importance and value, must be regarded as secondary. It would be idle, however, to argue that the supreme court absorbs all appellate jurisdiction; and it would be scarcely less idle to say that section 2 gives it a monopoly for purposes of review. We are not at liberty to transpose the adverb, and make the constitution read, "The supreme court 'only' shall have appellate jurisdiction," while the language as it is written, "shall have appellate jurisdiction only," falls far short of declaring that it shall have such jurisdiction in all cases. This expression operates both as a grant and a limitation. It confers appellate authority, and at the same time forbids the exercise of original jurisdiction, save in the excepted cases. It specifies the kind, not the quantum, of jurisdiction, and is not inconsistent with the lodgment of power in some other court to review finally enumerated classes of cases. Care was taken to provide that the appellate authority of the court shall be co-extensive with the territorial boundaries of the state, and, had it been the intention to extend and forever continue its final appellate power over all litigation, such intention would have been expressed. The constitution declares that district courts "shall have original jurisdiction of all causes, both at law and in equity;" but, while every suitor is thus authorized to bring his suit in that court, no one ever supposed that this declaration operates to prevent vesting original jurisdiction of civil causes also in trial courts, which the legislature may see fit to create. If the claim of counsel for respondents be correct, (a matter we do not determine,) that the last clause of section 2, viz., "under such regulations and limitations as may be prescribed by law," applies to the appellate jurisdiction of the court, this feature of the provision reinforces the above conclusion; for, while the expression relates principally to procedure, the word "limitations" is comprehensive enough to include a legislative declaration as to the character or amount of a judgment that can be thus reviewed. It is hardly necessary to add that the "superintending control" given by the constitutional provision now under consideration refers primarily to courts, not to parties or cases. Its purpose is to keep the courts themselves "within bounds," and to insure the harmonious working of our judicial system. It was not designed to secure the review of judgments in connection with ordinary appellate jurisdiction, and, in so far as the rights of suitors in particular causes may be affected, the effect is incidental purely. To say that the "superintending control" was intended to include ordinary appellate power is to render the preceding clauses superfluous, in so far as they constitute a grant of such power.

The foregoing views are not inconsistent with the principle also relied on by relator, that, when a constitution confers jurisdiction over a particular subject-matter upon one court, and not upon another, the jurisdiction thus conferred is exclusive. That principle is simply inapplicable. The provision before us grants general appellate supervision; it specifies no "particular subject-matter." Section 28, art. 6, of the constitution, declares that "all laws relating to courts shall be general and of uniform operation throughout the state; and the organization, jurisdiction, powers, proceedings, and practice of all the courts of the same class or grade, so far as regulated by law, and the force and effect of the proceedings, judgments, and decrees of such courts severally, shall be uniform." The court of appeals created by this statute cannot be regarded as belonging to the same class or grade with any of the trial courts, while, as we have seen, it is inferior to the supreme court. There being no other court of a like class or grade, and its powers being exercised uniformly throughout the state, there is no disobedience of the constitutional command relating to judicial uniformity. It may be that, as counsel suppose, the views entertained by the court of appeals in cases within its final supervision will sometimes differ from those promulgated, under like circumstances, by the supreme court. But it is believed that, in such instances, the court of appeals will voluntarily yield its judgment to that of the higher tribunal. Something must always be trusted to the disposition of judges to act for the general harmony and good as well as to their honesty and legal discrimination. Should direct contrariety of opinion arise in the same case, however, as counsel seem to fear, an appropriate remedy will undoubtedly be found to enforce the law as declared by the supreme court, and thus vindicate both the interest of the suitor and the supremacy of this tribunal. But these thoughts are not pertinent to the specific question in hand; for, however much uniformity of judicial decision may be desired, section 28 was not expected to insure such uniformity. This provision deals with legislation. It is the laws pertaining to the organization, jurisdiction, etc., of courts, also the legal force and effect of the judgments, not the judgments themselves, that are to be uniform.

We have now briefly considered all of the constitutional provisions upon which reliance is placed by relator and his learned counsel. We discover in the legislative act challenged no such inconsistency therewith as would justify us in holding it unconstitutional. Some of its features will doubtless prove objectionable in actual practice. But it is largely an experiment. Experience may demonstrate its entire inutility; that it will suggest improvements, is a matter of course. Aside from the rule of construction that forbids courts from holding statutes void so long as a reasonable doubt of their validity remains, this, or a similar measure, is supported by direct constitutional sanction, as well as by potent considerations of public and private justice. Section 6 of the bill of rights, already mentioned, not only guaranties to the citizen a remedy for every legal injury suffered, but also provides that such remedy shall be enjoyed without delay. It is an open secret that the reviewing branch of our judicial machinery has for years been unable to give this provision full force and effect. Upon the organization of this tribunal, it received a bequest of more than 100 causes from the territorial court of last resort. The state's diversity of industries, and its marvelous growth in population and wealth, have caused a vast and unanticipated increase in the volume of judicial business. As one of the natural results, nearly 3,000 cases have reached this court for review. And when the novel and perplexing character of a large part of this litigation is considered, it is certainly not a matter of surprise that the court, despite diligent and earnest endeavor, has failed to keep pace with the rapid accumulations upon its docket. The annoyance and delay incident to this condition of affairs have amounted in many instances to a denial of justice. The gravity of the situation appealed strongly for some sort of legislative relief, if such relief were possible; and, while incongruities in judicial organization and action are to be deplored, we find no excuse for relaxing any rule of construction in order to declare the statute before us void. There is no evidence whatever in the act itself, or in the circumstances attending its adoption, of a legislative intent to detract from the dignity or standing of the supreme court. We cannot favor the supposition that the legislature may in the future, directly or indirectly, undertake to deprive this tribunal of its jurisdiction, appellate or original. When that body attempts, if it ever should, to interfere with the existence or supremacy of this court, or to change the nature of its jurisdiction and duties, or to render it an "idle and empty pageant," the court will undoubtedly decline to recognize such usurpation of authority and illegal action; but, until that time arrives, the discourtesy towards another branch of the government will not be committed, of indulging the presumption that a willful effort may be made to thus impair the judicial system and lessen its usefulness. The supreme court might, by disregarding rules of construction, declare all acts of a particular general assembly void, and thus nullify its entire work; but it is highly unreasonable to surmise that this tribunal will ever be guilty of such revolutionary conduct. To suppose that either department of government will make the most vicious and illegal use possible of the powers conferred, is to suppose a proceeding subversive of the government itself. The numerous authorities cited by counsel have been carefully examined, but to attempt a critical analysis thereof would unnecessarily prolong this opinion. It is not pretended that our views are in strict harmony with all of the able decisions referred to. They are, however, in the main not unsupported by authority, and we submit them in confidence, believing that, besides promoting the public good, they will be found well sustained by firmly established legal principles. The demurrer to respondents' return or answer will be overruled.

COWAN V. COWAN.

BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—ORDER MADE AT THE TIME OF FINAL JUDGMENT—NEW TRIAL—EVIDENCE—DEPOSITIONS—DIVORCE—ALIMONY.

1. When the trial is had at one term, and the final judgment is not entered until a subsequent term, an order fixing the time within which a bill of exceptions may be filed, made at the time of the entry of judgment, is sufficient authority for including in the record the prior proceedings.

2. The rulings upon the admission and rejection of testimony made at the trial, if excepted to at the time, may be reviewed upon appeal, although no formal exception to the overruling of the motion for a new trial was taken.

3. It is not error to refuse to admit evidence upon matters expressly admitted by the pleadings.

4. Under our practice, only such objections, exceptions, and motions in respect to depositions will be considered as are made before trial.

5. When adultery is charged, it is not error to refuse evidence of the good reputation for chastity of the person with whom the adultery is alleged to have been committed, when the general reputation of such person has not been put in issue, she being neither a party to nor a witness in the case.

6. A wife suing for divorce, if without sufficient separate estate, may properly be allowed reasonable attorney's fees to be paid from the husband's estate, varying in amount with reference to the value of the services and the financial condition of the parties, but, where the husband's estate is small, this fact must be given due weight in fixing the amount that may properly be allowed for such purpose out of his estate.

Action for divorce, alimony, and custody of minor children. Appellee, Laura Cowan, as plaintiff below, rested her application for divorce, etc., upon two distinct charges against the defendant Edwin R. Cowan, viz., adultery and extreme cruelty. The trial of these issues resulted in a general verdict in favor of appellee. This verdict was rendered upon the 2d day of January, 1889. A motion for a new trial was filed and denied upon January 21, 1889. An appeal to this court prayed and allowed the same day. No further action appears to have been taken in the case at that term of court. At the next term, on March 14, 1889, the cause was called for hearing upon the question of alimony and custody of the children, and, upon the 15th day of the month of April following, the final decree was rendered. By this decree the bonds of matrimony between the parties were dissolved. Appellee was given the custody of the children, the issue of said marriage, the same being Cora H., Ethel M., and Augusta, aged, respectively, about 13, 9, and 6 years at the time of the trial. Permanent alimony was awarded the plaintiff in the sum of $15,000, and counsel fees in the sum of $1,800, and said amounts were made a lien upon certain property belonging to appellant.

HAYT, J., (after stating the facts as above.) Objection is made to any consideration of the matters brought here by the bill of exceptions upon our review of the trial of the divorce issues. This objection is based upon the fact that the bill was neither presented at the term at which these issues were tried, nor was any order extending the time within which the same might be presented made at that term. Neither were necessary. An order fixing the time within which a bill of exceptions might be presented was made at the time the final decree was entered, and this is all the statute requires. Stocking v. Morey, 14 Colo. 317, 23 Pac. Rep. 343. And it is not necessary, under the present provisions of the Civil Code, to preserve a formal exception to the overruling of a motion for a new trial, in order that this court may consider the exceptions reserved to the rulings of the court upon the admission and rejection of testimony at the trial. Civil Code 1887, § 387. A number of assignments of error are based upon the admission and rejection of evidence at the trial. These in most instances relate to matters that could have had but slight effect upon the substantial merits of the controversy between the parties. They will, however, be briefly noticed.

1. When plaintiff was upon the stand, she was asked, upon cross-examination, as to how the house occupied by her was furnished, etc. This question is claimed to be material, under the allegation of the plaintiff that the defendant at one time deserted plaintiff, leaving her with three children to provide for, without making adequate provision for their support. It is said that, if the house was well furnished, it might perhaps have been shown that the plaintiff could have in part supported herself and children from the rent of rooms. It is sufficient answer to this contention to say that, when she attempted so to do, her husband objected, and turned the roomers away. Further than this, it is expressly admitted by the pleadings that the house was well furnished at the time to which this inquiry was directed; hence the evidence was unnecessary. When the question of alimony was under consideration at a subsequent term, the witness answered fully in regard to the value and character of such furnishings, and we do not think the previous rejection of the testimony was error.

2. The next objection urged is based upon the rulings of the court at the trial in reference to a portion of the deposition of the witness Mrs. Ennis. This objection was made too late, and must be deemed to have been waived under section 353 of the Civil Code, which provides that "all objections, exceptions, and motions in respect to depositions shall be made and disposed of before the trial: provided, that objections to the competency, relevancy, or materiality of the testimony therein may be reserved and ruled on during the trial." Section 353, Code 1887.

3, 4. The third exception argued here relates to the ruling of the court sustaining an objection to the following question propounded to the defendant while upon the stand: "Why do you think the children were in danger?" It is claimed that this question was pertinent and proper, as explaining defendant's conduct towards his wife upon an occasion, when she swears she was forcibly thrust down-stairs by him. Both parties were fully examined upon all the facts and circumstances, in connection with that episode, and each allowed to detail at length, before the jury, his or her version of the matter; and, although an objection was sustained to this particular question, the witness answered the same in connection with his answer to the next interrogatory, thus curing the harm, if any, that might have otherwise resulted from sustaining the objection. The testimony of the defendant, as to his motive for calling upon the servant upon a certain occasion, which is the fourth point urged against the conduct of the trial below, was properly excluded.

5. The fifth relates to the motive of the plaintiff in bringing this suit. We think this was also properly excluded. The attempt being to prove by the witness Pond that the plaintiff had made statements showing that she had a bitter hatred towards the defendant, it is sufficient to say that such evidence was entirely unnecessary. During the plaintiff's long examination in chief, as well as upon cross-examination, she made no attempt to conceal the fact that she entertained the feelings towards the defendant attributed to her. Almost every answer is an admission that she did entertain such hatred. Further evidence upon this point was entirely unnecessary.

The defendant was charged with having committed adultery with one —, and counsel for appellant complained because the court refused to allow them to inquire into the general reputation of said person for chastity. The argument is that, when the general reputation for chastity of one is in evidence, it is competent to show such person's good reputation. This rule has no application, under the circumstances of this case. The general reputation of the party with whom the adultery is alleged to have been committed was not in issue. She was neither a party to nor a witness in this case. The testimony was properly refused.

The case appears to have been fairly submitted to the jury, under proper instructions. The evidence, although quite conflicting, is sufficient to sustain the verdict, and we see no reason for disturbing the decree of the trial court dissolving the bonds of matrimony between the parties. No error is urged to that part of the decree relating to the custody of the children.

Appellant claims the amount decreed appellee as permanent alimony, and for counsel fees, etc., to be grossly excessive. In view of his financial condition, we think there is some merit in this claim. The only property belonging to the defendant, as shown by the evidence, consists of four lots on the corner of Twenty-First and Stout streets, in the city of Denver, with a dwelling-house thereon. The market value of this property at the time of the trial was variously estimated by the witnesses at from twenty to thirty thousand dollars. Taking the testimony altogether, and it may be said to fix the value of the property at $25,000, less the sum of $1,200, due for taxes thereon. It is in evidence that the defendant had received several thousand dollars from the sale of property during the former years immediately preceding the trial. Such property was incumbered, however, and the amounts received therefrom by defendant were not more than sufficient to pay his living expenses up to the time of the trial and the amounts awarded the plaintiff for temporary alimony. It is also shown that, five or six years previous to the trial, while he was a member of the firm of Cowan & Co., the firm had deposits in bank at different times to their credit in amounts ranging from ten to thirteen thousand dollars. The latter testimony, in view of the remoteness of the time and uncertainty of the liabilities, etc., is of no weight. The defendant upon the trial testified that the Stout-Street property constituted his sole and only asset, and that he was then indebted to various parties in amounts aggregating something over $6,000. That he is afflicted with spinal schlerosis, a malady that in a great measure incapacitates him for business, is established. Under these circumstances, we are of the opinion that the plaintiff should not have been allowed out of the defendant's estate for counsel fees and permanent alimony more than the sum of $14,000. As fixed by the decree, the aggregate of these items is $16,800. A wife suing for divorce, if without sufficient separate estate, may properly be allowed reasonable attorney's fees to be paid from the husband's estate, varying in amount with reference to the value of the services and the ability of the defendant to pay; but where the estate, as here, is not large, this fact must be given due weight in fixing the amount that may properly be allowed her for this and other purposes, out of his estate. If divorce applicants desire an array of eminent counsel, it is their privilege to provide themselves therewith at their own expense, but the amount to be allowed the wife for counsel fees from the husband's estate must be governed to some extent by the situation in life of the parties and the husband's ability to pay. We shall not disturb the allowance in this case as an independent item, as appellee seems to desire same should not be interfered with; but, in the opinion of the court, $14,000 is the limit that should have been allowed for all purposes. Leaving the attorney's fees unchanged, this would leave the wife as permanent alimony the sum of $12,200. This is all we think she is entitled to, under the circumstances of this case, and the decree should be modified accordingly. The decree is reversed as to the amount allowed for permanent alimony, with direction to the court below to modify the same in this respect in accordance with the views herein expressed.

ENTRY OF JUDGMENT — CONDITIONS — MANDAMUS.

1. A court has no right to require as a condition precedent to the entry of final judgment that a part of said judgment be first paid.

2. The writ of mandamus cannot be used to control judicial discretion, but it may properly be invoked to command a subordinate court to proceed to judgment.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Petition for mandamus.

Wells, McNeal & Taylor, for petitioner.
L. C. Rockwell, for respondent.

HAYT, J. This is an original application for a writ of mandamus to be directed to the respondent, commanding him as one of the judges of the second judicial district to enter a decree in a case pending in said court. It is not necessary to determine any question of fact upon this application. It appears that some time in the month of August, 1889, an action was commenced in the district court of Arapahoe county by petitioner as plaintiff against Katie J. Rosenfeld as defendant. The action was for the purpose of dissolving the bonds of matrimony existing between plaintiff and defendant. The defendant, Katie J., appeared in said cause, and answered the complaint, denying all the material averments thereof. Shortly after the institution of the action an order was made by the district court requiring the plaintiff to pay defendant a certain sum per month as temporary alimony, and an allowance for counsel fee was also made. Afterwards the case was called for trial before respondent and a jury. Both parties to that suit were present in person and by attorney, and a trial was regularly had, resulting in the jury finding the issues for the plaintiff. Thereafter a motion was made to set aside said verdict and for a new trial, which motion was by said judge overruled, and, the case coming on further to be heard, the judge rendered a decision to the effect that the plaintiff in said suit was entitled to a decree dissolving the bonds of matrimony between the plaintiff and defendant, and "that the defendant should be awarded the sum of $5,000 as permanent alimony." Plaintiff had previously been required to pay for the use of the defendant the sum of $500 as counsel fees, and also alimony pendente lite; first at $75 and then at $100 per month. It affirmatively appears that all these sums had been paid prior to the time the case was reached for judgment. Respondent, after outlining his decree, refused to enter the same unless $1,000 of the $5,000 awarded the defendant should be first paid, and afterwards prepared a written decree, inserting said condition therein, but refusing to sign the same until the condition should be complied with. The sole question raised upon this application relates to the right of the district court to require as a condition precedent to the entry of any judgment the payment of the said sum of $1,000. From the written opinion of the judge, filed at the time, it appears that said condition was attached for the reason that the judge was of the opinion that the money would not be otherwise paid. We do not think the court had any authority to attach such condition. The case had already proceeded to a stage at which it became the duty of the court to enter a final decree, from which an appeal could be taken. An appeal can be taken only from a final judgment, and courts cannot be permitted to withhold such judgment, and refuse to pronounce the same, unless a part of the proposed judgment be first paid, for this, in effect, would be to make the right of an appeal depend upon a compliance with conditions not authorized. The conditions upon which an appeal may be taken are prescribed by statute, and additional burdens cannot be imposed by a court as conditions precedent to its exercise. People v. Quinn, 12 Colo. 473, 21 Pac. Rep. 488. At an earlier period in the case the court refused to proceed until its order in reference to alimony pendente lite had been fully complied with. Its right to impose such condition is undisputed, the plaintiff being able to comply. But, as we have seen, at the time the cause was ripe for a final decree all former orders of the court had been fully complied with. It will be time enough to enforce the provisions of the proposed final decree when in fact it becomes the decree of the court. The district court by its conduct is placed in the attitude of refusing to proceed to judgment in the cause. While the writ of mandamus cannot be used to control judicial discretion, it may properly be invoked to command a subordinate court to proceed to judgment, as is prayed in this case. Let the peremptory writ issue.

CONTEMPT—ORDER OF ARREST.

It is error to issue an attachment, warrant, or order of arrest for an alleged constructive contempt, without an affidavit or information, containing a statement of the facts constituting the alleged contempt, having first been filed with the court.

(Syllabus by Strang, C.)

Peckham & Henderson, for appellant. J. N. Ives, Atty. Gen., and C. T. Atkinson, for the State.

STRANG, C. This is an appeal from a proceeding for contempt. On the 7th day of January, 1890, there was pending, in the district court of Cowley county, a certain case in which Barbara Croco and John Croco were plaintiffs and the Winfield National Bank was defendant. This case had been tried, and a judgment therein had been rendered, but it was pending on a motion for a new trial. There was another case pending in said court at that time in which the state of Kansas was plaintiff and C. Perry defendant, said cause being a contempt proceeding instituted by said court against said Perry, charging him with contempt for writing, and publishing in the papers of said city, a certain card, which it was alleged was calculated to impede and obstruct the business of the court, and to impeach the integrity of said court, and the judge thereof. On said 7th day of January, 1890, said card was published in the Daily Telegram, with comments thereon, as follows: "Arrested for contempt. Dr. C. Perry was arrested to-day on a bench-warrant, and arraigned on a charge of contempt of court. Dr. Perry's crime (and it must be a crime, else he would not be so charged and arraigned) consists in the following card, published in the daily newspapers: 'A card. In relation of the case of Croco v. The Winfield National Bank, I am not a little surprised that the daily papers should so industriously lay before a public, ignorant of the facts, the allegation of the plaintiff, and at the same time should so entirely ignore the testimony on the part of the defendant. However, this is only in the line of the action of the judge, who evidently believed the allegation of the plaintiff, and gave no credence to the testimony on the part of the defendant, which testimony (so far as the writer's knowledge of the facts of the case) was nevertheless absolutely true. I make only this comment,—that, if the judge believed what he is reported to have asserted, it is his bounden duty to direct the county attorney to file a criminal action against Messrs. McDonald, E. T. and G. H. Schuler, and myself. C. PERRY.' At this time, the result of the case is not known. Moral. Don't express your contempt of a court. Think all you please, but say nothing and saw wood. Probably the court will dismiss the charge. We fail to see wherein any contempt was expressed. Later. The court gave Dr. Perry until next Monday to make a showing in defense of his rights as an American citizen." On the next day, January 8, 1890, without any affidavit, complaint, or information first having been filed therein, the district court of said county being in session, a warrant was issued by said court, or the judge thereof, for the arrest of the defendant J. W. Henthorn, together with H. Vincent and L. Vincent, on a charge of contempt of court; the contempt consisting in the publishing of the card of C. Perry, quoted above, and comments thereon by the editor of the Telegram. The defendant, Henthorn, was arrested and brought before the court. Afterwards he filed his answer to the charge contained in the warrant, admitting the publication of the article, and averring that he was the sole editor of the Daily Telegram. The answer, which was verified by the oath of the defendant, also averred that the article was not published for the purpose of prejudicing the public against the said court, nor the judge thereof, nor was it published willfully and with intent to influence, or in any way to impede or obstruct, the administration of justice therein. There was no evidence heard in the matter. The court, however, found the defendant guilty on the admission in the answer, and fined him $100 and costs, and ordered him committed to the county jail until the costs were paid. From such judgment the defendant appeals, and demands his discharge at the hands of this court.

"A contempt of court is either direct or constructive. A direct contempt is an open insult, in the face of the court, to the person of the judges while presiding, or a resistance to its powers in their presence. A constructive contempt is an act done, not in the presence of the court, but at a distance, which tends to belittle, degrade, or to obstruct, interrupt, prevent, or embarrass the administration of justice." When the contempt sought to be punished is committed in facie curiæ, the punishment is summary, and generally immediately follows its commission. In such case no preliminary process or evidence is necessary, except what is gathered by the sense of seeing and hearing. The court takes judicial notice of the offense, and punishes without a hearing of any kind, except in some cases to give the guilty parties an opportunity to apologize, upon which the court may discharge, or it may receive the apology in mitigation of the offense in fixing the punishment. But where the contempt is constructive,—that is, where the contempt is not committed in facie curiæ, but where the act or omission which constitutes the contempt occurs away from the court, beyond its power of observation,—a proceeding in contempt must be instituted to bring the matter before the court. There were a number of methods whereby such proceedings were commenced under the English practice, several of which obtained more or less countenance in this country under the common-law practice. But at this time, in this country, the common and more approved methods of instituting a proceeding for contempt are—First, when an attachment or warrant or order of arrest for contempt issues in the first instance; or, secondly, when a rule to show cause why an attachment for contempt shall not issue, or why the alleged contemner shall not be punished for contempt. Under either of these methods, the defendant is entitled to a hearing. And a careful examination of the authorities satisfies us that, in all cases of constructive contempt, whether the process of arrest issues in the first instance, or a rule to show cause is served, a preliminary affidavit or information must be filed in the court before the process can issue. This is necessary to bring the matter to the attention of the court, since the court cannot take judicial notice of an offense committed out of court, and beyond its power of observation. There are a few cases in the books where the courts have taken notice of constructive contempts, and issued process, without any affidavit or information having been filed to bring the subject-matter of the contempt to the attention of the court. But such cases are very rare in this country, and the practice nearly or quite obsolete. The great weight of authority is certainly opposed to such practice. Courts should never be required to go about looking for contempts of their authority. To do so is sufficient to lower their dignity, and bring them into contempt.

The case of Wilson v. Territory, 1 Wyo. 156, is exactly in point with this case. In that case Wilson was arrested on an order of arrest issued by the court without an affidavit or information having been filed therein. He was charged with constructive contempt for writing and securing the publication in the Omaha Herald of an article reflecting upon the first district court of Wyoming, and upon the judge of said court. He answered, no other evidence was introduced, and the accused was found guilty, and fined. He appealed to the supreme court of that territory. That court used the following language in expressing its opinion in the case: "Without entering upon the question of contempt in this case, * * * we are of the opinion that an error was committed by the district court, at the very commencement of the proceedings, which renders it necessary to set aside the judgment thereof. This consisted in issuing the process of attachment without any valid evidence whatever before the court upon which to found such a proceeding." In Re Daves, 81 N. C. 72, the court holds "that a rule to show cause why a party should not be attached for contempt, in disregarding the order of the court, should not be granted on mere motion, but should be based on the affidavit of the party to the attachment or other satisfactory evidence." In the case of Ex parte Wright, 65 Ind. 508, the court says: "The grounds of a constructive contempt should be stated by affidavit, by the return of some officer, or in some way made known to the court prima facie, by witnesses or otherwise, so that they may be made a part of the record; and this should be done before a rule or writ is granted against the alleged offender." In State v. Blackwell, 10 S. C. 35, it is said: "It is a fatal objection to a rule to show cause why a party should not be attached for contempt for an offense not committed in the presence of the court that it was issued without affidavit." In the case of Young v. Cannon, 2 Utah, 561, the court says: "In all proceedings for contempt which are not committed in the presence of the court, in order to give the court jurisdiction, it is necessary that an affidavit be filed, stating the facts constituting the contempt. When the alleged contempt is not committed in the presence of the court, an affidavit of the facts constituting the contempt must be presented, in order to set the power of the court in motion." Batchelder v. Moore, 42 Cal. 412. "Proceedings for contempt, not committed in the presence of the court, are instituted by filing an information under oath stating the facts constituting the alleged contempt. An attachment or order to show cause will then be issued, and the party accused brought before the court. As the proceeding is solely to protect public justice from obstruction the accused is not entitled to a trial by jury." Gandy v. State, 13 Neb. 445, 14 N. W. Rep. 143. See, also, Bond v. Bond, 69 N. C. 97; Worland v. State, 82 Ind. 50; McConnell v. State, 46

Ind. 298; Rugg v. Spencer, 59 Barb. 397; State v. Mott, 4 Jones, (N. C.) 449. This case must be reversed upon the ground that the court had no jurisdiction of the defendant, because no affidavit or information was filed in the court as a basis for the warrant of arrest upon which the defendant was taken into court and tried. The judgment of the district court is reversed, and the defendant discharged, with costs. All the justices concurring.

STATE v. VINCENT.

CONTEMPT—ORDER OF ARREST—INFORMATION.

1. It is error to issue an attachment, warrant, or order of arrest for a constructive contempt, without an affidavit or information, containing a statement of the facts constituting the alleged contempt, having first been filed in the court whence the process issues.

2. The answer in this case examined, and held that, under the circumstances of this case, the defendant should have been discharged on his answer.

Commissioners' decision. Appeal from district court, Cowley county; M. G. TROUP, Judge.

Peckham & Henderson, for appellant. J. N. Ives, Atty. Gen., and C. T. Atkinson, for the State.

STRANG, C. This is an action for contempt, growing out of the same publication that was alleged to constitute contempt in the case of State v. Henthorn, 26 Pac. Rep. 937, (just decided.) In this case, as in that, the defendant was arrested and brought into court on a warrant or order issued by the district court of Cowley county, without any affidavit or information of any kind, containing a statement of the facts constituting the alleged contempt, having first been filed in said court. This case must therefore be reversed upon the strength of that case. It is also the opinion of this court that this defendant should have been held to have purged himself by his answer, and discharged. His answer, which was verified by his oath, showed that J. W. Henthorn was the sole editor of the Winfield Telegram, the paper in which the article constituting the alleged contempt was published, at the time of its publication, and that this defendant had nothing to do with the publication of the article complained of, and had no knowledge of said article, or its publication, until the order of arrest in this case, which contained a copy thereof, was served on him. There was no evidence before the court tending to show that such answer was not true. On the other hand, the verified answer of J. W. Henthorn, who was arrested at the same time with this defendant, and on the same process, also stated that Henthorn was the sole editor of the paper in which the article complained of appeared, and that he was solely responsible for its publication. Under these circumstances, we think this defendant should have been discharged. "In this instance, Gilbert Murdock has, in the most complete positive manner, denied all the charges made against himself, and the other two persons, who stand accused, sustain his answer by their assertion that they did not act as his agents, or with his knowledge; hence it is clear that he must be discharged, with his costs." Murdock's Case, 2 Bland, 487. It is recommended that the judgment of the district court be reversed, and defendant discharged, with costs.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

STATE v. VINCENT.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. June 6, 1891.)

Appeal from district court, Cowley county; M. G. TROUP, Judge.

Peckham & Henderson, for appellant. J. N. Ives, Atty. Gen., and C. T. Atkinson, for the State.

PER CURIAM. Upon the authority of the case of State v. Vincent, 26 Pac. Rep. 939, (just decided,) which case is in all respects like this one, the judgment of the district court will be reversed, and the defendant discharged, with costs. All the justices concurring.

WINFIELD NAT. BANK v. CROCO et al.

CANCELLATION OF MORTGAGE—FRAUD—DURESS—NEW TRIAL—PREJUDICE OF COURT.

1. If a creditor obtains the signatures of a man and his wife to a mortgage to secure a debt upon which the man is surety, by representations that the instrument is not a mortgage, but simply a paper to protect the man from arrest and imprisonment for an offense committed, and it appears that they are old people, whose eye-sight is so impaired that they cannot read the writing in the mortgage presented to them for signing, such mortgage will, in a proper proceeding promptly begun, be declared invalid, and will be canceled.

2. If the creditor operated upon the fears of the husband by threats of arrest and imprisonment believed by him to be imminent, and thus overcomes his will, and through fear and undue influence compels him to sign the mortgage, the signature is not binding; and, if the wife is induced to execute the mortgage from fear excited by threats made to her by the creditor of an illegal criminal prosecution against her husband, the instrument thus obtained will not be binding upon her.

3. The testimony in the case examined, and held to be sufficient to sustain the finding of the court that the mortgage in controversy is invalid.

4. The mere expression of the opinions of witnesses that the court entertained bias and prejudice for and against some of the parties in the action, without a statement of the facts and grounds upon which such opinions were founded, cannot be regarded as testimony, and is entitled to no consideration in an application for a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from district court, Cowley county; M. G. TROUP, Judge.

Peckham & Peckham, for plaintiff in error. S. E. Fink and McDermott & Johnson, for defendants in error.

JOHNSTON, J. This was an action brought in the district court of Cowley county by Barbara Croco and John Croco to cancel and set aside a mortgage executed by them to the Winfield National Bank on February 20, 1889. It was alleged that the property mortgaged was the homestead of Barbara Croco and John Croco, situated in Winfield, and a farm near to Winfield, and that both the homestead and the farm were owned by Barbara Croco. The plaintiffs below averred that the signatures to the mortgage were obtained by fraudulent representations, duress, intimidation, and threats of injury. They averred that the pretended mortgage was procured without any consideration, and without any knowledge on their part of its contents, but, on the contrary, that the bank and its agents, with the intent to defraud them, falsely represented that the instrument was not a mortgage, but was a paper necessary to be executed to keep John Croco from being criminally prosecuted and imprisoned. They alleged that they were unable to read, and did not read or hear the instrument read, and were not aware of its contents at the time of signing the same. They further say that the acknowledgment of the mortgage was taken by G. H. Schuler, a stockholder and officer of the bank, but that he did not inform them, or either of them, that the instrument was a mortgage, or that he was attempting to take their acknowledgment to a mortgage. The bank denied all the averments of fraudulent representations and duress alleged in the petition, and stated that the mortgage was procured from the Crocos in the ordinary course of business and for a valid consideration, to secure the payment of a promissory note, executed by P. C. Croco and John Croco, for the sum of $5,405. The case was submitted to the court upon conflicting testimony, and the claims of the plaintiffs below were sustained, it being held that they did not voluntarily or legally execute or acknowledge the mortgage, and that it was without consideration, and void. It is not disputed that the instrument sought to be canceled in this proceeding was signed by John Croco and Barbara Croco on February 20, 1889. The name of John Croco was signed to it in a back room of the bank, in the presence of the officers, and the name of Barbara Croco was attached to it at her home, in the absence of her husband, and when no one was present but G. H. Schuler, an officer of the bank. It further appears, without question, that Barbara Croco was the owner of the property described in the mortgage, and that she was in no way indebted to the bank. Peter C. Croco, a son, was largely indebted to the bank, and his father, John Croco, had signed, as surety, with him, a note of $5,405, held by the bank. When the mortgage was signed by John and Barbara Croco, Peter was insolvent, and the officers of the bank, learning of his financial condition, were actively endeavoring to obtain security for his indebtedness to the bank. The record does not disclose the ages of John and Barbara Croco, but they are spoken of as old people, and the testimony is that their eyesight of each was greatly impaired.

The testimony of John Croco with reference to the signing of the mortgage, in substance, is that on the morning of February 20, 1889, he started to the railway depot to take the train for the town of Floral, to visit his daughter; that, while waiting for the train at the depot, J. N. McDonald, the vice-president of the bank, came in, and invited him to return to the bank, but Croco declined. McDonald insisted that he must go to the bank, as there was urgent business, and, picking up Croco's valise, he started towards the bank with it, and, finally, Croco reluctantly accompanied him. He was taken to a back room in the bank building, where McDonald sat down and commenced writing. Shortly afterwards, George H. and Everett Schuler came into the room, and the paper upon which McDonald had been writing was presented to Croco for signature. Croco inquired what the nature of the paper was, stating that he had not his glasses, and was unable to read what was upon the paper. He was told that it was for the purpose of keeping the United States officers from arresting him upon the charge of obtaining money under false pretenses; that money had been obtained from the bank upon the note signed by him; that it was a United States bank, and that they must telegraph the United States officers at Washington by noon that day if the paper was not signed, and that they would telegraph to the marshal or some other officer at Kansas City, who would proceed to Winfield and arrest him. George H. Schuler sat down and wrote a dispatch, which he held up in Croco's face, saying that there was a dispatch that would go to Washington if he did not sign that paper, and that the officers there would telegraph, and cause him to be arrested and taken to Leavenworth. Everett Schuler made a similar statement and argument, and McDonald pushed the paper over to him, and said if he would sign it now that he would be all right. Croco said he repeatedly asked what the paper was, and to have it read, and at each time was told that it was simply to protect him from prosecution and arrest. He states that he declined to sign, and that he arose, and started for the door, telling them that he would go and see his lawyer, and, if his lawyer said it was right to sign the paper, he would do so, when George H. and Everett Schuler jumped to their feet, and sharply said that he could not go, but must sign the paper. Dr. Perry, another director of the bank, came in, and joined with the others in an effort to obtain his signature to the paper. He had been a friendly neighbor of Croco's, and he talked pleasantly to him, and advised him to sign it, and avoid trouble; and that, if he did not, the officers at Washington would be notified at once. He was repeatedly told that if he did not sign it before 12 o'clock the telegram would be sent, and about 15 minutes before 12 he signed the paper. He said that he was at no time informed that it was a mortgage, and was told that it was not intended to affect his or his wife's property. After he had written his name, George H. Schuler tore up the dispatch, and when they started from the room they found that the doors of the same were locked. After leaving the bank, he stated to Schuler that he was going to the office of his lawyer to consult him.

When he started up stairs to the law-office he sat his valise down, and Schuler informed him that he would not go up. Croco found the office door locked, and started for the residence of his lawyer, but when he came down stairs he found that Schuler had gone, and taken the valise with him. Soon afterwards he reached home, and found that George H. Schuler had been there and obtained the signature of his wife. Barbara Croco testified to the effect that about noon of the day on which the mortgage was signed she was at home alone, lying in bed, having been sick for some time; that she heard some one rapping at the back door of her house, and on going to the door saw a stranger, who proved to be George H. Schuler, standing there; that he spoke to her, and stated that he had brought Mr. Croco's satchel home, when she inquired what had happened to her husband; and she says that it occurred to her that he had been injured or killed. He walked into the room, and presented a paper to her to sign, and when she inquired the nature and purpose of the paper she was told that Peter Croco had made an assignment; that the bank had telegraphed to Washington, and the officers would come to-morrow and arrest her husband. She states that he told her that the paper presented was simply to protect Mr. Croco from the officers and from arrest. She told him that she could not read the writing, and asked him what it was, when he replied again that it was simply to protect them; that Mr. Croco had signed it, and that, if she refused, Mr. Croco would be arrested on the next day. After a good deal of talk of a similar character, and that, if her husband was arrested, he would be handled roughly, she states that she became alarmed, and anxious for the safety of her husband, and signed the paper. Between five and ten minutes after her signature was attached, her husband returned home. She states that Schuler never intimated that the paper was a mortgage upon her property, nor inquired if she acknowledged the execution of the same as a mortgage, and that in fact she did not know that it was a mortgage until the following day. The mortgage was taken to the office of the register of deeds at once for record. An employe in the register's office testified that he heard a conversation between McDonald and another employe in the register's office with respect to the signing of the mortgage, and, while he did not remember the exact language used by McDonald, it was to the effect that they took Croco into the bank, and made him sign the mortgage; that one of the Schuler boys went down to the house, and got old lady Croco to sign it; and that he thinks he used the term "bull-dozed" in speaking of the manner in which they had obtained the mortgage.

The bank assails the finding and judgment upon the ground that they are not sustained by sufficient evidence, but if we accept the testimony of the Crocos to be true, as we must, there can be no question that it abundantly supports the finding of fraud and invalidity. Taking their testimony to be true, it is inevitable that their signatures were obtained by a gross deception, and a species of duress. It should be stated that the officers of the bank emphatically deny that there were any misrepresentations or any threats made to induce either Croco or his wife to execute the mortgage. They state that Croco went to the bank without any compulsion; that the mortgage was drawn up in his presence, and its nature explained to him; that they reminded him of his representations as to the property and solvency of himself and his son, made before that time as a basis for credit, and urged him to make good those assurances by tangible security. In the argument it is said: "The old man was unable to withstand these proper appeals to his moral sense, and thus gave the securities, not very freely we admit, but with thorough knowledge of what he was doing, and not under such circumstances as to entitle him to any relief in a court of equity." Some things in the testimony of Croco would sustain the theory of the bank and indicate that he may have known the character of the paper he was signing. For instance, he admits that when the mortgage was in course of preparation McDonald inquired the name of Croco's wife, and also made inquiry in regard to the extent and description of Peter Croco's land. On the other hand, some circumstances are shown by the testimony of the bank which tend to sustain the claim that there was both fraud and duress in procuring the signatures to the mortgage. It is admitted that the old man was taken into a rear room of the bank, and that great pressure was required to obtain his signature, and that for more than two hours the four officers of the bank in turns labored with him to induce him to sign the paper. It is admitted that a telegraphic dispatch was written in his presence about 12 o'clock, the hour mentioned by Croco, and a statement was made to him that if the matter was not satisfactorily arranged the telegram would be sent; but it is claimed that it was a telegram to Schuler's father. It is also admitted that some of them may have told Croco that the transaction would be reported to the United States officers at Washington. Then the action of Schuler in hurrying to the home of Croco, and obtaining the signature of Mrs. Croco, when he knew that Mr. Croco was absent, and endeavoring to find and consult his lawyer in regard to the matter, tends to support the theory of the Crocos. All these circumstances, and others which we are not possessed of, were before the trial court, and enabled it to determine whether the mortgage was fairly and voluntarily executed, or whether the signatures to the same were obtained by fraud, fear, and compulsion. Whether the weight of the evidence supports the finding that was made is not a question in this court now. If there is competent evidence to sustain the same, that is decisive with us. Weil v. Eckard, 37 Kan. 696, 15 Pac. Rep. 922; Goodrich v. Magers, 39 Kan. 746, 18 Pac. Rep. 896. It is true there were more witnesses testified in behalf of the theory and claim of the bank than for that advanced by the Crocos, but the trial court was not obliged to believe their evidence unless it convinced and satisfied its reason and judgment; and the presence of the witnesses and the circumstances surrounding the transaction and occurring at the trial no doubt threw considerable light upon the matter, and enabled the court to reach a decision upon testimony which was so contradictory and conflicting. If the officers of the bank purposely deceived the old people, who could not read the instrument presented for their signatures, in regard to its character, as the Crocos have testified, then the mortgage was invalid, and the decree of cancellation is correct. Bird v. Logan, 35 Kan. 228, 10 Pac. Rep. 564; Warden v. Reser, 33 Kan. 86, 16 Pac. Rep. 60. If they operated upon the fears of John Croco by threats of illegal arrest and imprisonment, believed by him to be imminent, as he has testified and thus overcame his will, and through fear and by undue influence compelled him to sign the mortgage, the signature is not binding. "If the wife was induced to execute the mortgage from fear excited by threats made to her by the plaintiffs of an illegal criminal prosecution against her husband, the instrument thus obtained would not be binding upon her." Green v. Scranage, 19 Iowa, 461, 466; Foley v. Greene, 14 R. I. 618; Harris v. Carmody, 131 Mass. 51; Schultz v. Culbertson, 46 Wis. 313, 1 N. W. Rep. 19. Barbara Croco was the exclusive owner of the property described in the mortgage, and, unless it is binding on her, it cannot be sustained. She did not sign the note upon which her husband was surety, and was not indebted to the bank in any amount. The note sought to be secured was made December 24, 1888, and did not mature until 90 days thereafter. The mortgage was signed by Barbara Croco and her husband more than 30 days before the maturity of the note to secure an indebtedness for which she was in no way liable. It is conceded that the note was not then due, that no extension of time was asked or obtained, and no present consideration passed from the bank to her or any one else at the time of the execution and delivery of the mortgage. It is therefore difficult to discover any consideration that would support the execution of the mortgage by Barbara Croco. Looking at the whole testimony, however, there is no difficulty in saying that there is sufficient to sustain the finding and judgment rendered by the court. The plaintiff in error contends that a new trial should have been granted because of bias and prejudice entertained by the trial court against the officers of the bank. On the motion for a new trial three affidavits in behalf of the bank were presented by McDonald, Schuler, and Perry, and in behalf of the Crocos oral testimony was given by one witness, and a statement with reference to the charge of bias and the conduct of the trial was made by the court, and the testimony produced falls far short of sustaining the charge. The statements of the affiants are largely expressions of opinion that the court was prejudiced against the officers of the bank, and that his conduct during the trial indicated such prejudice, without reciting the facts and circumstances upon which such opinions and statements were based. The mere expression of the opinions of these witnesses, without a statement of the facts or grounds upon which such opinions were based, cannot be regarded as testimony, and is entitled to no consideration. It is stated as a fact that the court allowed great latitude in the cross-examination of the officers of the bank, but allowed no latitude whatever on the cross-examination of John and Barbara Croco. We find that the record does not sustain this claim. It is also stated that the judge in rendering judgment remarked that if he believed the testimony of the Crocos, some of the officers of the bank were criminally liable, and should be proceeded against for a criminal offense; but this is qualified to some extent by the oral testimony and statement of the judge. But, even if the statements imputed to the court in rendering its judgment are accepted, it does not indicate that the court entertained any prejudice at the commencement or during the course of the trial, nor yet at the time the statement was made. If the judge believed the testimony of the Crocos, and that the charge made against the officers of the bank was true, it is quite natural that some strong and severe language should be used; but we find nothing in what was said when the judgment was given, or in the conduct of the judge during the trial, which convinces us that the judge had any bias or prejudice for or against any of the parties to the action. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

WINFIELD NAT. BANK v. CROCO, (two cases.)

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE—PREFERENCES—FUTURE DEBTS.

1. A debtor in failing circumstances may prefer one creditor to another, although that creditor may be his wife, and he may in good faith transfer his property at a fair price to her in payment of her bona fide claim.

2. A conveyance of land by an insolvent debtor to his attorney to pay for services to be rendered for him and for other persons with whom he has business relations, for two years in the future, and with the provision that any fees allowed to the attorney by the courts in such further litigation should be returned to the debtor, constitutes a fraud against existing creditors, and furnishes grounds for the issuance of an attachment.

Error from district court, Cowley county; M. G. TROUP, Judge.

S. D. Pryor and Peckham & Peckham, for plaintiff in error. S. E. Fink and McDermott & Johnson, for defendant in error.

JOHNSTON, J. Two actions were brought in the district court of Cowley county by the Winfield National Bank against Peter C. Croco. The first was brought upon a promissory note for \$5,405, which was not then due; and the second was upon prom-issory notes which were past due, amounting to \$3,731.91. Orders of attachment were obtained by the bank upon the grounds that the defendant was about to convert a part of his property into money for the purpose of placing it beyond the reach of his creditors, and had assigned and disposed of his property, or a part thereof, with the fraudulent intent to hinder, delay, and defraud his creditors. Afterwards the defendant moved to discharge the order of attachment in each case, for the reason that the grounds alleged in the affidavit made to obtain the attachment were untrue. The motions were heard together and upon the same evidence, before the judge at chambers, and the attachments were discharged. Without waiting for the final disposition of the cases the plaintiff comes here, asking a review and reversal of the orders discharging the attachments. The question tried by the judge at chambers was the good faith and honesty of certain transfers of property made by Peter C. Croco about February 1, 1889, and while he was in a failing condition. In the early part of 1889 defendant became financially embarrassed, and transferred land and other property to his wife, of the estimated value of \$6,100. He conveyed property to S. E. Fink his attorney worth about \$500, and soon afterwards made an assignment of the remainder of his property for the benefit of all his creditors. In 1881 his wife obtained from her father in Ohio \$2,000 in cash, and \$2,000 in promissory notes, which were subsequently collected; and the testimony is that she loaned this money to her husband at the interest rate of 10 per cent. per annum. Later on, and some time about April, 1888, she received the additional sum of \$500 from her father, which was also loaned to her husband on the same terms. At the time of the transfer, his indebtedness to her amounted to more than \$7,000, and the testimony offered by defendant in error shows that the property transferred to his wife in payment of this indebtedness was worth less than \$7,000. She, however, accepted the property as full payment, and is claiming no interest in the estate conveyed by the general assignment. Upon testimony somewhat conflicting, it has been found that the transfer was made in good faith, to pay a bona fide debt, and hence as to this transfer there is little left for us to determine. A reading of the evidence satisfies us that it was amply sufficient to sustain the finding of the judge. No good purpose would be served by reciting or analyzing it. It is enough to say that the defendant showed quite clearly the receipt of the money by Mrs. Croco from her father, the loaning of the same to the defendant, and his promise to repay the amount and a stipulated rate of interest; and that all this was done while he was in a sound financial condition. It is true that the transfer was made to her while he was insolvent, and that he had consulted an attorney to ascertain whether he could prefer his wife to other creditors; and, further, that he was contemplating a general assignment when the transfer was made to his wife. But these things do not affect the validity of a transfer made in good faith to pay a bona fide debt. It is well settled that a debtor in failing circumstances may prefer one creditor to another, although that creditor should be his wife, and he may in good faith transfer his property at a fair price to her in payment of her bona fide claim. Monroe v. May, 9 Kan. 473; Tootle v. Coldwell, 30 Kan. 125, 1 Pac. Rep. 329; Bailey v. Manufacturing Co., 32 Kan. 73, 3 Pac. Rep. 756; Kennedy v. Powell, 34 Kan. 22, 7 Pac. Rep. 606; Chapman v. Summerfield, 36 Kan. 610, 14 Pac. Rep. 235; De Ford v. Nye, 40 Kan. 665, 20 Pac. Rep. 481. A decision upholding the validity of the transfer to the wife, however, does not settle that there were no grounds for the issuance of the attachment, nor that the conveyance of property to Croco's attorney is valid. About the time that the transfer was made to his wife, and just before the general assignment, he conveyed about 165 acres of unimproved land, worth about \$500, to S. E. Fink, his attorney, not for services that had been rendered, but largely for services to be rendered in the future. It was made, not only for services in behalf of Croco himself, but also for services to Croco's wife, his father, his mother, as well as for the administrator of the estate of a deceased brother. The conveyance was made in pursuance of a written contract entered into on the same day, which is as follows: "Contract between P. C. Croco and Rachel A. Croco, his wife, John Croco and Barbara Croco, his wife, and P. C. Croco, as administrator of the estate of Melangthron Croco, deceased, and S. E. Fink. It is this day agreed by and between the parties hereto that the said S. E. Fink shall transact all legal business for all the parties named for the period of two years from and after the 31st day of January, 1889, that may be done in any of the courts of Cowley county, Kansas; and in the event of suits begun within the two years, and not ended, that the said Fink shall continue to transact the necessary business pertaining thereto until all business for said estate by way of settlement is finally settled; and all allowances made as counsel fees are to be transferred to said administrator and to become his property. For and in consideration for such services rendered and to be rendered under this contract P. C. Croco and wife agree to pay the same, and the said Fink agrees to accept, as pay, the following described piece of real estate: Being lots 2 and 3, and south-east quarter of N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ and west five acres of south half of N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ and N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ section eighteen, (18) Tp. 34, range 7 east of 6th P. M., containing 156 $\frac{1}{4}$ acres more or less, all in the county of Cowley and state of Kansas; that the said lands so deeded by these parties is because of all the anticipated legal aid needed by the said John Croco and wife, arises and probably will arise out of the complications growing out of his indorsing and security given to the said Peter C. Croco by going upon his paper. It is further understood and agreed that, should there be any expenses attending the transaction of the business for the parties hereto, the same shall be paid by the party employing and not the employed. In witness whereof we hereunto set our hands the day herein written. S. E. FINK. PETER C. CROCO. RACHEL A. CROCO. JOHN CROCO. BARBARA CROCO. PETER C. CROCO, Adm'r." While Croco could have paid his attorney with money or land for any pre-existing bona fide indebtedness, he cannot, while in an insolvent condition, take any portion of the property which fairly belongs to his creditors to pay the debts or obligations of other people. By this contract he undertook to pay the expenses, not only of his own litigation, for the period of two years in advance, but for all legal business that might be transacted for Rachel A. Croco, John Croco, Barbara Croco, and the administrator of the estate of Melancthon Croco, in any of the courts of Cowley county. The agreement also contemplated that the attorney should obtain allowances as counsel fees from the probate court in the settlement of the estate of the deceased brother, and that these allowances were to be paid over to Peter C. Croco and to become his property. Whatever may have been the intention of Croco, this agreement and the carrying out of the same amounted to a withdrawal of that which justly belonged to his bona fide creditors, and operated to delay and defraud his creditors in the collection of their debts. While in an insolvent condition he created a new debt for something to be obtained two years in the future, and tried to pay it with property which should have been devoted to the payment of debts then existing. He goes further, and tries to provide and pay legal counsel for his relatives an equal length of time in the future, when his entire estate was insufficient to meet his own existing obligations. The validity of the transfer to Fink, therefore, cannot be sustained, and the making of the same furnished grounds for the issuance of an attachment. While the property conveyed to the wife could not be taken on the attachment issued, the land attempted to be transferred to Fink was subject to a levy, and there may have been other property that might properly have been seized under the order that was discharged. While the judge was warranted in discharging and releasing some of the property which had been seized, his finding that the attachment should not have issued, and the absolute discharge of the attachment that was issued, was error, for which there must be a reversal of the order made by the judge at chambers in each of the cases. That will be our judgment. All the justices concurring.

FULLER V. CROCO.

Error from district court, Cowley county; M. G. TROUP, Judge.

Peckham & Peckham, for plaintiff in error. S. E. Fink and McDermott & Johnson, for defendant in error.

PER CURIAM. This is a proceeding brought to reverse an order discharging an attachment. The grounds for attachment, the evidence submitted on the motion to discharge the same, and the questions raised for determination are substantially the same as in Bank v. Croco, 26 Pac. Rep. 942, and on the authority of that case the order of the district judge discharging the attachment must be reversed.

KANSAS FARMERS' MUT. FIRE INS. CO. v. AMICK.

NAILL et al. v. KANSAS FARMERS' MUT. FIRE INS. CO.

MUTUAL FIRE INSURANCE — ASSESSMENTS — SEPARATE CLASSES.

1. Under the provisions of chapter III, Sess. Laws 1875, (chapter 50a, Comp. Laws 1879,) the business of each class of a mutual fire insurance company must be conducted separately and independently of the other, and in no case shall an assessment be made by the company or association upon the premium notes of one class to pay the losses or expenses of the other.

2. A general judgment, rendered upon a policy of insurance on property of the second class only, issued on November 7, 1883, by a mutual fire insurance company, under the provisions of chapter III, Sess. Laws 1875, (chapter 50a, Comp. Laws 1879,) cannot be collected from the property expressly devoted by the statute to the payment of losses by the company on property of the first class.

HORTON, C. J. We do not think that the general execution in this case, or any of the proceedings under the execution, or under the receivership, can compel or result in any assessment upon the premium notes of the first class to pay the losses or expenses of the second class; nor can any of the premium notes executed by persons insured in the first class be sold, applied, or used in any way to pay the losses or expenses on the judgment upon the policy in this case, which belongs to the second class; nor can the collections or assets from the premium notes of the first class be applied or used to pay this judgment, or any part thereof. In our opinion, all the funds, guaranty or otherwise, notes, or other assets of the insurance company, which are expressly devoted by the statute for the payment or protection of any insurance of any property insured by the company in the second class, cannot be levied upon, applied, or used in any way, directly or indirectly, to pay any judgment rendered upon a policy insuring property of the second class. Section 83, c. 50a, Comp. Laws 1879, relating to mutual fire insurance companies, which was in force at the time of the issuance of the policy to Lydia A. Amick of the 7th of November, 1883, provides, among other things: "That any number of persons, not less than five, may associate themselves together for the purpose of mutual protection against loss or damage by fire or lightning or tornado, under the provisions of this act, which property to be insured shall be classified as follows: First, to include all dwelling-houses, barns, sheds, out-buildings, and cribs, and their contents, farm implements, hay, grain, wool, and other products, live-stock, wagons, carriages, harness, household goods, wearing apparel, provisions, musical instruments, and libraries, being upon farms or farm property, or in dwellings, or in accompanying outbuildings that constitute detached risks in villages, and belonging to the members, second, to include all risks on buildings used for merchandising and manufacturing, and the goods, wares, machinery, and implements contained therein, and all other property not included in the first class. The business of each class shall be conducted separately and independently of the other, and in no case shall an assessment be made by the company or association upon the premium notes of one class to pay the losses or expenses of the other; and any company or association doing business under this act may elect to confine their business to either the first or second class, or to embrace both; and, whenever any change is made in the character of their business, under this act, it shall be done by resolution of the directors, which shall be filed, with the by-laws, in the office of the secretary of state." See, also, paragraphs 3417, 3418, Gen. St. 1889. See, also, sections 86, 89, 90, 93, c. 50a, Comp. Laws 1879, and pars. 3421, 3425, 3426, 3428, Gen. St. 1889. When the insurance company issued its policy to Lydia A. Amick, and when she accepted the same, all parties acted with full knowledge of the provisions of chapter III, Sess. Laws 1875, (chapter 50a, Comp. Laws, 1879.) Lydia A. Amick at that time had notice that, by insuring in the Farmers' Mutual Fire Insurance Company, she became a member and stockholder thereof, and she also knew at that time, or she was bound to know, that the business of each class of the insurance company was conducted separately and independently of the other. She took her policy in the second class, not in the first class. When she brought her action in the district court, her petition showed that she had insurance in the second class of the company, not in the first class. Therefore her judgment rendered upon the policy issued on property of the second class, and not of the first class, cannot be collected from premium notes, assets, or other funds exempted by the statute from being applied to losses of the second class. The premium notes, assets, or other funds, exclusively devoted by the statute for the protection of insurance of the first class, cannot be used or applied to pay losses upon insurance of the second class. Therefore, while the judgment in this case is a general judgment, it cannot be enforced against property which is expressly exempted by the statute. Of course, if any property, assets, or funds belonging to the second class at the date of the policy issued to Lydia A. Amick, or at the date of the fire, or at any other time, has been improperly or wrongfully transferred by the officers of the insurance company from the second class to the first class to evade the payment of any judgment, debt, or other claim, such transfer will not prevent the collection of the judgment from such property, assets, or funds. Again, if the officers of the insurance company have concealed or secreted any of the property, assets, or funds of the second class in the business of the first class, such property will also be subject to the payment of this judgment. Further, if the officers of the insurance company have covered up, by reorganization or any other change any of the property, assets or funds which belong, or ought to belong, to the second class, or which in any possible way can be used, under the provisions of the statute, to pay the losses of the second class, such property is also subject to the payment of this general judgment. In case No. 5,491 the judgment of the district court will be affirmed, but the receiver will not be permitted to take possession of, disturb, or control any of the property expressly exempted by the statute. Case No. 7,017 will be modified, but the injunction will continue, excepting as to property not exempt in accordance with the views herein expressed.

JOHNSTON, J., concurring.

VALENTINE, J., (dissenting.) In my opinion the judgments heretofore rendered in these two cases are perfectly right. The original judgment involved in this controversy was rendered by the district court of Franklin county on October 7, 1885. It was and is a general judgment against the insurance company in its entirety, and with reference to all its parts, authorizing a general execution to be issued against its property generally. It is just, such a judgment as would be rendered against the company for its office rent, or for the purchase price or cost of erecting a building in which to do business, or for lights or fuel or stationery or advertisements in a newspaper, or other printed matter, etc. It is not a special judgment against the company with reference to some portion of its business, as its first-class business, or its second-class business, or with reference to any particular property. Nor is it to be enforced in some particular manner different from the enforcement of judgments in general. It is a general judgment in all its aspects. It authorizes a general execution to be issued, and, under it, the clerk could not issue any other kind of execution; and, when the execution is issued and placed in the hands of the sheriff, he could not transform it into a special execution. He could not say, in case he could not find some particular kind or class of property to levy on, that he would not levy upon any property at all. Under it he would have the right to levy upon any kind of property belonging to the company subject to execution. It makes no difference now whether the judgment should originally have been rendered in some other form or in some other manner or not. It was originally rendered, as it now exists. It was rendered on October 7, 1885,—more than five and a half years ago. Afterwards, and on July 9, 1887 (nearly four years ago) it was affirmed by the supreme court, (14 Pac. Rep. 454,) and it still remains just as it was originally rendered, without the slightest change or modification; and certainly the clerk of the district court could not modify it in effect by issuing a special execution upon it, and he has not attempted to do so; and the sheriff could not, in effect, modify it by refusing to levy upon any property at all, unless he could find property of a particular kind or class upon which to levy, and he has not attempted to do so; nor could the judge of a district court, other than the one in which the judgment was rendered nor the court itself, nor any court, not even the supreme court, at this time, and upon this present showing, change or modify the judgment, or in effect reverse it or vacate it. The insurance company claims, in effect, that, on account of its own transformations and changes in business, the judgment cannot be enforced at all. It claims that the judgment as rendered may be virtually ignored as a general judgment, and then it claims that the judgment cannot be enforced against the company with reference to its first-class business, because the original policy was a second-class business policy; and that it cannot be enforced against it with reference to its second-class business, for the reason that that kind of business has been blotted out of existence, extinguished, annihilated, and that it has no assets belonging to such defunct business, and that no execution can be enforced against such business, for the reason that no execution can be enforced against a nonentity. It must be remembered, however, that the judgment does not of itself authorize any kind of process except an ordinary general execution. Under this judgment, an execution, confined to its second-class business or property only, could not be issued; but, if it could, it would be worthless, for such business was annihilated years ago, and no longer has any existence, and all the assets belonging thereto have in some manner been placed beyond the reach of executions. Possibly, by this kind of legerdemain and jugglery, the company may defeat all general judgments rendered against it, and avoid all its liabilities thereon; but it should not be allowed to do so. If it can, then a judgment, general in its terms, can no longer be considered as importing absolute verity, or as being the end of litigation, and the doctrine of res adjudicata should be obliterated from the law. A thing settled by a judgment would not be settled at all, and all respect for judgments should certainly cease, for judgments could no longer be considered as having any binding force or obligation as against any one. It is said that since our last decision in this controversy, and while this motion for a rehearing has been pending in this court, the company has undergone another transformation by a reorganization of its corporate existence. Perhaps I should add a few words with regard to exemptions. Of course, a special execution, running against only particular property, could not be levied upon any other property, whether the same be called exempt property or not. But this is immaterial in this case, for no special execution could be issued in the present case, but only a general execution. It is also true that a general execution, running against all property subject to execution, could not be levied upon property exempt from a general execution. But neither has this anything to do with the present case, for, so far as insurance companies are concerned, there are no exemptions, constitutional, statutory, or otherwise, as against a general execution. It cannot well be claimed that any constitutional provision, or any statute, or any legal principle, may anywhere be found exempting any property of any insurance company from any general execution running against all the property of the insurance company subject to execution. I know of no exemption laws in favor of insurance companies exempting any of their property from general judgments and general executions. In my opinion, it makes no difference whether Mrs. Amick's petition in the case in which the original judgment was rendered shows that her insurance policy belonged to a second-class insurance business or not, or whether Mrs. Amick had any knowledge upon this subject or not; but, in fact, neither the petition nor the record in that case shows anything concerning these matters, except as follows: The record shows what property was insured and what property was injured or destroyed by fire; and the insurance policy was attached to the petition, and made a part thereof; and at one place upon its face, and at another place upon its back, the following isolated letters and figures, occupying in the aggregate less than one and one-half inches in length, and less than one-sixth of an inch in width, are found, to-wit: "Class No. 2." No allegation is anywhere to be found in the record of the case in which the original judgment was rendered stating that the insurance company did a second-class business, or more than one kind of business, or that Mrs. Amick had any knowledge concerning these matters; and the letters and figures, "Class No. 2," standing alone upon the insurance policy, as they do, do not indicate very much. The petition was an ordinary petition upon an insurance policy, asking for a general judgment for money, and a general judgment for money was rendered, and, in my opinion, it should now be treated as a general judgment.

AXMAN v. DUEKER et al.

SERVICE ON GARNISHEE—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

Where the record in garnishment proceedings showed that the garnishee was served with a copy of the writ of attachment and a written notice not to pay any money or turn over any property in his hands to the defendant until so ordered by the court, and the sufficiency of such service was challenged by the defendant, and was by the district court held sufficient to require the garnishee to answer, and such garnishee did answer, under the order of the court, held, that such service was not void, and cannot be attacked in a collateral proceeding. Explaining 25 Pac. Rep. 582.

On rehearing.

PER CURIAM. It is urged upon the motion for a rehearing in this case that the court failed to decide whether or not the service of process upon the defendant William J. Dueker in the case of C. F. Ziegler v. L. C. Pfaffenberger was sufficient to give the court jurisdiction over the property claimed to have been attached or garnished. The district court found in the case of Axman v. Dueker that Ziegler had a lien for $565.05, by virtue of the attachment and garnishment proceedings instituted in the case of Ziegler v. Pfaffenberger, upon the note sued on. It would seem from the record that a trial was had before the court, and the plaintiff in error in this case was given a judgment for the balance due on the note executed by Dueker to Pfaffenberger, after deducting the amount of Ziegler's lien, acquired by virtue of the attachment and garnishment proceedings. We stated that there was sufficient in the record, in our opinion, to give the court jurisdiction. This is as far as we think we are called upon to go in this case. Had the question of the sufficiency of the service, raised in the original case of Ziegler v. Pfaffenberger, been brought to this court by proceedings in error, we might have held otherwise. But the garnishee was ordered by the district court to appear and answer, after the sufficiency of the proceedings had been questioned by the original defendant. The garnishee answered without objection, and thus waived all defects to the process, unless they were of such a character as to render the proceedings absolutely void. The judgment in that case still stands unchallenged. 8 Amer & Eng. Enc. Law, 1118. The return of the sheriff stated that he received the order of attachment on the 12th day of May, 1887, and served the same by delivering a true and certified copy to William Dueker, with a written notice not to pay any money or turn over any property to the defendant Pfaffenberger until so ordered by the court. There may be a question as to whether this return would stand a contest by the garnishee, but we do not think it is void, and hence cannot be attacked in a collateral proceeding. We are aware that the decisions are conflicting. Some states have held that the appearance and answer of a garnishee waives any objection that might have been taken to the notice. Upon this proposition, see Miller v. O'Bannon, 4 Lea, 398; Carter v. Koshland, 12 Or. 493, 8 Pac. Rep. 556; Lupton v. Moore, 101 Pa. St. 318; Pulliam v. Aler, 15 Grat. 54; Railroad Co. v. Taylor, 81 Ind. 25; Truitt v. Griffin, 61 Ill. 27; Reynolds v. Collins, 78 Ala. 94; and Hinkley v. Water-Power Co., 9 Minn. 56, (Gil. 44.) While we do not care to go to the extent that some of the authorities do upon the question of a voluntary appearance by the garnishee, still we think that the record in the case of Ziegler v. Pfaffenberger showed that the service was not void. The district court held that it was sufficient, and required the garnishee to answer, and we are of the opinion that the service upon the garnishee cannot be attacked in this case. It is further urged that the opinion stated that the defendant in this case made a special appearance for the purpose of contesting the jurisdiction of the court over the subject-matter of the action, when in fact no such appearance was made by either the defendant or plaintiff. The language of the opinion is not subject to the interpretation placed upon it by counsel. The opinion stated that the defendant made a special appearance in this case, referring to the case of Ziegler v. Pfaffenberger, and not to the case at bar. The motion for a rehearing will be overruled.

HORTON, C. J. All of the papers, pleadings, and notices in the case of Ziegler v. Pfaffenberger are not before us, or at least the record does not show they are. All presumptions are in favor of the rulings and judgment of the district court, and therefore I cannot say, upon the record as presented, that the court had no jurisdiction over the garnishee from the date of the service of the notice. Again, it does not seem to me that Mr. R. Axman purchased the note in controversy in good faith. He is a colorable owner only, not the actual holder. For these reasons I concur in the foregoing order denying a rehearing.

VALENTINE, J. With very great doubts I concur in overruling the motion for a rehearing, and in affirming the judgment of the court below.

PERSONAL INJURIES — EXEMPLARY DAMAGES.

In an action to recover damages for personal injuries, where there is no testimony showing that the negligence complained of is so gross as to amount to wantonness, and no willful or malicious acts are proven, it is error for the trial court to instruct the jury that "they are at liberty to award what are termed 'exemplary' or 'punitive' damages; that is, damages which are given, not on account of any special merit in plaintiff's case justifying the same, but as a warning and lesson to the defendant, to teach it greater respect and care for the rights and safety of others." (Syllabus by Simpson, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Chase county; FRANK DOSTER, Judge.

Geo. R. Peck, A. A. Bird, and C. N. Sterry, for plaintiff in error. Madden Bros., for defendant in error.

SIMPSON, C. The defendant in error brought an action in the district court of Chase county, Kan., against the plaintiff in error, to recover a judgment for a personal injury to himself, resulting, as he claimed, through the negligence of plaintiff in error. A trial was had to a jury, and a verdict of $700 returned in favor of defendant in error for that amount, and costs, and this proceeding is to reverse that judgment. That portion of plaintiff's petition which sets out the negligence claimed, and concerning which evidence was offered at the trial, reads as follows: "That on or about the 13th day of March, A. D. 1888, the said defendant was engaged in the digging and constructing of a tank-well for its business near its line of road, and also near to its round-house between Strong City and Cottonwood Falls, in Chase county, Kan.; that the said plaintiff was in the employ of the said defendant railroad company as a laborer, among others, at said time, digging in said well, and filling dirt in boxes to be elevated out of said well; that said defendant had the furnishing, and it was its duty to furnish, all the appliances, machinery, structures, and conveniences in and about the digging, construction, and operation of said well; that over the top of said well there was erected a scaffolding attached to piles driven in the ground; that, between the four cross-timbers or beams that constituted the frame of said scaffolding, there was a square opening through which the boxes for elevating dirt out of said well ascended and descended; that on the top of the frame of said scaffolding there were two upright shafts or pieces of timber secured at the bottom of said frame, and immediately over the top of said well; that on the top of said pieces there was a cross-piece of timber, to which, about midway, was attached a pulley, through which said pulley and another one, attached to one of the upright shafts or pieces of timber above mentioned, the rope that elevated and lowered said dirt boxes passing into a windlass that was operated by a steam-engine that was stationed near said well for that purpose, and that said engine was operated by an engineer by the name of Scott Sharper; that, as fast as the dirt was taken out of said well by the operation of said appliances, it was deposited in a dirt-car that was run immediately over the top of the well to receive said dirt, and said dirt was conveyed away from said well in said dirt-car, and upon a track built for that purpose, and upon which said car ran; that it was necessary for the reasonable safety and proper security of the plaintiff herein, who was working in said well, that said square opening, immediately over the top of said well, be kept free and unimpeded, so that the rope should be, to the extent thereof, free and untrammelled in its operation; that said defendant, by its agents and servants, acting under power and authority from the defendant, did, in the doing of said things, carelessly and negligently, and without reasonable care and prudence in the premises, place three heavy planks or boards, loosely and insecurely fastened, and unsuitable and unfitted and improperly prepared for that purpose, upon the top of said well, upon the cross-beams aforesaid, thereby narrowing said square opening so that the rope could easily come in contact with said heavy planks or boards; after having been so placed over the top of said well, were, by, said defendant, its agents and servants aforesaid, carelessly, negligently altered and changed, and the inside plank was changed, by cutting the same with an axe, so that a narrow and insufficient portion thereof only extended onto the frame on either end, and thereby rendering it less secure and more dangerous, hazardous, and perilous; and said defendant, by its agents and servants aforesaid, did negligently and carelessly suffer the said planks or boards to remain unsecured, and out of repair, and each and all of said boards or planks so carelessly and negligently placed and altered as aforesaid, and suffered to remain as aforesaid, were each and all extrahazardous and dangerous to the life and limb of persons working in said well,—all of which was well known, at all times, to said defendant, and its agents and servants aforesaid; that while the plaintiff herein was engaged in working in said well, and while a box was being elevated out of said well by means of the appliances aforesaid, said rope came in contact with said planks or boards situated and placed as aforesaid, and, without any warning or signal to plaintiff by said defendant, or any of its servants or agents, and by the force or violence of the contact, hurled one of said heavy planks or boards from its place down into the well, and upon the said plaintiff, which plank crushed, wounded, and maimed the hand of said plaintiff, breaking and dislocating the bones thereof; that the placing of the planks or boards hereinbefore mentioned, and the alteration of the same so as to render them less secure and more dangerous, and the allowing of the same to remain in the condition they were in at the time of the injury to plaintiff, were unknown to the plaintiff, but was known by the said defendant, its agents and servants, as aforesaid; and said defendant, its agents and servants as aforesaid, knew that the position of the plaintiff in said well was extra dangerous and hazardous to his life and limbs, by reason of said rope coming in contact with said plank, or either of them, and throwing the same upon said plaintiff in said well, and the same could have been known by the said defendant, its agents and servants, as aforesaid, by the exercise of reasonable and ordinary care in the premises; that the plaintiff's work in digging in said well and filling the boxes with dirt as aforesaid, was an extrahazardous and dangerous position, and required great diligence and care on the part of said defendant to guard against injury; that the placing of said planks as aforesaid, and the altering of the same as aforesaid, and the allowing the same to be out of repair as aforesaid, and the carelessness and negligence of defendant's engineer as aforesaid, and his incompetency, caused and produced plaintiff's injuries as aforesaid." To this petition the defendant below filed an answer containing a general denial, and the defense of contributory negligence, and upon the issues so made up the case was tried.

The defendant prepared certain special findings of fact in said cause to submit to the jury for them to answer; that, among the others, the following occurred: "How much, if anything, do you allow plaintiff as exemplary or punitive damages? How much do you allow plaintiff for compensatory damages? What amount, if any, do you allow plaintiff for medical and surgical care,—medical attendance? And thereupon, when said defendant was about to submit said questions, and the court had approved of their submission, the attorneys for plaintiff and defendant agreed in open court to submit said cause to the jury without argument, upon consideration that said special questions should be withdrawn, which condition was made by plaintiff's attorney; which agreement was made in open court, and carried into effect by defendant's withdrawing said questions; and thereupon said cause was submitted without argument to the jury. Thereupon the jury retired to consider of their verdict, and that afterwards, and on the 23d day of June, 1888, the jury returned into court their verdict, which is in words and figures following, to-wit: 'We, the jury impaneled and sworn in the above-entitled case, do upon our oaths find for the plaintiff, and assess the amount of his damages at $700.'"

The material facts are that prior to the 13th day of March, 1888, the plaintiff in error dug a large well at its round-house between Strong City and Cottonwood Falls, and it also started a second one. This second well had been started in this way: A test well 6 feet square, and curbed with boards, had been sunk to a depth of 30 feet; that is, a well 30 feet in diameter, having this test well in its center, was started by digging down to a depth of from 8 to 10 feet, leaving this test well in the center. When the large well was sunk to a depth of from 8 to 10 feet, curbing was put around the inside, and then 4 piles, each 40 feet in length, were driven down, so that they formed a square that was 12 feet each way,—that is, from each pile to the other there was a distance of 12 feet, measured in any direction,—and in the center of this square was the test well. The tops of these piles, when sunk as far as they were to be sunk, were a little above the level of the ground; and, upon the tops being leveled and squared, a crib or frame-work of timbers was placed thereon, 12 feet square, except that the 2 timbers running east and west on each side extended to the ground. This crib was built up by timbers crossing each way on top of the first heavy timbers to a distance in height of some 3 or 4 feet. On the top of this crib were placed two upright timbers about 12 feet high, braced on each side to keep them upright, and another timber was placed upon the top of these 2 upright timbers, making a cross-beam, in the center of which was fastened a pulley. This pulley was directly over the center of the large well. A track was laid from the railroad track on the outside, and the same gauge as it, north, up onto this crib, so that the same ran from the south to north of the center of the well a few feet. An engine located some 80 feet to the west of the well contained a drum for the purpose of winding up a rope running from it to a pulley at the foot of one of the upright posts, and from such pulley to the pulley over the center of the well, on the beam across these upright posts, from whence it hung down with an iron hook over the exact center of the large well. There were 3 dirt boxes, 3 feet square and 3 feet deep, which were made with movable bottoms, and chains running from the corners to a common center, into which the hook of this rope was fastened. The scheme was this: To lower these three dirt boxes, and, as fast as one would be filled, the hook at the end of the rope running over the pulley on the derrick would be fastened to the chains attached to the box, and, upon a signal from the men who attended to loading the box and fastening the hook to it, the engine in the engine-house would cause the drum to revolve, winding the rope up upon it, and thus causing it to hoist the box to the top of the opening on top of this crib, and up high enough to run a dirt wagon or buggy on this railroad track under it, when the bottom of the box would be unfastened, and the dirt would drop out of it into the wagon, which would then be run down the track, on the crib, off onto the railroad track. The opening through which the dirt boxes were hoisted was 4 feet 8 inches wide, and considerably longer north and south, making a hole probably 4 feet 8 inches east and west, and from 5 to 6 feet north and south. The top of this crib, outside of the hole, was planked over. On the north end of this railway track, which came from the railroad up onto this crib, were 3 planks, about a foot wide, 2 inches thick, and from 6 to 7 feet long. These 3 planks were nailed across the top of the scantling that held the track, for two purposes,—one to stop the dirt wagon or buggy from going any further north when it was run up empty, to receive the dirt from the dirt boxes; and the other to prevent the dirt falling out of this dirt wagon from falling back into the well, this dirt wagon being open on the north end.

The day before the injury occurred, upon completion of the crib and track, the rubbish and stuff of that kind had been hauled up out of the well in these dirt boxes, and on the morning of the injury they had commenced to raise the dirt out of the well in the manner described, and had, prior to the time of the injury, hoisted up from three to five boxes. The foreman in charge of the work, believing that these planks spoken about, on the north end of the railroad track, prevented the dirt wagon or buggy from running far enough to the north, took an axe, and either chopped out a piece on each track in the first plank so that the dirt wagon could go further to the north, or else split off a part of the first or south plank, to accomplish the same purpose. These planks were fastened to the scantling on which the track was laid by from five to seven spikes in each end. It was claimed by the plaintiff below that the foreman split off so much of the first or south plank as to leave the remainder held by one spike in each end. Immediately prior to the accident, and after this plank had been cut, the plaintiff below and two other employees had taken an empty dirt box, and placed it on the north-west side of the well, outside of the square made by the pilings, within about two feet from the outside embankment, and had there filled it. This box, when it was carried to the place where it was filled, was carried by plaintiff and his comrades, and had the rope hitched to it. When it was placed, the rope ran, from its connection with the box, on a slant, so that it bound on this plank that had been cut. This dirt box when filled weighed about 1,200 pounds. When this dirt box was filled the plaintiff gave the signal to hoist away, and took hold of the box to steady it. As the engine started and the rope straightened out it threw this plank that had been chopped into, up into the air, so that it fell on the north side of the crib, into the well, striking the plaintiff on his hand, breaking two or three of the bones; and this was the injury complained of.

On the part of the plaintiff below it was claimed that it was negligence for the foreman to have chopped into this plank so as to have left it fastened with any less spikes than it originally had to hold it in its position, and that such negligence was the direct cause of plaintiff's injury. On the other hand, the defendant claimed that plaintiff's injury was solely and entirely caused by his own negligence, or the negligence of his co-employees combined, in this: That it was never intended, in putting these planks down, that the rope which hoisted the bucket should ever bind upon or come in contact with these planks in hoisting the bucket; and the men were particularly warned and cautioned not to set the bucket so far to one side as to have the rope bind upon any of the timbers. If the rope hung straight down, it is an undisputed fact that it would be from 3 to 3½ feet from it to this plank. If the dirt boxes were set anywhere inside of the square made by the piling, between the piling and the curbing of the test well, the rope, when hitched to the dirt box, would not bind or rub upon this plank or any of the timbers. It was not expected or understood that the rope would catch on to these planks, and they were not put there for any purpose of that kind. Plaintiff's injury was such that, under ordinary circumstances, he would be expected to have recovered from such injury in the course of about three months. There was some conflict in the evidence as to the warning of the foreman to the men not to set the bucket so far at the side as to make the rope bind upon the timbers, but the preponderance on that question was with the plaintiff in error. There was no evidence as to the value of the attendance of a physician, or as to his charges, or as to the liability of the defendant in error for his services. Prior to the accident, the defendant was receiving about $1.55 per day for his labor. The accident occurred on the 13th day of March, 1888, and the cause was tried on the 22d day of June, 1888. All three of the surgeons examined, one of whom was in attendance on the injured man, testified that the injury was not permanent. Without commenting at length on the facts, we are of the opinion that the case was not properly presented to the jury by the instructions, and that there was material error committed by the trial court in refusing certain instructions asked for by the plaintiff in error. No instruction was given respecting the burden of proof, and one that fairly stated that the burden was on the plaintiff to prove the negligence alleged was refused. One contention of the plaintiff in error at the trial was that the employees, embracing the defendant in error, were several times warned of the danger there might be if they set the bucket so far back that the rope would bind upon the timber, and, as we have said, there was conflicting evidence about it.

The defendant in error requested the court to give an instruction, numbered 6 in the record, that reads as follows: "The jury are instructed that if the plaintiff disregarded any warnings or cautions given to him, either by the foreman in charge or by a co-laborer, and that the disregard of such warning and caution in any way contributed to the injury complained of, that then in such case the plaintiff cannot recover." This was refused, and no notice taken of such fact by any instruction given, except that the court did instruct the jury that "an employee is bound to obey the orders of the person placed in authority over him, and, if he disobeys, and an injury results to him, he cannot recover for such injury." There is nothing in the record that any orders had been disobeyed. There is evidence that a caution or warning had been given repeatedly to the men, in the presence and hearing of the defendant in error, about the danger attending an improper location of the dirt bucket. This warning could not be tortured into an order, and the defendant in error's failure to heed it into a disobedience. This question was not so presented by the instructions that the jury could comprehend its import. The instructions did not notice that the defendant in error was charged with contributory negligence, and that there was some evidence tending to prove the same. No definition of "contributory negligence" was given or rule stated to guide the jury on the only defense made by the plaintiff in error. A special instruction was requested by the defendant in error which fairly embodied the law applicable to the state of facts as set forth in the record, and it would have been better, perhaps, to have also given the instruction asked. There are other instructions given that are subject to grave criticism, and others offered and refused that ought to be given, but they are unimportant when compared to this instruction. The jury were told by the trial court in these words: "If you believe from the evidence that the negligence of the defendant was of a gross and reckless character, and defendant's conduct lacking in all elements of caution and regard for the safety of the plaintiff, you are at liberty to award what are termed 'exemplary' or 'punitive' damages; that is, damages which are given not on account of any special merit in plaintiff's case justifying the same, but as a warning and lesson to the defendant, to teach it greater respect and care for the rights and safety of others." Now, we have searched this record in vain to find the utterance of a single witness, or the recitation of any one particular fact, which could, by fair construction or just inference, be considered as tending to establish wanton negligence, or gross or reckless conduct, upon the part of the servants and employees of the railroad company. There is absolutely no testimony to warrant such an instruction. For this alone, if there were no other reasons, this case must be reversed, and a new trial ordered. Railroad Co. v. Kier, 41 Kan. 671, 21 Pac. Rep. 770; Railroad Co. v. Cutter, 19 Kan. 83; City of Parsons v. Lindsay, 26 Kan. 426; Railroad Co. v. Peavey, 29 Kan. 169. It is recommended that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to grant a new trial.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered, all the justices concurring.

SHERMAN CENTER TOWN CO. v. FLETCHER.

CONTRACTS OF CORPORATION—ESTOPPEL.

A corporation which has enjoyed the benefits of a contract cannot claim that it was ultra vires and void.

Error from district court, Sherman county; LOUIS K. PRATT, Judge.

Hardy & Stirling, for plaintiff in error. J. W. Lewis, for defendant in error.

PER CURIAM. This was an action brought in the district court of Sherman county by John C. Fletcher against the Sherman Center Town Company, upon a certain contract for the recovery of $200; and the plaintiff recovering that amount in the district court with interest and costs, the Sherman Center Town Company then, as plaintiff in error, brought the case to this court for review. Every material question involved in this case, we think, has already in effect been decided by this court in the following cases, to-wit: Town Co. v. Morris, 43 Kan. 282, 23 Pac. Rep. 569; Town Co. v. Swigart, 43 Kan. 292, 23 Pac. Rep. 569; Town Co. v. Russell, 26 Pac. Rep. 715, (decided by this court on April 11, 1891.) Upon the authority of the foregoing cases the judgment of the court below will be affirmed. All the justices concurring.

CAREY et al. v. REEVES et al.

BOUNDARIES OF STATE—SERVICE BY PUBLICATION—FORECLOSURE OF MORTGAGE.

1. On the 17th day of January, 1861, the region of country known as "Pike's Peak" was within the territory of Kansas.

2. Where an affidavit for constructive service by publication, filed on January 17, 1861, showed upon its face that the defendant resided within the region of country known as "Pike's Peak" at the time that the action was commenced and the affidavit filed, it was not sufficient to give the district court jurisdiction, constructive or otherwise, over the defendant, upon the ground that he was a non-resident of the territory of Kansas. Under the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure of 1859 a plaintiff could not upon such an affidavit proceed to make service by publication, and the district court had no jurisdiction to foreclose a mortgage in such a case where the only service of summons was by publication upon such an insufficient affidavit, and no personal or other appearance was made by the defendant. Comp. Laws 1862, c. 26, tits. 4, 5, and especially sections 82, 78, 79. See, also, tit. 11, § 885, of the same chapter.

Error from superior court, Shawnee county; W. C. WEBB, Judge.
